ALPHABETICAL LIST OF CASES REPORTED IN THIS VOLUME.

THE DECISIONS

OF THE

Supreme Court of the United States,

AT DECEMBER TERM, 1858.

THE CLAIMANTS AND OWNERS OF THE STEAMER LOUISIANA, Appellants,
v.
ISAAC FISHER ET AL.

(See S. C., 21 How., 1-7.)

Collision between steamer and schooner—the former held in fault.

A schooner in Chesapeake Bay was making a southwest course, and was close-hauled upon the wind. She was run into by a steamer and sunk. She did not vary her course after the steamer came in sight. The steamer was first directed to the westward, and afterwards to the eastward, and then stopped and backed; and these contrary movements were the result of the doubts of her officers as to the position or course of the schooner. If the order to ease the engines, or to stop, had been given in the first instance, the probability is that the catastrophe would have been avoided. Steamer held in fault.

The schooner was not responsible for failing to carry a light. The night was moonlight; though the light was occasionally obscured, but not to a degree that rendered the navigation of the bay dangerous, if care, skill and vigilance had been employed upon the different vessels.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Maryland.

The libel in this case was filed in the District Court of the United States for the District of Maryland, by the appellees, to recover damages resulting from the loss of the schooner, George D. Fisher, and certain goods and money, by a collision.

The District Court entered a decree in favor of the libelants for $3,100.

The Circuit Court having affirmed this decree, on appeal, the defendants took an appeal to this court.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Mr. William Schley, for appellants:

The following propositions are urged on the part of the appellants:

1. The omission of the schooner to display a light, under all the circumstances, was actual neglect and a culpable fault.

Act of 1838, ch. 191, sec. 10, 5 Stat. at L., 306; Act of 1849, ch. 105, sec. 5, 9 Stat. at L., 382; also 14 and 15 Victoria, cap. 79, sec. 26; The Londonderry, 4 No. Cas. Supp., 46; 5 Eng. Adm.; The Iron Duke, 2 Wm. Rob., 383; 9 Eng. Adm., 382; The Delaware v. The Osprey, 2 Wall., Jr., 268; Rogers v. The St. Charles, 19 How., 109; Ure v. Coffman, 19 How., 63; Ward v. Armstrong, 14 Ill., 285; Simpson v. Hand, 6 Whart., 324; Carsley v. White, 21 Pick., 254; The Alival, 25 Eng. L. & Eq., 604; Williams v. Chapman, 4 No. Cas., 590–592; N. Y. & Va. Steamship Co. v. Calderwood, 19 How., 246.

2. Even if the schooner was not bound to display a light, as an act of legal duty, and even if the omission to do so was not, in fact, any want of care; yet it was no fault of the steamer, if the persons who were on the lookout on board of the steamer were physically unable, from the absence of a light, to discern the schooner, in due time to have made the necessary dispositions to avoid a collision. The rule should then apply, that in a case of misfortune, without fault on either side, the suffering party is without redress.

Peck v. Sanderson, 17 How., 178; Stainback v. Rae, 14 How., 532.

3. At all events, even if the steamer is blamable for having maintained too high a rate of speed, still the schooner was in fault in having improperly changed her course, as shown by the proof; and in this view the loss should have been divided.

The Catharine v. Dickinson, 17 How., 177; Rogers v The St. Charles, 19 How., 108.

Messrs. William Price and S. T. Wallis, for appellees:

1. Herbert N. Fenton, though a part owner and libelant, was a competent witness for the libelants as to the facts of the collision itself, touching which only he was examined.

The Catharine of Dover, 2 Hagg., 145; The Pitt, 2 Hagg., 149, n.; The Sarah Barnardina, 2 Hagg., 151, n.; 3 Greenl. Ev., sec. 412; The Boston, 1 Sumn., 343.

2. The steamer had no sufficient lookout, whose whole business was to act as such according to the established law of this court. Pearson was in the actual discharge of his duty as master, and Marshall was employed at the time as pilot.

St. John v. Payne, 10 How., 585; The Genesee Chief v. Fitzhugh, 12 How., 462; The New York v. Rea, 18 How., 225; Ward v. The Ogdensburgh, 5 McLean, 622.

NOTE—Rights of steam and sailing vessels with reference to each other, and in passing and meeting. See note to St. John v. Paine, 51 U. S. (10 How.), 557.

3. As matter of law, there was no obligation on the part of the schooner to carry a light, or to display one on such a night; and as matter of fact, the question of her having been without a light is not a practical one in this case.

The testimony of the master and mate of The Roanoke, it will be argued, are of conclusive weight for the appellees, they not only being indifferent witnesses, but having been at the time and previously, engaged in following the course of The Fisher as a guide of their own, so that they, of necessity, were forced to know the course she was pursuing, and did, in fact, know, from actually seeing her, the distance at which she was visible.

St. John v. Payne, 10 How., 586; The Panther, 24 Eng. L. & Eq., 585-587; Walsh v. Rogers, 13 How., 283; Newton v. Stebbins, 10 How., 606; Ure v. Coffman, 19 How., 62, 63; Morrison v. Nav. Co., 20 Eng. L. & Eq., 457, 458.

4. It is clear from Captain Pearson's testimony in regard to the noise of the rudder chains, that Marshall starboarded his helm, before he knew, on his own showing, whether the schooner was at anchor or in motion. This overt act, in addition to his failure to slacken the steamer's speed, seems to place the responsibility of the appellants beyond question.

The Londonderry, 4 No. Cas. Supp., 37, 38; Ward v. The Ogdensburgh, 5 McLean, 622; Newton v. Stebbins, 10 How., 606; The Perth, 3 Hagg., 417; The Oregon v. Rocca, 18 How., 572; Rogers v. The St. Charles, 19 How., 108; Peck v. Sanderson, 17 How., 180, 2.

Mr. Justice Campbell delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellees instituted their suit in the District Court of the United States for the District of Maryland, sitting in admiralty, against the steamer Louisiana, in a cause of collision, arising between the steamer and the schooner George D. Fisher, in the Chesapeake Bay, in December, 1855, in which the latter was run into and sunk, and became a total loss.

The libelants charge, that before and at the time of the collision the schooner was bound on a voyage from Philadelphia to Norfolk, through the Chesapeake Bay, and was properly manned and equipped for that voyage, and carefully navigated. That the steamer was seen from the schooner, shortly after ten o'clock P. M., about eight or ten miles distant, steering up the bay, the schooner making about four knots an hour, in a southwest course, against the wind, which was blowing about south by east. That when the steamer was within a half mile or a mile distant, she appeared to be hauling to the westward, with the apparent intention of crossing the schooner's bows, but shortly afterwards seemed to be again hauling to the eastward, as if to drop under the schooner's stern. That this last movement was made too late, the distance between the two vessels being too inconsiderable to allow it to be of any avail. That the moon was shining, and the schooner might have been seen at a considerable distance. That the course of the steamer was between north-northeast and northeast.

The claimants in their answer admit the fact of the collision and the consequent loss of the schooner, and that it was a moonlight night; but say that it was cloudy in the western part of the horizon, and in consequence of heavy banks of snow clouds in that quarter, it was impossible to see vessels coming in that direction without lights, at any considerable distance; and a steamer, therefore, coming up the bay, could not make such regulations as to speed and course as to avoid collisions, that would have been practicable and proper under other and more favorable circumstances. They allege that the schooner did not carry a light, and was the only vessel seen without one, and in consequence of this deficiency, and the character of the night, the schooner was not visible, and could not be seen until the two vessels were within the short distance of three or four hundred yards.

In reference to the fact of the collision, they answer, that when the schooner was first seen from the steamer, the schooner was to the eastward, and proper action was had on board the steamer to direct her course to the westward; but when the course of the schooner in that direction was ascertained, the course of the steamer was changed, and the boat was stopped and backed; but from the proximity of the vessels at this time, it was impossible by any effort to avoid the collision. The steamer was running at the rate of fifteen miles an hour before this time. The District Court pronounced a decree of condemnation, which was affirmed in the Circuit Court, on appeal.

The evidence convinces the court that the schooner might have been distinctly seen from the steamer at a greater distance than a half mile.

It is shown that another vessel was sailing in the wake of the schooner, and was guided in her course by her, and that the schooner was distinctly visible to those who were on board that vessel at a greater distance.

It also satisfactorily appears that the schooner was in fact discovered by the lookout on board the steamer when the vessels were several hundred yards apart, and that, by careful management of the steamer, the collision might then have been avoided.

The captain of The Louisiana says: "That after passing the Rappahannock lightboat I saw a black object; it appeared to be heading about south-southwest down the bay; it was about two points or two points and a half to the east of us. I could not tell at that moment whether it was a vessel at anchor or under way, but directly discovered it was a vessel under way, and she kept right hard off to the westward. This vessel had no lights. I think the distance was from two hundred yards to two hundred and fifty. As soon as I saw her jib, I called to Mr. Marshall (pilot) to stop and back." Cross-examined, he says: "From the time I first saw the vessel until the time of the collision, was, I should suppose, two minutes, more or less. The vessel changed her course, and kept off hard to the westward. I saw her jib, which enabled me to judge that it was a vessel under way. The change took place immediately after I first saw the object. When I first saw it, it looked like a cloud. I could not tell if it was a vessel at anchor or under way. When I saw the jib, I first knew it was a vessel under way."

Notwithstanding the uncertainty in the mind of this officer, the vessel under his command continued on in her voyage with unabated speed. No order was given to arrest her progress till a collision with the schooner had become inevitable. This was a grave error, and was followed by disastrous consequences, for which the owners must render indemnity. In the case of The Birkenhead, 3 W. Rob., 75, the steamer was directed upon the supposition that a sailing vessel under way was at anchor, and proper precautions were taken under that hypothesis. The circumstances were such as might have occasioned a mistake. But the Judge of the Admiralty, with the advice of the Trinity Masters, condemned the steamer to compensate for the collision, saying "that she should not have prosecuted her voyage in any uncertainty, but should have eased or reversed her engines until the fact was ascertained."

The case of The James Watt, 2 W. Rob., 271, is similar in its circumstances to the one under consideration. The master testified, that when he discovered the sailing vessel, he ported his helm without stopping to ascertain her course. "In my apprehension," said the Judge, "the master of The James Watt would have acted, under the circumstances, with greater prudence and caution, if, upon first discovering the sailing vessel, instead of porting his helm, he had continued his course at slacked speed, by easing his engines till he was able to discover the course the sailing vessel was steering, and then acting according to circumstances. If he had pursued this course, it is apparent from the evidence, that, in the short space of about a minute after the sail was reported, he would have discovered her course, and could have adopted the measures that might altogether have prevented the collision."

The evidence shows that The George D. Fisher was making a southwest course, and was close-hauled upon the wind. That she did not vary her course after the steamer came in sight. That the steamer was first directed to the westward, and afterwards to the eastward, and then stopped and backed, and that these contrary movements were the result of the doubts of her officers as to the position or course of the schooner. If the order to ease the engines, or to stop, had been given in the first instance, the probability is that the catastrophe would have been avoided.

The decisions of this court have settled that this was the duty of the steamer under such circumstances. Peck v. Sanderson, 17 How., 178. It is contended on the part of the appellees that the schooner is responsible for failing to carry a light. In the case of The Osmanli, 7 Notes of Cases, 507, the learned Judge of the Admiralty says: "That no question has been more mooted and left more unsettled than this—whether it is the duty of a sailing vessel at night to show a light. Beyond all doubt, it has been determined there is no such general obligation; at the same time, there have been occasions on which, for the sake of avoiding a misfortune, which was in all human probability likely to occur, it became the duty of a vessel to show a light." In the present case, we have not been able to discover any fact that imposed the obligation upon the schooner to do so. The night was moonlight; and though the light was occasionally obscured, the evidence does not show that it was so, to a degree that rendered the navigation of the bay at all dangerous, if care, skill, and vigilance, had been employed upon the different vessels.

The court is of opinion that the schooner was discerned from the steamer in sufficient time, and that the latter might have avoided the collision by the exercise of proper care.

Decree affirmed.

Mr. Justice Daniel dissented for want of constitutional power, in courts of the United States, in admiralty.

v.

THE MINNESOTA AND NORTHWESTERN RAILROAD COMPANY.

(See S. C., 21 How., 82-85.)

Where cause was dismissed at former term for defect in return, motion to re-instate refused—final decision—writ of error functus officio.

Where a writ of error was returnable last term, and it appearing that there was no final judgment, the case was then dismissed for want of jurisdiction. A further transcript is now presented, which contains a final judgment.

Held, that the motion to annul the judgment of the last term, and re-instate the case, cannot be granted.

It was judicially acted on and decided, by this court. And when the term closed, that decision was final, so far as concerned the authority and jurisdiction of this court under that writ.

The writ of error was functus officio; and if the parties desire to bring the record of the case again before this court, it must be done by another writ of error.

Argued Dec. 17, 1858. Decided Dec. 28, 1858.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the Territory of Minnesota.

On the motion of Mr. Reverdy Johnson, of counsel for the defendant in error, to revoke the mandate and annul the judgment of dismissal entered in this case, &c.

The case is stated by the court.

No counsel appeared for plaintiff in error.

Mr. Reverdy Johnson, for defendant in error.

Mr. Chief Justice Taney delivered the opinion of the court:

This case was brought up, by a writ of error, directed to the Judges of the Supreme Court of the Territory of Minnesota, the writ being returnable to the last term of this court. The case was docketed and called for trial according to the rules of the court; but upon inspection of the transcript, it appeared that there was no final judgment in the court below, and the case was, therefore, dismissed for want of jurisdiction.

At a subsequent day in that term, a motion was made by the plaintiff in error for a certiorari, upon affidavits filed, suggesting that that there had been a final judgment in the Territorial Court, although it had not been correctly entered on the record. But the court were of opinion that the affidavits were not sufficient to support the motion, and refused the certiorari.

A motion has been made at the present term to annul the order of dismissal made at the last term, and to place the suit on the calendar in the same order in which it would have stood if it had not been dismissed, but continued over to the present term. And in support of this motion, a transcript from the Territorial Court has again been presented; and this transcript contains a final judgment of the Supreme Court of the Territory. It is certified by the Clerk of the District Court of the United States, to whose custody the record and proceedings in this case have been transferred pursuant to an Act of Congress; and this transcript, among other things, certifies that an amended order of the Supreme Court of the Territory, reversing the judgment of the inferior Territorial Court, and ordering a judgment for defendants, and an amended judgment of the said court to the same effect was on file in his office, transferred with the other proceedings in the case from the Supreme Territorial Court.

But we think the motion to annul the judgment of the last term, and re-instate the case, cannot be granted. The suit is a common law action for a trespass on real property, and the judgment of the court below can be brought here for revision by writ of error only. That writ was issued by the plaintiff in error, returnable to the last term of this court; and it brought the transcript before us at that term. It was judicially acted on, and decided by this court. And when the term closed, that decision was final, so far as concerned the authority and jurisdiction of this court under that writ. The writ was functus officio; and if the parties desire to bring the record of the case again before this court, it must be done by another writ of error. The former writ is not returnable to the present term, and cannot, therefore, according to the principles which govern this common-law writ, bring the record before us.

The case of The Palmyra, 12 Wheat., 1, has been referred to, where a motion similar to the present was granted by the court. And if that had been a case at common law, we might have felt ourselves bound to follow it, as establishing the law of this court. But it was a case in admiralty, where the power and jurisdiction of an appellate court is much wider upon appeal, than in a case at common law. For, in an admiralty case, you may in this court amend the pleadings, and take new evidence, so as in effect to make it a different case from that decided by the court below. And the court might well, therefore, deal with the judgment and appeal of the inferior tribunal in the same spirit. But the powers which an appellate court may lawfully exercise in an admiralty proceeding, are altogether inadmissible in a common law suit.

The case in 3 Pet., 431, relates to cases and questions of a different character from the one before us. In that case the judgment of the court at the preceding term was amended. But the amendment was made to correct a clerical error in this court, and make the judgment conform to that which the court intended to pronounce. But this is not a motion to amend, but to reverse and annul the judgment of the last term, which was passed upon full consideration, with the case regularly and legally before us, as brought up by the writ of error.

We refer to these two cases because they have been relied on in support of the motion. But, in the judgment of the court, they stand on very different principles; and the motion, for the reasons above stated, must be overruled.

ROBERT FORSYTH.

(See S. C., 21 How., 85–88.)

Guild v. Frontin and Suydam v. Williamson affirmed—agreement cannot authorize mode of review—state laws cannot authorize U. S. Court to depart from rules prescribed by Congress.

This case is the same in priciple as that of Guild v. Frontin, 59 U. S., p. 290, affirmed in Suydam v. Williamson, 61 U. S., p. 978.

The agreement of parties cannot authorize this court to revise a judgment of an inferior court in any other mode than that which the law prescribes.

Nor can the laws of a State, regulating the proceedings of its own courts, authorize a district or circuit court sitting in the State to depart from the modes of proceedings and rules prescribed by the Act of Congress.

Submitted Dec. 24, 1858. Decided Dec. 28, 1858.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois.

This was an action of ejectment brought in the court below, by the defendant in error, to recover a part of Peoria French claim No. 7; the same that was before this court in the case of Bryan v. Forsyth, 60 U. S. (19 How.), 334.

On the final trial below, the case was submitted to the court without a jury, and the court found for the plaintiff. Thereupon the defendants sued out this writ of error.

A further statement of the case appears in opinion of the court.

Mr. C. Ballance, for appellants:

The errors assigned are:

1. The court erred in refusing to dismiss the cause for want of a bond for costs, before the commencement of this suit.

2. It was error to try the cause without a jury.

3. It was error to refuse a new trial at common law.

4. The court attached unjust and unreasonable conditions to the order setting aside the first judgment.

5. The court erred in refusing to grant a new trial, nunc pro tunc, upon the agreement and disclaimer tendered by defendants below.

NOTE.—Jurisdiction of federal courts, not given by consent. See note to Gov. of Georgia v. African Slaves, 26 U. S. (1 Pet.), 110.

6. The court erred in receiving improper evidence.

7. The court erred in ruling out proper evidence offered by defendants below.

All the above errors, I submit, are well assigned, and either of them is sufficient to reverse the judgment of the court below; but I deem it unnecessary to discuss those various points, or introduce authorities to sustain them, because the facts of the case show clearly that, according to the doctrine established in the case of Bryan v. Forsyth, 19 How., 334, the plaintiff was completely barred by the Illinois Statute of Limitations, and because, also, the case was tried by the court without a jury, which, according to the decision in Graham v. Bayne, 18 How., 60, was error.

Mr. Archibald Williams, for defendant in error.

Mr. Chief Justice Taney delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a writ of error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois.

An action of ejectment brought by the defendants in error against the plaintiff, for a certain parcel of land described in the declaration, and upon the trial the verdict and judgment were for the plaintiff; a motion was afterwards made to set aside the judgment and for a new trial; and the judgment was, accordingly, set aside and a new trial granted upon the terms mentioned in the transcript. In the proceedings upon this new trial, the parties agreed to waive a trial by jury, and that both matters of law and of fact should be submitted to the decision of the court. The case was proceeded in according to this agreement, and the court, as the record states, found the issue in favor of the plaintiff (Forsyth), and entered judgment accordingly; and to this decision, and to all the rulings and decisions of the court in the previous stages of the cause, the defendants (Kelsey and Hotchkiss) excepted and sued out a writ of error to bring the case before this court.

It will be seen from this statement, that in a common law action of ejectment the case was submitted to the court upon the evidence, without the intervention of a jury, leaving it to the court to decide the fact, as well as the law, upon the evidence and admissions before it. The case, therefore, is the same in principle with that of Guild et al. v. Frontin, 18 How., 135. And the doctrine in that case was reaffirmed in Suydam v. Williamson, 20 How., 428, and the grounds upon which it rests fully set forth. It is unnecessary to repeat here what was stated in these two decisions. It is sufficient to say that the agreement of parties cannot authorize this court to revise a judgment of an inferior court in any other mode of proceeding than that which the law prescribes, nor can the laws of a State, regulating the proceedings of its own courts, authorize a district or circuit court sitting in the State, to depart from the modes of proceeding and rules prescribed by the Acts of Congress.

The judgment of the Circuit Court must, therefore, be affirmed.

THE COMMONWEALTH OF PENNSYLVANIA, Plff. in Er.,

v.

WILLIAM RAVENEL, Executor of ELIZA KOHNE, Deceased.

(See S. C., 21 How., 103-112.)

Domicil—question of law and fact—acts and declarations, when proof of.

The question of domicil is one of mixed law and fact.

It is for the court to instruct the jury what constitutes a domicil, and for the jury to apply the law governing it, to the facts as found by them.

The mere speaking of a place as a home, without any act showing an intention to return to it, would amount to nothing.

But if acts and the language concur, and are continued for many years, they are conclusive of the fact.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania.

This action was brought in the court below, by the plaintiff in error, against the defendant in error, executor of the late Mrs. Kohne, to recover the sum of $5,820.32, called a collateral inheritance tax, assessed upon the estate of the testatrix.

Mr. Kohne, the husband of Mrs. Eliza Kohne, died in Philadelphia on the 26th of May, 1839, and was buried there. At the time of his death, he owned valuable real and personal estate in Philadelphia City and County, and also in Charleston, S. C. Among the Philadelphia property was a large and elegant mansion house in Chestnut Street. Mr. Kohne, at the time of his death, also owned a mansion in Charleston, S. C., in which he and his wife resided during the winter. Both mansions were furnished with servants, furniture, plate, &c. Mr. Kohne also owned, at the time of his death, a valuable country seat, with thirty acres of land attached, close to the City of Philadelphia, in Turner's Lane, and now within the corporate limits of that city, which was purchased by him in 1807, about the time of his marriage, and during his lifetime was sometimes occupied by Mr. and Mrs. Kohne, and by Mrs. K., after his death.

Mr. Kohne devised his real estate, wherever situate, to his wife for life (with some exceptions in Charleston, S. C.) Her life interest extended to the mansions referred to in Philadelphia and Charleston, and to the Turner's Lane property in Philadelphia.

She did not visit Charleston the winter after her husband's death, but spent a part of it in Savannah. After that winter, however, she resumed the routine which had existed some years prior to her husband's death; that is, of spending from May to October in Philadelphia, and from November to May in Charleston.

Mrs. Kohne continued to reside alternately in Charleston and Philadelphia, according to the season of the year, until April 30, 1850, when she left Charleston and came to Philadelphia, where she remained until her death, March 16, 1852, at the advanced age of eighty-five years and upwards. She was born in Charleston, and was married there to Mr.

Kohne, then a domiciled merchant of that city.

The trial below resulted in a verdict and judgment in favor of the defendant; whereupon the plaintiff sued out this writ of error.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Samuel Hood and R. K. Scott, for plaintiff in error:

For the purpose of this argument, the exceptions to the charge of the court may be stated in this form, viz.: 1st. That the court charged the jury as to part only of the evidence, viz.: that of the defendant; 2d. That the court charged the jury as to facts of which there was no evidence; 3d. That, in effect, the court took from the jury the sole material fact in the cause, viz.: the domicil of Mrs. Eliza Kohne at the time of her death.

As to the first point, that the court charged the jury as to part only of the evidence, viz.: that of the defendant. The only question for the jury was, whether Mrs. Eliza Kohne, at the time of her death in March, 1852, was or was not domiciled in Pennsylvania. The charge of the court, after stating that, for the purposes of this case, the fact that Frederick Kohne, at the time of his death, was domiciled in Pennsylvania, is assumed, and that Mrs. Kohne's domicil was necessarily his, while the marriage existed; adds that after his death she was free to choose her own domicil. The charge then recites the defendant's evidence as to Mrs. Kohne's domicil, but no reference whatever is made in the charge to the evidence adduced by the plaintiff, nor to any part of the defendant's testimony, favorable to the plaintiff, on the question of Mrs. Kohne's domicil.

In the case of Smith v. Condry, 1 How., 35. the S. C. of the U. S., Chief Justice Taney, in delivering the opinion of the court, reversed the Circuit Court of the District of Columbia, on the ground that the court instructed the jury on a part of the evidence only, leaving out of view other portions of it which the jury were bound to consider in forming their verdict. It should be left to the jury upon the whole evidence, where there is evidence of fault, to find whether it existed. In Greenleaf v. Birth, 9 Pet., 292, 298. 299, the decision of the Circuit Court of the District of Columbia was reversed on similar grounds.

As to the second point, that the court charged the jury as to the facts of which there was no evidence:

"The fact (says the charge) that she submitted to illegal exactions of tax gatherers here, rather than be annoyed with litigation, should not be suffered to weigh against the acts and declarations of twenty years of her life. Tax gatherers may impose on old ladies, but they cannot change their domicil for them against their will; nor is it any reason for an illegal exaction against the estate of the deceased, that the tax gatherers of Pennsylvania have heretofore wronged her with impunity."

Here is the assumption of facts without any evidence on which to base them.

In Bradley v. Grosh, 8 Pa. St., 49, it was held error to submit a fact or question to the jury, of which there is no evidence.

See, also, Stine v. Sherk, 1 W. & S., 195; Irwin v. Shoemaker, 8 W. & S., 76; Jones v. Wood, 16 Pa., 25. 42; Snyder v. Wilt, 15 Pa., 59; Roach v. Hulings, 16 Pet., 319.

As to the third point, that in effect the court took from the jury the sole material fact in the cause, viz.: the domicil of Mrs. Eliza Kohne at the time of her death.

See Georgia v. Brailsford, 3 Dall., 4; Newbold v. Wright, 4 Rawle, 195; Brownfield v. Brownfield, 12 Pa., 136; Baker v. Lewis, 4 Rawle, 356; Sampson v. Sampson, 4 S. & R., 329; Tracy v. Swartwout, 10 Pet., 96.

Mr. B. Gerhard, for defendant in error:

Domicil is always a mixed question of law and fact, and where a court charges a jury upon such a point, a discussion of the testimony must be intimately intermixed with the discussion of the law. In the present case, His Honor, who tried the cause, told the jury at the commencement of his charge, that it was "for the jury to apply the principles of law laid down by the court to the facts as found by them," and again, that "the court had no right to dictate to them on the facts which they were bound to find on their own responsibility." His Honor next proceeded to assume, as against the defendant, the fact of Mr. Kohne's domicil at the time of his death, and then indicating to the jury what facts they must find, if they gave a verdict for the plaintiff, he declared that as a matter of law, if the jury believed certain uncontradicted testimony, their verdict should be for the defendant; concluding by the expression of a hope previously entertained that the plaintiff would have abandoned the claim, after hearing the evidence for the defendant, as the contest must be fruitless, if the jury believed that testimony. Now, in all this there seems to me to have been a scrupulous care observed by the judge, in a case where there was no conflict of testimony, to avoid even the appearance of a formal interference with the constitutional province of the jury.

Domicil "is the conclusion of law on an extended view of facts and circumstances."

Rush, President, J., Guier v. O'Daniel, 1 Binn., 349, note a, cited in Phillim. Dom., App., XI., p. 209. Bempde v. Johnstone; Graham v. Johnstone, 3 Ves., 201.

"The question of domicil prima facie is much more a question of fact than of law."

Domicil is defined in Guier v. O'Daniel, 1 Binn., 349, as "a residence at a particular place, accompanied with positive or presumptive proof of continuing it an unlimited time." This definition Judge Grier, in his charge to the jury in White v. Brown, 1 Wall., Jr., 262, says, "combines, it is probable, accuracy with brevity, beyond any other." He also says "that no one word is more nearly synonymous with the word 'domicil', than our word 'home.'" Phillimore, in his Treatise on the Law of Domicil, p. 25, reduces the kinds of domicil to three: 1. The Domicil of Origin or Birth. 2. The Domicil by Operation of Law. 3. The Domicil of Choice, where one is abandoned and another acquired. One of these three kinds each person must have.

Phillim., p. 21; Crawford v. Wilson, 4 Barb., 504; Bartlett v. New York, 5 Sandf., 44; Abington v. N. Bridgewater, 23 Pick., 178; Rue High, Appellant, 2 Doug. (Mich.), 523.

A person may acquire a second place of residence, and occupy it alternately with the first. This makes no change in his domicil.

Bartlett v. New York, 5 Sand., 44; Phillim. Dom., 112, citing the case of Munroe v. Munroe, 7 C. & F., 842.

"The having a house and an establishment in London, is perfectly consistent with a domicil in Scotland." This fact existed in Somerville v. Somerville, 5 Ves., 750, and in Warrender v. Warrender, 9 Bligh, N. R., 102, 103; see, also, Harvard College v. Gore, 5 Pick., 370.

The question in the present case is one of the third kind of domicil—that of choice. "Every person sui juris, is at liberty to choose his domicil, and to change it according to his inclination."

Phillim., 98.

The question is not whether the facts connected with Mrs. Kohne's residence in Philadelphia, for a portion of the year and dying there, if viewed apart from the rest of the evidence, would constitute Philadelphia her domicil; but whether her whole course of life will support her expressed intention of making Charleston her domicil. In Thorndike v. The City of Boston, 1 Metc., 246, Ch., J. Shaw say: "It may often occur that the evidence of facts tending to establish the domicil in one place, would be entirely conclusive, were it not for the existence of facts and circumstances of a still more conclusive and decisive character which fix it, beyond question, in another."

It will be remembered that Mrs. Kohne's domicil of origin was in Charleston, and fewer circumstances are requisite to show that the domicil of origin has reverted, than that a new domicil has been acquired.

Phillim. Dom., 104; White v. Brown, 1 Wall., Jr., 265; charge of Grier, Justice.

"Where a party has two residences at different seasons of the year, that will be esteemed his domicil which he himself selects, or describes, or deems to be his home."

Hairston v. Hairston, 27 Miss., 704; Story Confl. of Laws, sec. 47; Shelton v. Tiffin, 6 How., 163; Ennis v. Smith, 14 How., 400.

The fact of Mrs. Kohne's dying in Philadelphia, affords no presumption whatever of her domicil being in that city.

Harvard College v. Gore, 5 Pick., 375.

The judge below did not take from the jury the consideration of the question as to Mrs. Kohne's domicil at the time of her death; but, on the contrary, treated it, as it clearly is, as a mixed question of law and fact; and carefully and scrupulously, though the facts were undisputed, instructed the jury that they must pass upon the evidence of those facts, but if they believed it, that it established Mrs. Kohne's domicil, at the time of her death, to have been Charleston.

In conclusion, it is submitted that the decisions fully sustain the views of the defendant in error.

The court may give their opinion on matters of fact to the jury, being careful to distinguish between such opinions and those on matters of law; the former being entitled to such influence only as the jury may think proper, the latter being conclusive.

Games v. Stiles, 14 Pet., 322, Tracy v. Swartwout, 10 Pet., 80.

"A case will not be reversed on account of an expression of opinion by the court, as to which of certain witnesses are most entitled to credit."

Porter v. Seiler, 23 Pa., 424.

Mr. Justice Nelson delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a writ of error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania.

The action was brought by the State of Pennsylvania against the defendant, executor of the late Mrs. Kohne, to recover the sum of $5,820 23, called a collateral inheritance tax, assessed upon the personal estate of the testatrix. By the law of Pennsylvania, where the property of the deceased passes to his or her collateral heirs, or to strangers, either by the law concerning intestate estates, or by will, it is made subject to a specific taxation for the benefit of the State. This tax is five per centum on the clear value of the estate. Brightly v. Purdon, p. 138; Act 22d April, 1846, sec. 14. And according to the construction of these Acts imposing the tax, it is held, if a decedent be domiciled in the State at the time of his or her death, stocks of other States, or of corporations of other States, and debts due in other States, in the hands of the executors or administrators are liable to this tax. Short, estate of, 4 Harr. (16 Pa. St.), 63; Halroyd v. Humphrey, 18 How., 69.

But if the domicil of the deceased be not in Pennsylvania, then the estate is not subject to the tax.

Mrs. Kohne died in the City of Philadelphia in March, 1852, and the question in the court below was, whether or not she was domiciled in Pennsylvania at the time of her death, or in the State of South Carolina. The jury, under the charge of the court, found a verdict for the defendant.

The case is before us on four exceptions taken to the charge of the court.

The first three it is not material to notice further than to say, that the first two are founded upon a misapprehension of the instructions given to the jury; and the third is not maintainable, as the instruction in the connection in which it is found is unobjectionable.

The fourth exception is, that the court, in the charge, took the fact of domicil from the jury.

This exception, we think, is founded in a misapprehension of the instructions given. The court, after stating to the jury that the question of domicil was one of mixed law and fact, observed, that it was for the court to instruct them what constituted a domicil, and for the jury to apply the principles of law governing it to the facts as found by them; that the jury had no right to disregard the law as laid down by the court, and the court had no right to dictate to them as respected the facts, which they must find on their own responsibility. The court then stated to the jury the principles of law applicable to the question of domicil, to which no exception has been taken. Also, that as it had been admitted Mr. Kohne, the husband, who died in Philadelphia in 1829, had his domicil in Pennsylvania at the time of his death, the domicil of the wife must be taken as in that State at the time, and submitted the question whether or not she had since changed it to the State of South Carolina; and then, after referring to the leading facts given in evidence, and relied on to establish a change of domicil, observed, that if the jury believed this evidence, the domicil of Mrs. Kohne was in South Carolina.

The court further say, that the mere speaking of a place as a home, without any act showing an intention to return to it, would amount to nothing. But if acts and the language concur, as proved by the witnesses in the case, it would be a denial to the deceased of the right to choose her own domicil, not to allow her acts and declarations, continued for many years, to be conclusive of the fact.

We perceive nothing in the instructions of the court, or in the view of the case as presented to the jury, by which the question of domicil, so far as it depended upon the facts, was taken from the jury. The evidence was very strong in support of a change of domicil by Mrs. Kohne after the death of her husband, and, if believed by the jury, it was not too much to say, as matter of law, that they should find for the defendant.

The judgment of the court below is affirmed.

Mr. Justice Daniel, dissenting:

I cannot concur in the opinion of the court in this case.

Had I been acting as a juror upon the trial of this cause, it is more than probable that the conclusion formed by the jury, upon the evidence disclosed by the record, is identical with that at which I should have arrived. And, further, had it been within the legitimate province of the court, in the attitude of the case before it, to declare what ought to be the deductions from facts either established in evidence, or presumed or supposed by the court to have been established, or even from facts admitted by the parties on the trial, then exception to the charge of the court in this case could not properly be taken. The objection to the charge, and a fatal objection to my mind, arises from the principle that the court had no authority to pass upon or to give any opinion in relation to facts, either established by testimony or admitted or presumed, as to what those facts amounted to, or as to the correctness or absurdity of any deduction which the jury might draw from them. The power of the court was limited absolutely to the legality or relevancy of the testimony. The weight or effect of the testimony, or the deductions to be drawn from it, were peculiarly and exclusively within the province of the jury; and the court had no power to inform them, or intimate that evidence, either exhibited in reality or presumed, should be construed in any particular way, or to say to them a priori that an interpretation different from that of the court, as to the weight of evidence, would be absurd. Should the conclusion of the jury upon the weight of evidence be never so absurd, still it is the peculiar province of the jury to weigh that evidence, and to draw their own independent inferences from it; and the only legitimate corrective is to be found in the award of a new trial, or by a case agreed, or a demurrer to evidence. If the court can a priori direct the jury what the evidence, either made out in proof or hypothetically stated, really amounts to, the trial by jury becomes a cumbersome formality, and had as well, nay, had better be dispensed with, inasmuch as in the solemn administration of justice there should be as little that is useless, burdensome, or pretended, as possible. To show the character of that portion of the charge of the court regarded as exceptionable, it is here inserted, as follows, viz.:

"If the jury find, that after his death (the death of the husband) she (Mrs. Kohne) returned to her former domicil in Charleston, took possession of the house and servants devised to her, lived in that house six or seven months of every year, calling it her home, spending only a few weeks in the spring and fall in her house here, and the remainder of the summer at watering places; coming north in the summer for the sake of her health, always intending to return to her house in Charleston; that she was hindered returning the last time from sickness; if she consulted counsel how she might avoid giving any pretense to the tax gatherers of Pennsylvania to treat her as domiciled here; if she carefully denied at all times her citizenship in Philadelphia, even to erasing it from printed lists of her church donations, as the assertion of a falsehood; if she refused to have some of her furniture removed here, for fear such a fact would be seized upon, after her death, for the purpose of asserting her domicil here; if she called herself, in her will, 'of Charleston;' if, when absent from that place, she always spoke of returning to it as her home, and did return to it as such, till hindered by sickness—if the jury believed this evidence of defendant's witnesses, testimony which has not been contradicted or denied, it would be absurd to say her domicil was not where she asserted it to be, to wit: in the City of Charleston."

Regarding this portion of the charge as tending to confound the powers of the court and the jury, I think that the judgment of the Circuit Court should be reversed, and the case remanded for a new trial.

BENJAMIN FORD, Plff. in Er.,

v.

JOHN S. AND HERMAN WILLIAMS.

(See S. C., 21 How., 287-290.)

Principal, not liable for agent's dealings on his own credit—when liable, if agency is undisclosed—liable, though not named in contract—may show agent was acting for him—this proof does not contradict the writing—but agent cannot thus contradict the writing.

NOTE.—Right and liability of undisclosed principal on contract of agent, made in agent's name. Rule as to negotiable instruments.

The principal is ordinarily entitled to the same remedies against third persons in respect to acts and contracts of an agent as if they were made or done with him personally. Story on Agency, sec. 420; Brewster v. Saul, 8 La., 296; 2 Stark., 443; Taintor v. Prendergast, 3 Hill, 72; Bassett v. Lederer, 1 Hun, 274; 3 T. & C., 671; Ilsley v. Merriam, 7 Cush., 242; Barry v. Page, 10 Gray, 398; Small v. Atwood, 1 Younge, 407, 452; Paley, Ag., 323.

The rule is the same though at the time of entering into the contract, the principal is unknown to the party contracting and is undisclosed by the

If a party prefers to deal with the agent personally on his own credit, he will not be allowed afterwards to charge the principal.

But when he deals with the agent, without any disclosure of the fact of his agency, he may elect to treat the after-discovered principal as the person with whom he contracted.

The contract of the agent is the contract of the principal, and he may sue or be sued thereon, though not named therein.

Notwithstanding the rule of law that an agreement reduced to writing may not be contradicted or varied by parol, it is well settled that the principal may show that the agent who made the contract in his own name was acting for him.

This proof does not contradict the writing; it only explains the transaction.

But the agent who binds himself will not be allowed to contradict the writing by proving that he was contracting only as agent, while the same evidence will be admitted to charge the principal.

Argued Dec. 15, 1858. Decided Dec. 28, 1858.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Maryland.

This was an action of assumpsit brought in the court below, by the plaintiff in error, to recover damages on a certain contract signed by the defendants.

The only question to be reviewed is, whether assuming the contract in question to have been made for the benefit of the plaintiff, without any disclosure to the defendants as to his interest, he can maintain a suit in his own name.

Messrs. George William Brown and F. W. Brune, Jr., for plaintiff in error:

The plaintiff in error will contend that the action was properly brought by him in his own name, and that the decision of the Circuit Court should be reversed; and in support of this proposition, he relies upon the following authorities:

N. J. Steam Nav. Co. v. Merchants' Bank, 6 How., 381; Salmon Mfg. Co. v. Goddard, 14 How., 455; Story on Agency, sec. 161; Sims v. Bond, 5 B. & Ad., 393; Higgins v. Senior, 8 Mees & W., 834; Beckham v. Drake, 9 Mees. & W., 78; 11 Mees. & W., 315; Bank v. Lyman, 20 Vt., 678; Williams v. Bacon, 2 Gray, 387; Bateman v. Phillips, 15 East., 272; Elkins v. B. & M. R. R. Co., 19 N. H., 342; Huntington v. Knox, 7 Cush., 374.

Mr. J. Nelson, for defendants in error:

The sole question to be reviewed is, whether, assuming the contract to have been made for the benefit of the plaintiff without any disclosure, to the defendants, of his interest, he was competent to maintain a suit in his own name.

That the court below committed no error in holding that he could not, the defendant in error will endeavor to maintain by reference to the following authorities:

U. S. v. Parmele, 1 Payne, 252; Newcomb v. Clark, 1 Denn., 227; West Boylston Mfg. Co. v. Searle, 15 Pick., 225; 1 Pars. Cont., 48, note; 2 Bouvier's Inst., 80.

Mr. Justice Grier delivered the opinion of the court:

The single question presented for our decision in this case is, whether the principal can maintain an action on a written contract made by his agent in his own name, without disclosing the name of the principal.

It is not necessary to the validity of a contract, under the Statute of Frauds, that the writing disclose the principal. In the brief memoranda of these contracts usually made by brokers and factors, it is seldom done. If a party is informed that the person with whom he is dealing is merely the agent for another, and prefers to deal with the agent personally on his own credit, he will not be allowed after-agent and the party deals with the agent supposing him to be the sole principal. See authorities last cited and Williams v. Winchester, 19 Mart., 22; Leverick v. Meigs, 1 Cow., 645, 663-665; Hicks v. Whitmore, 12 Wend., 548; Walter v. Ross, 2 Wash., 283; Grojan v. Wade, 2 Stark., 443; Graham v. Duckwall, 8 Bush., 12; Foster v. Smith, 2 Coldw., 744; Woodruff v. McGehee, 30 Ga., 158; Culver v. Bigelow, 43 Vt., 249.

While the principal is entitled to the advantages or benefits to be derived from contracts made on his behalf by his agent, he also takes all the burdens and disadvantages connected with the contract. And if the contract of the agent was obtained by his fraud, misrepresentation, or warranty, the principal will be affected by the consequences, and the other party may interpose any defense that would be available if the principal had done precisely what was done by his agent. Elwell v. Chamberlain, 31 N. Y., 611; Veazie v. Williams, 49 U. S. (8 How.), 134, 157.

If the name of the principal is not disclosed, and the agent enters into the contract as though made for himself, the principal, if he assumes the right to enforce the contract, must take it subject to all the equities which could be enforced against the agent. Taintor v. Prendergast, 3 Hill, 72; Leeds v. Marine Ins. Co., 19 U. S. (6 Wheat.), 565; Gibson v. Winter, 5 B. & Ad., 96; Traub v. Milliken, 57 Me., 63; George v. Clagett, 7 Term, 359; 3 Bos. & P., 490; 2 Caines, 296; Coates v. Lewes, 1 Camp., 444; Gibson v. Winter, 5 Barn. & Ad., 96.

When the agent contracts for carriage of goods without disclosing principal, latter may recover if goods are lost. 12 Minn., 412.

If the agent is the only known or supposed principal the person dealing with him will be entitled to the same right of set-off as if the agent were the true and only principal. Coates v. Lewes, 1 Camp., 444; Stracey v. Deey, 7 Term, 361, n.; Carr v. Hinchliff, 4 Barn. & Cress., 547; Taylor v. Kymer, 3 Barn. & Ad., 320; Baring v. Corrie, 2 Barn. & Ad., 137; Gibson v. Winter, 5 Barn. & Ad., 96; Young v. White, 7 Beav., 506.

Whatever may have been the form of the contract, unless under seal; and even in that case, if it has been ratified by the plaintiff, the plaintiff may show even by oral evidence that a party who executed it, although apparently as the principal, did so as the agent of plaintiff; and upon such evidence the plaintiff may recover notwithstanding the Statute of Frauds applies to the contract and requires it to be in writing. Brigg v. Partridge, 64 N. Y., 357; Hubbert v. Borden, 6 Whart., 79; Nash v. Tourne, 72 U. S. (5 Wall., 703; Salmon Falls, &c., Co. v. Goddard, 55 U. S. (14 How.), 446; Eastern R. R. Co. v. Benedict, 5 Gray 561; Alexander v. Moore, 19 Mo., 143; Benj. on S., secs. 210, 219, n.

A principal may be charged upon a written parol executory contract entered into by an agent in his own name, within his authority, although the name of the principal does not appear in the instrument, and was not disclosed, and the party dealing with the agent supposed he was acting for himself; and this doctrine obtains as well in respect to contracts which are required to be in writing, as to those where a writing is not essential to their validity. Higgins v. Senior, 8 M. & W., 834; Trueman v. Loder, 11 A. & E., 594; Dykers v. Townsend, 24 N. Y., 61; Coleman v. First Nat. B'k of Elmira, 53 N. Y., 393; Huntington v. Knox, 7 Cush., 371; Eastern R. R. Co. v. Benedict, 5 Gray, 566; Hubbert v. Borden, 6 Whart., 91; Browning v. Provincial Ins. Co., 5 L. R. (P. C.), 263; Calder v. Dobell, 6 L. R. (C. P.), 486; Story on Agency, sec. 148, 160.

Persons dealing with negotiable instruments are presumed to take them on the credit of the parties whose names appear upon them; and a person not a party cannot be charged upon proof that the ostensible party signed or indorsed as his agent. Barker v. Mech's Ins. Co., 3 Wend., 94; Pentz v. Stanton, 10 Wend., 271; DeWitt v. Walton, 9 N. Y., 571; Stackpole v. Arnold, 11 Mass., 27; Peckham v. Drake, 9 M. & W., 79; Eastern R. R. Co. v. Benedict, 5 Gray, 566.

wards to charge the principal; but when he deals with the agent, without any disclosure of the fact of his agency, he may elect to treat the after discovered principal as the person with whom he contracted.

The contract of the agent is the contract of the principal, and he may sue or be sued thereon, though not named therein; and notwithstanding the rule of law that an agreement reduced to writing may not be contradicted or varied by parol, it is well settled that the principal may show that the agent who made the contract in his own name was acting for him. This proof does not contradict the writing; it only explains the transaction. But the agent, who binds himself, will not be allowed to contradict the writing by proving that he was contracting only as agent, while the same evidence will be admited to charge the principal. "Such evidence (says Baron Parke) does not deny that the contract binds those whom on its face it puports to bind; but shows that it also binds another, by reason that the act of the agent is the act of the principal." See Higgins v. Senior, 8 Mees. & Wels., 843.

The array of cases and treatises cited by the plaintiff's counsel shows conclusively that this question is settled, not only by the courts of England and many of the States, but by this court. See New Jersey Steam Nav. Co. v. Merchants' Bank, 6 How., 381, et cas. ib. cit.

The judgment of the court below, is therefore, reversed, and a venire de novo awarded.

THE COVINGTON DRAWBRIDGE COMPANY, AND RICHARD M. NEBEKER, Appts., v. ALEXANDER O. SHEPHERD ET AL.

(See S. C., 21 How., 112-126.)

Court may appoint receiver of tolls and incomes of a bridge, to pay judgments against bridge company, after sale on execution.

Writs of fi. fa. were levied on the Covington bridge and the Marshal sold the rents and profits of the same for the term of one year, but the keeper of the bridge refused to surrender possession. Those interested filed their bill, praying that the court should appoint a receiver to take possession, and receive the tolls and incomes of the bridge, and apply them to discharge the judgments.

Held, that the court below had power to cause possession to be taken of the bridge; to appoint a receiver to collect tolls, and pay them into court, to discharge such judgments.

The bill alleges that "the Covington Drawbridge Company, of Covington, is a corporation and citizen of the State of Indiana;" held, that the averment of citizenship was sufficient.

Submitted, Dec. 14, 1858. Decided Dec. 29, 1858.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Indiana.

The history of the case and a statement of the facts appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. O. H. Smith, for appellants:

1. The averment in the bill of citizenship, is not sufficient to give jurisdiction to the court, especially as the averment in the declarations at law upon which the bill is founded and the equity claimed, do not give jurisdiction to the court.

The averment in the declarations as to citizenship of the defendants, is as follows:

The plaintiffs, citizens of Ohio, complain against the "Covington Drawbridge Company, citizens of the State of Indiana."

This averment of citizenship of the Corporation is insufficient to bring the case within the jurisdiction of the court, as decided by this court in the case of The La Fayette Ins. Co. v. French, 18 How., 404.

2. The judgment of law being rendered by the same court between the same parties, and the court having no jurisdiction owing to the defect of citizenship as shown by the declarations, should not have been admitted in evidence in support of the bill between these parties, who were bound to take notice of the defect of jurisdiction, however the law may be if offered collaterally between other parties.

3. The remedy at law is ample, and a court of chancery will not take jurisdiction.

Coe v. Turner, 5 Conn., 86: Wiswall v. Hall, 3 Paige, 313; Rees v. Parish, 1 McCord, Ch., 59; Bird v. Holabard, 2 Root, 35; Wolcott v. Sullivan, 6 Paige, 117; Baker v. Biddle, Bald., 394.

4. But as the further question may arise, and be deemed by the court important to be decided, although I cannot so consider it in this case, where the property levied upon is amply sufficient; that is, whether the franchise can be levied upon with the bridge, and the whole property appraised and sold upon the execution at law. I maintain the affirmative of this question, which, I admit, is one of much importance to the credit of corporation securities, as well as to the rights of their creditors. The question is, substantially, whether the general execution laws of the State of Indiana shall be applied in all cases between debtor and creditor, on judgments at law, including corporations, new cases as they arise, as well as old; or shall an exception, not in the law, exempting from execution certain property of corporations, be made by the court.

All corporations are said to have a franchise, but the ordinary rights of corporations are not parts of the eminent domain. The privilege to have a common name, and common seal, a perpetual succession, and by such common name to sue, to contract, to hold real estate, and to sell the same, or to make by-laws for the government of the members. These privileges are no part of the eminent domain, but only extensions to individuals collectively, of rights appertaining of common right to each.

Mr. Justice Woodbury, in 6 How., 539, 540; West River Bridge v. Dix, says: "The laws of the land are virtually a part and condition of the grant itself, as much as if inserted in it totidem verbis."

Towne v. Smith, 1 Wood. & M., 134; 1 How., 819; 2 How., 608, 617; 3 Story, Const., 1377, 8.

It is on this principle that the exercise of the eminent domain over franchises has been sustained; otherwise such exercise would be a breach of the contract implied in grant of the franchise, and a violation of the Constitution of the United States.

West River Bridge Co. v. Dix, 6 How., 507; Enfield Toll Br. Co. v. Hart. & N. H. R., 17 Conn., 40; S. C., 2 Amer. R. R. Cases, 69; S.

C., 95; Beekman v. Sar. & Schen. R. R. Co., 3 Paige, 45.

In Providence Bank v. Billings, 4 Pet., 514, it is said by Ch. J. Marshall: "The great object of an incorporation is, to bestow the character and properties of individuality on a collected and changing body of men. Any privilege which may exempt it from the burdens common to individuals, do not flow necessarily from the charter, but must be expressed in it, or they do not exist." In other words, corporations, unless expressly exempted, are subject to all the burdens imposed by the laws of the land on individuals. The rule is not to be confined to cases within the eminent domain, or to the taxing powers. It applies to all cases, to which, in the opinion of the legislative power, its application is necessary for the public good. A franchise may or may not be a portion of the eminent domain. But a franchise is property: "We are aware of nothing peculiar to a franchise which can class it higher, or render it more sacred than other property. A franchise is property and nothing more. It is incorporeal property, and it is so defined by Blackstone, 2 Com., ch. 3, p. 20."

West River Bridge Co. v. Dix, 6 How., 534; see the opinion of Justice Woodbury, same case, 541, 542.

As property, a franchise may be divided, leased, mortgaged, sold (Gunning on Tolls, 106 110; 6 Barn. & C., 703. 5, 875; 3 Maule & S., 247; 1 Comp. & J., 57); and it is property by grant, taken subject to the general laws of the land in force at the time of the grant, at least.

The question now arises: "Is a franchise subject to execution at law by the laws of Indiana?" The property, rights, credits and effects of the defendants, are subject to execution." 2 Rev. Stat. of 1852, secs. 134, 433. There is only one exception, and that does not exempt a corporation debtor or its franchise. By sec. 438, a debt can be levied upon and sold only when "given up by the defendant;" but no property, either corporeal or individual, is exempted, except a limited amount of personal property in favor of families; and such has at all times been substantially the law of the State of Indiana. Franchises are not personal propety, and of course could not be sold in England by a fi. fa. as goods and chattels. But undoubtedly the rents and profits of ferries, and markets, and mills, and the rents and profits of other real estate, have always been subject to seizure in England.

In Indiana, if on a judgment against the owner of a ferry, you sell the land, the ferry right will pass to the purchaser, with the land, as it is appendant thereto and cannot exist without it. But in Indiana there must be an appraisement of the property, and that assessment will be of the real estate and the right to exercise the franchise, on the rents and profits being first valued, and first sold, as the franchise held by an individual in a mill, or ferry, is subject to sale with the property, and descends to heirs. Why do not the same principles apply to a toll bridge held by a corporation, where the legal tolls are fixed by law, as in this case? The decision of the court in the case of The West River Bridge, 6 How., 533, is referred to as directly in point.

If it were shown that corporations in Indiana are exempt from the Execution Laws of the State, and as such protected in their property from levy and sale, and that consequently they form an exception to the general laws that govern other debtors, relieving them from the payment of other debts, there would be an end of the question; but as such is not the case, it is submitted that their property, including the franchise, is subject to appraisement and sale, as was done in the case at law, and therefore the appellees have no equity on that ground alone, and the decree of the Circuit Court should have dismissed the bill at the cost of the complainants below

I maintain, further, that the appellants, being the execution defendants at law, are the only party that can raise the question, whether this property can be sold at law; and as they insist that it shall be sold, it does not lie within the appellees, the execution plaintiffs, to say that the property in question was not subject to be sold at law.

Mr. R. W. Thompson, for appellee:

As the Company is alleged to have been incorporated in Indiana, to be a citizen of Indiana, and to have built the bridge authorized by the charter in that State, and exercised their corporate powers there, and one of the corporators is expressly alleged to be a citizen of that State, it is equivalent to an allegation that all the corporators are citizens of the State within the decisions of this court.

Letson's case, 2 How., 497; Marshall's case, 16 How., 314, La Fayette Ins. Co. v. French, 18 How., 404.

It also appears that the appellant supposes that advantage may be taken of the supposed defective averment of citizenship of the defendants, in the declaration against them, upon which the judgments were taken.

Upon this point the counsel cited:

Union Ins Co. v. Osgood, 1 Duer, 707; Woolf v. City Steamboat Company, 7 M., G & S., 103; Freeman v Machias, &c. Co., 38 Me., 343; People v. Rensselaer, &c., Br. Co., 20 Barb., 518; Harris' case, 4 Blackf., 267; Richardson's case, 5 Blackf., 146; Ex parte Watkins, 3 Pet., 207.

The fourth assignment of errors, that the court erred in overruling the demurrer to the original bill, in effect raised for the consideration of the court the whole question in the case, viz.: has the Court of Chancery jurisdiction to appoint a receiver of the rents and profits of a corporation defendant which is insolvent, or has no available real estate except that which is derived from the use of its franchise? That the court has such power, and that it has at all times been exercised for the advancement of justice, the repeated decisions of the courts will show.

The case of Fripp v. The Chard Railroad Company, 21 Eng. L. & Eq., 53, is an authority for all we ask here.

It appears from the bill in this case, and is not denied, that all the possible ways or means which the complainants have of making their debt or judgments, is out of the defendants' bridge. That is all the property the defendants have. They say: "There is the bridge, take it." If it was clear that the plaintiff could regard the bridge as real estate, and sell it under the Indiana Execution Laws, by exposing the rents and profits to sale, and that the purchaser could enjoy those rents and profits upon the purchase, or if the purchaser of the bridge could keep it up, and receive the tolls, then the plaintiffs might have an adequate remedy at law. The difficulties are referred to and set out in the amended petition and complaint.

The complainants say that the bridge is valueless, except in connection with the franchise —the right to take tolls. Nebeker answers, that he is advised and believes that the franchise cannot be sold or exercised by third persons, except by consent of the Corporation.

The Circuit Court of Indiana has adopted the Statute of that State, requiring the appraisement of property upon execution sales. If the property is real estate, the rents and profits have to be appraised as well as the fee; and the fee cannot be offered as long as the rents and profits are sufficient, at two thirds their appraised value, to pay the debt. If the bridge is personal property, then two thirds of $70,000 would have to be paid for the bridge, which the purchaser could not lawfully maintain one hour, over or upon that public highway—the Wabash River. So that the court can see that this Bridge Company has brought the complainants to a "dead-lock," and they have no other adequate remedy but a receiver.

The grant in this case being to three persons, if they sell out their bridge, or it is sold out by execution, the bridge becomes the property of a private individual, and the charter of the defendants is forfeited, and the existence of the Company will be, by the Act, terminated.

In the matter of Highway, 2 N. J., 293; see, also, Macon & Western Railway v. Parker, 9 Ga., 377; State v. Rives, 5 Ired., 297; Ammant v. New Alexandria Turnpike Company, 13 S. & R., 210.

The decree of the court, in appointing the receiver, was of the most favorable character to the defendants. It provided for conforming, in every respect, with the charter of the defendants; and by it, the complainants were constrained to wait for their pay until it was earned in tolls at the bridge.

Mr. Justice Catron delivered the opinion of the court:

In December, 1854, Shepherd and others recovered a judgment against the Covington Drawbridge Company, for upwards of $6,000. At the same time, Davidson recovered a judgment against the same Company for upwards of $1,000.

The Corporation was created by an Act of the Legislature of Indiana, and built a drawbridge over the Wabash River, in that State, pursuant to its charter; was sued for a tort in the Circuit Court of the United States for Indiana District, where the recoveries were had. Executions at law were regularly issued, and at March Term, 1855, of that court, were returned by the Marshal, "nothing found." Alias writs of fi. fa. were taken out and levied on the bridge as real estate, and in November, 1855, the Marshal proceeded to sell the rents and profits of the same on Davidson's judgment for the term of one year, at the sum of $4,666.62, Davidson, the execution creditor, becoming the purchaser. The agent of Shepherd and others instructed the Marshal not to sell the bridge on their judgment, and he returned the special facts. Davidson demanded possession of the bridge from the Corporation, so that he might obtain the tolls, but the keeper of the bridge, and a principal owner of the stock, refused to surrender possession. In May, 1856, Shepherd, and those interested in the large judgment jointly with Davidson, filed their bill in equity in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Indiana, against the Bridge Company and Richard M. Nebeker, as keeper, agent and manager of the bridge; praying that the court should appoint a suitable receiver to take possession of the same, and receive the tolls and income, and apply them to discharge the judgments at law, after defraying expenses. The court made the decree prayed for, from which the Bridge Company appealed to this court.

The first objection made to the decree is, that it does not appear by the bill that the defendant is properly described as incorporated by the State of Indiana. The bill alleges that "The Covington Drawbridge Company, of Covington, is a corporation and citizen of the State of Indiana:" and it is also insisted that the judgments at law are void, because jurisdiction was not given to the United States courts by the averment of citizenship in either of the declarations. The judgment at law, in Shepherd's case, was brought before this court at the last term, when it was held that the averment of citizenship, here objected to, was sufficient. 20 How., 227. That decision is conclusive of the two foregoing exceptions.

The consideration, whether by a creditor's bill corporate property and franchises, can be subjected to pay the debts of the corporation, by taking possession and administering its affairs, and drawing to the court its revenues, is a question of great importance and some difficulty. In advance of this question, it is insisted here that there exists in Indiana an adequate remedy at law; that Davidson's judgment is satisfied by the levy and sale of the tolls of the bridge; and Davidson having obtained a remedy by fi. fa., Shepherd may do the same. To ascertain whether Davidson obtained satisfaction by the Marshal's sale, we must inquire what property was sold, and what title to it acquired, that could be made available by possession and the receipts of tolls.

The Covington Drawbridge Company was duly incorporated to build a bridge across the Wabash River where it was navigable for steamboats, and not subject to be bridged by an individual assuming to exercise a mere private right. The Corporation had conferred on it a public right of partially obstructing the river, which is a common highway, and which obstruction would have been a nuisance, if done without public authority. This special privilege, conferred on the Corporation by the sovereign power, of obstructing the navigation, did not belong to the country generally by common right, and is therefore a franchise; and second, the authority of taking tolls from those who crossed the river on the bridge was also a franchise, and freedom to do that which could not be lawfully done by one without public authority. This franchise could only be conferred by the Legislature directly, or indirectly through public agents and tribunals, in pursuance of a statute. The bridge is part of a road, and an easement, like the road; and the privilege of making the bridge, and taking tolls for the use of the same, is a franchise in which the public have an interest; the Corporation, as owner of the franchise, is liable to answer in damages if it refuses to transport individuals on being paid or tendered the usual fare; the law secured the tolls as a recompense for the duty imposed to provide and maintain facilities for accommodating the public. Whether the timbers and materials of this bridge could be sold at auction by the Marshal, by virtue of a fieri facias in his hands, as was held could be done by the laws of North Carolina in the case of The State v. Rives, 5 N. C., 297, we are not called on to decide in this case, as here the annual tolls were sold, and not the bridge itself.

By the laws of Indiana, lands and tenements cannot be sold under execution, until the rents and profits thereof for a term not exceeding seven years shall have been first offered for sale at public auction; and if that term, or a less one, will not satisfy the execution, then the debtor's interest or estate in the land may be sold, provided it brings two thirds of its appraised value. The tolls, under the idea that they were rents and profits of the bridge, were sold for one year, according to the forms of this law. The tolls of the bridge being a franchise, and sole right in the Corporation, and the bridge a mere easement, the Corporation not owning the fee in the land at either bank of the river, or under the water, it is difficult to say how an execution could attach to either the franchise or the structure of the bridge as real or personal property. This is a question that this court may well leave to the tribunals of Indiana to decide on their own laws, should it become necessary. One thing, however, is plainly manifest, that the remedy at law of these execution creditors is exceedingly embarrassed, and we do not see how they can obtain satisfaction of their judgments from this Corporation (owning no corporate property but this bridge), unless equity can afford relief.

By the laws of Indiana, stocks in a corporation may be sold by virtue of an execution against the owner of the stocks, which the sheriff may transfer to the purchaser; but this law does not help these complainants; they did not proceed against the stocks; their judgment at law did not affect individual property, but corporate property. The question whether a railroad company's property, including the franchises, can be subjected to the debts of the corporation by a decree in equity, is treated very fully by Redfield on Railways, ch. 32, section 2, p. 571; there the substance of the decisions affecting the doctrine is given in cases where there were liens by mortgage. The subject was well examined by the Supreme Court of Georgia in the case of The Macon and Western Railroad Company v. Parker, 9 Ga., 378. The contest there involved claims of creditors. When speaking of the necessity of equity exercising jurisdiction, the court say "that the whole history of equity jurisprudence does not present a case which made the interposition of its powers not only highly expedient, but so indispensably necessary in adjusting the rights of creditors to an insolvent estate as this did." The road was sold according to the decree; but, to settle the difficulty as to the sale of a franchise without the consent of the power granting it, upon application, an Act was passed by the Legislature, creating the purchaser and his associates a body corporate, with the powers and privileges of the old Company. In England, the practice is, to order a receiver to be appointed to manage the corporate property, take the proceeds of the franchises, and apply them to pay the creditors filing the bill.

Blanchard v. Cawthorn, 4 Simons, 566; Tripp v. The Chard Railway Company, 21 E. L. &. E., 53.

All that we are called on to decide in this case is, that the court below had power to cause posseesion to be taken of the bridge; to appoint a receiver to collect tolls, and pay them into court, to the end of discharging the judgments at law; and our opinion is, that the power to do so exists, and that it was properly exercised.

It is, therefore, ordered that the decree below be affirmed; and the Circuit Court is directed to proceed to execute its decree.

Mr. Justice Daniel dissented for want of jurisdiction of the courts of the United States over corporations.

Carrier by water, liable for loss—the exceptions in accident—liable for all possible care—for every loss which could have been prevented by foresight, skill and prudence—burden of proof on carrier to show excepted peril—losses arising from dangers of navigation, what are—first cause—master's duty to seek shelter from storm—negligence in saving goods—when cannot abandon ship or cargo.

Carrier by water is liable in all events, and for any loss, however sustained, unless it happen from the act of God, or the public enemy, or by the act of the shipper, or from some other cause or accident expressly excepted in the bill of lading.

When he is unable to carry the goods forward to their place of destination, from causes over which he has no control, as by the stranding of the vessel, he is still bound to take all possible care of the goods.

He is responsible for every loss or injury which might have been prevented by human foresight, skill and prudence.

Where a loss or damage is shown, it is incumbent upon the carrier to bring it within the excepted peril in order to discharge himself from responsibility.

Losses arising from the dangers of navigation are such as happen in spite of human exertions, and which cannot be prevented by human skill and prudence.

When such efforts fail to save the goods from the excepted peril, the ultimate loss and damage in judgment of law results from the first cause.

It depends upon the proof whether the act of the master, in seeking shelter in the harbor, was reasonably necessary, and if it was, then he is not in fault on that account.

A masters has a right, and oftentimes it is his duty, to seek shelter from a storm; and although the circumstances here tend strongly to prove that he misjudged, still they are not of that decisive character which incline the court to make the decision turn upon that ground; and the same remarks also apply to his acts and endeavors to anchor the steamer after he entered the harbor.

Master was guilty of gross negligence for not having made any effort himself, or requested the aid of others, either to get the steamer off when stranded, or to remove and store the goods.

A master cannot abandon his ship and cargo upon any grounds, when it is practicable for human exertions, skill and prudence to save them from the impending peril.

Argued Dec. 9, 1858. Decided Jan. 4, 1859.

APPEALS from the District Court of the United States for the District of Massachusetts.

The libels in these cases were filed in the court below, by the appellees, to recover on contracts of affreightment for damages to certain goods.

The court below entered decrees in favor of libelants, for $3,768.76, with $105.64 costs, and $4,964.80, with 447.76 costs, respectively. From these decrees the defendants took appeals to this court.

A further statement appears in the opinion of the court.

Mr. S. G. Haven, for the appellants.

After a review of the evidence and an argument on the disputed questions of fact, the counsel proceeded:

After The Niagara was stranded and filled with water by the dangers of navigation, and disabled from proceeding on her voyage, the appellants were only responsible for the ultimate delivery of the goods, and for reasonable care in preserving the goods from the effects of storms, of bad air, of leakage, and of embezzlement.

Story Bail., secs. 490, 512; Norway Plains Co. v. B. & M. R. R., 1 Gray, 263, 270, and cases cited.

The principle on which the extraordinary responsibility of common carriers is founded, does not require that that responsibility should extend to the time occupied in transportation. That principle is the danger of robbery or embezzlement, by collusion or fraud on the part of the carrier.

Parsons v. Hardy, 14 Wend., 215.

The principle mentioned does not extend beyond delivery of the goods. It does not reach the condition in which they are delivered. The freezing of canals excuses delay; but during the delay, the carrier must not be guilty of negligence in taking care of articles de tained.

After the stranding of The Niagara, the proper standard of diligence was, "such a line of conduct as a prudent man of intelligence would have observed in taking care of his own property similarly situated.

In cases of necessity or calamity during the voyage, the master is by law created an agent from necessity, for the benefit of all concerned; and what he fairly and reasonably does under such circumstances in the exercise of his sound discretion, binds all parties in interest.

Accident or misfortune will excuse the carrier; unless he have expressly contracted to deliver the goods within a limited time.

Messrs. Alfred Russell and R. H. Gillet, for appellees:

The fact of damage fastens responsibility on the vessel, and raises a legal presumption to be rebutted by the carrier, that the injury arose from negligence.

Clark v. Barnwell, 12 How., 272; Rich v. Lambert, 12 How., 347; The Martha, Olcott, 143; King v. Shepherd, 3 Story, 355; Bernadon v. Nolte, 7 Mart., 283; Price v. Ship Uriel, 10 La. Ann., 413; Story, Bailm., sec. 509; 1 Conkl. Adm., 205.

Neither of the triple defenses of the answer is established by the proofs. The damages did not arise either from being driven into the harbor or forced upon the shore, or the unavoidable detention of the goods in a leaking vessel.

Muddle v. Stride, 9 C. & P., 380.

But if the weight of evidence were measurably doubtful, this court, when an appellant has taken no new testimony on appeal according to his privilege, and as in Rich v. Lampert, 12 How., 374, will be disinclined to reverse the decree below, on a balancing of testimony.

It is abundantly manifest from the evidence that the storm did not compel the propeller to put into port.

There was a want of ordinary prudence in adopting no precautionary measures before entering the harbor, after the decision to enter had been made, to prevent the accident which did occur.

The master was guilty of want of ordinary care of the interest of the shippers, in deserting the vessel after she was stranded, in making no efforts to remove the libelant's goods from the place of stowage, either ashore or to some part of the vessel where they would have escaped damage by water.

A peril of the sea, imposing such duty upon him, will not be regarded as the proximate cause of such damage, if he was delinquent in this regard.

If the master and mates had remained, it is evident they might have taken out the perishable articles, and thus have prevented them from having essentially damaged themselves, or at least from damaging the dry goods of Sexton. There is good reason to believe that the houses on shore, and the means of erecting more, might have been used to afford safe storage.

The advice of the best informed men would make no difference. It must be clear to the court that the master's conduct was proper.

3d. There was a deviation. This, of itself, renders the vessel chargeable, because it appears that the master was inexperienced and unskillful in his business, and the evidence shows that his putting into Presque Isle was not necessitated by an unavoidable and overruling force, but was a voluntary and unexcused departure.

4th point. Omitted.

Mr. Justice Clifford delivered the opinion of the court:

These are appeals in admiralty from the District Court of the United States for the District of Wisconsin.

Libels were filed in these cases at a special term of the District Court of the United States, begun and held at the City of Milwaukee, on the first Monday of November, 1855. They are drawn in the usual form of libels in rem, and respectively allege a breach of contract of affreightment. Both suits grew out of contracts for the transportation of goods by the steam propeller Niagara, on her last trip during the season of 1854, from the port of Buffalo, in the State of New York, to Chicago, in the State of Illinois. They were argued together in this court, and it was conceded at the argument, by the counsel on both sides, that they depended substantially upon the same state of facts. All the testimony respecting the liability of the steamer was first taken and filed in the case last named, and was subsequently admitted and read in evidence at the hearing in the other suit, under a stipulation of the parties, and the pleadings are substantially the same in both cases. On the part of the libelants, it is alleged, among other things, to the effect that on or about the 28th day of November, 1854, the libelants caused certain goods, particularly described in the respective libels, to be shipped in good order and condition on board the propeller Niagara, to be transported from Buffalo to Milwaukee, in the State of Wisconsin, and that the master, Hugh Mallon, received the goods on board, and in consideration of certain freight to be paid in that behalf by the respective libelants, undertook and promised to convey the goods from the port of shipment to the port of destination, and there to deliver the goods (the dangers of navigation, fire, and collision, only excepted), in like good order and condition to the libelants or their respective agents.

And they further allege that the steamer shortly thereafter departed on her voyage, but that the master, not regarding his duty, nor his promise and undertaking, did not so convey the goods, although no danger of navigation, fire, or collision, prevented him from so doing, and that the goods, or a large portion of them, through the mere carelessness, negligence and improper conduct of the master, his mariners or servants, became wetted, heated, or stained, and greatly damaged, or wholly lost to the libelants. Answers in the usual form of pleading were duly filed in each case on the 24th day of May, 1855, admitting the jurisdiction of the court, and setting up substantially the same grounds of defense. They are alike in all their material allegations, so far, at least, as respects the questions discussed at the bar, and all the matters involved in the judgment of the court. In both cases the answers admit the contract to transport the goods, as per bill of lading, the dangers of navigation, fire, and collision, excepted, and that certain packages, under each of the contracts, were accordingly shipped on board the steamer for that trip, leaving it to the libelants in each case to make such proof of the kind, quantity, and value of the goods, as they might be advised was material, and aver that the steamer, when she departed on the voyage, on the 29th day of November, 1854, was tight, stanch, seaworthy, and well manned, and that her entire cargo was well, safely, and securely stowed. And the respondents, denying every allegation in the libels, of carelessness, negligence, and improper conduct, on the part of the master and his mariners, aver the fact to be that they were vigilant, competent, and skillful in the premises, and did what was their duty to do under the circumstances in which they were placed. They admit, also, that a part of the cargo was damaged, but allege and insist that the damage was occasioned by a danger of navigation within the exception of the bill of lading, for which they are not, and ought not, in any manner, to be held responsible. And they further allege that the steamer was, by stress of weather, compelled to make the harbor of Presque Isle, and by the snow and the force of the storm and wind, which was very severe, the steamer dragged her anchor, went ashore, and was dashed upon the beach, from which cause, and the necessary detention of the goods on board, the damage, whatever it is, occurred; and that in the month of May, 1855, which was as soon thereafter as it was possible to repair the steamer and for her to proceed on her voyage, the goods, or so much of them as belonged to the respective libelants, were transported to Milwaukee, and there delivered to them, and were by them respectively received, with a full knowledge of the damage, if any, and of its cause, and with an agreement not only to share the damage, but that the goods should be charged with and pay their proportion of a general average of the losses thus occasioned; and the respondents claim that the libelants in each case are liable "for a large amount of the average and damage" to the steamer, which they aver to be the sum of $2,000.

This statement from the libels and answers embraces the substance of the pleadings in both cases, so far as respects the several matters discussed at the bar, and the real merits of the controversy. Testimony was taken on both sides in the court below, and after a full hearing a decree in each case was entered for the libelants, and the respondents appealed to this court. No additional testimony has been taken since the appeal, and it seems to be conceded that the rights of the parties depend chiefly upon certain questions of fact to be determined from the evidence, which is conflicting, and in some particulars very contradictory. That remark, however, applies more particularly to that part of the testimony which relates to the conduct of the master after the steamer was stranded, and the means at his command to secure and preserve the goods from damage. Many of the facts and circumstances connected with the voyage, as well as those attending the disaster, are involved in much less difficulty, and some of those most material to be ascertained are satisfactorily proved, without any contradiction whatever. On the one side, no question is made that the goods were regularly shipped at Buffalo on the 28th day of November, 1854; and on the other, it is admitted that in the contract of shipment the dangers of navigation, fire and collision, were duly excepted in the usual form of such an exception in bills of lading. All of the goods were shipped in good order and condition, and were to be delivered at Milwaukee, as alleged by the libelants. They consisted in the one case of groceries, and in the other of dry goods; and it is conceded that they were carefully and properly stowed. On the day following the shipment, The Niagara left Buffalo, and proceeded on her intended voyage. She was a steam propeller, of four hundred and fifty tons burthen, and at the time of her departure was a good, tight, stanch vessel, every way suitable for the navigation in which she was engaged, and was well furnished with ground tackle, including two anchors and two chains. One of her anchors weighed fourteen hundred pounds, with an inch and an eighth chain of sixty fathoms, and the other weighed seven hundred pounds, with a chain of the usual size and length. Her whole company consisted of twenty-two men, constituting a full complement of officers and crew for the voyage in a steamer of that description. Having proceeded on the usual route for that voyage, she arrived in Lake Huron on the second day of December, at four o'clock in the morning, in perfect safety, and crossed Saginaw Bay in the afternoon of the same day. About eight o'clock in the evening of that day, it commenced snowing, with a light wind, which by twelve o'clock at night freshened to a gale, and the storm continued without any abatement, blowing a heavy gale from a north-easterly direction, or east-north-east, till the day after the steamer was stranded.

After crossing Saginaw Bay, however, she continued on her regular course, and made Thunder Bay light at one o'clock, and proceeding onward on her voyage, arrived off Presque Isle, and made the light at that place at four o'clock in the morning, without having suffered any damage or met with any difficulty, except that the master testifies that she rolled heavily, and that for a half or three quarters of an hour before he made the light, he had to keep her off her course two points, to ease her in the sea. Her course from Thunder Bay had been north-northwest for a short time, then west by north and then northwest; and the mate of the steamer testifies, that when they first saw Presque Isle light, the steamer was a mile or two east of the light, and was in the usual course. At that time she was in no want either of wood or water, and it does not appear that she was in any worse condition to proceed on the voyage, unless prevented by the storm, than at the moment when she left the place of her depatrure. Her cargo was a general assortment of merchandise, consisting of teas, sugars, coffee, fish, liquors, molasses, crates of crockery, bales of sheeting, boxes of dry goods, and various other articles, specified in the record. All of the liquors, molasses, and some of the boxes, were stowed on the ground tier in the lower hold. Heavy goods were placed at the bottom, and light goods on top, and the hold was full, and battened down. Most of the light goods, such as boxes of merchandise, teas, sugar in barrels, and bales of sheeting, were on deck, and there were some willow wagons on the hurricane deck. None of her deck load had been washed away or injured, and it does not appear that it had been in any manner displaced or thrown into disorder by the rolling of the vessel.

These considerations tend strongly to show that there could not have been any urgent necessity to change the course of the steamer on account of the violence of the storm or the motion of the vessel; and, consequently, affect the credit of the master, and corroborate the statement of the mate, that, at the time the light was discovered, the steamer was pursuing her usual route. Both the master and the mate were on deck when they made the light, and the master gave the order to run into Presque Isle. In entering the harbor, they steered west-southwest, and then doubled inside of a small shoal round to the southeast, in order to get to the pier. What purpose was to be accomplished by getting to the pier, it is not easy to perceive, as the mate testifies that they knew that the sea was so heavy that the steamer could not lie at the dock. They, however, came round to the southeast, and so near to the pier that the mate says he could see the snow on the beach, and then let go the large anchor, and the wind immediately caught the steamer on the larboard bow, and she commenced dragging the anchor. When they found that the steamer dragged, and that there was danger that she would go ashore, instead of casting the other anchor, their first endeavor was to get rid of the one already cast, in order, if possible, to work her off, and make another effort to get up to the dock; and finding that they could not heave the chain with the windlass, their next effort was to slip it; and while they were endeavoring to unshackle the chain the steamer struck, and went on to the beach stern first, and immediately swung round broadside to the shore. No attempt was made to let go the small anchor, although it was hanging at the bow, and the mate admits that the steamer dragged more than a quarter of a mile before she struck. They presently tried the pumps, and it was found that she did not leak. Shortly after, she commenced pounding, and it was then ascertained that she was making water freely, when they started the engine pump, but it choked with sand, and they were obliged to desist. At the place where the steamer lay the water was seven or eight feet deep, and she filled to the level of the water outside in two or three hours, so that the water in the hold was four or five feet deep above the top of the keelson. It was about five o'clock in the morning of the 3d of December, 1854, that the steamer went on to the beach, and the master and all hands remained on board till ten o'clock in the forenoon, when he and the mate went on shore for the purpose, as he testifies, of ascertaining whether there were any facilities for storing the goods, and whether it would be possible to unload the steamer, and get her off. When he got on shore, he found the steamer Plymouth, bound down the lake, lying there, fastened at the dock, she having touched at Presque Isle for wood, four or five hours before the arrival of The Niagara, and remaining there on account of of the storm. Having made certain inquiries of the residents, and consulted with the master of The Plymouth, he came to the conclusion that it was the safest way to leave the goods on board, as more of them, in his judgment, would be protected in that mode than by removing them on shore; and on the morning of the 6th of December, the master, other officers, and all the crew of The Niagara, except three, took passage in The Plymouth, leaving the watchman, wheelsman and porter in charge of the steamer, with the hatches fastened down, and the goods in the condition in which they were when the steamer was stranded. During the night of the 4th of December, the storm subsided; but the following day was very cold, so that the steamers were frozen in, and persons walked on the ice from the pier to the place where The Niagara lay, which was more than a half mile. It moderated, however, during the night, and on the following morning the ice went out of the harbor, and two other steamers, The Republic and Kentucky, came in before The Plymouth left, and the former took the place of The Plymouth at the dock after she started on her voyage down the lake.

Several witnesses testify—and among the number the master of The Plymouth—that the 6th of December, the day he left, was a fine day, although, he says, there was so much ice about his boat where she lay at the dock, that he had to cut her out in the morning before he started.

One of the witnesses for the libelants, who resides at Presque Isle, testifies, that after The Plymouth left, it was clear, and made ice, but did not blow, and that not long after there was a thaw, which continued till the 13th of January, and that after the thaw there were two or three weeks of very nice weather. Navigation, however, closed in a few days after The Plymouth left, and The Niagara remained on the beach, where she was stranded, until the mate, who is now the master of The Niagara, returned to Presque Isle, on the 27th day of April, 1855. When he returned, he found her where he left her, in charge of the watchman. He immediately pumped her out with a steam pump, according to his account, and lightened her off with a steamboat, and, after she was lightened, got the steamboat to take her up to the dock, where he removed the residue of the goods, and then took her to Detroit and had her repaired. After she was repaired, he returned to Presque Isle, in the month of May, 1855, and conveyed the goods, or so much of them as had not been destroyed, to the place of destination. Some of the goods were in good condition or were slightly injured, while others were greatly damaged or wholly worthless. Those stowed below had remained entirely without ventilation from December to March, and then the hatch at midships only had been opened They were heated, disclored and stained, and one of the witnesses testifies that sugar, coffee, and dried fruit, were all soaked together, and that the water pumped up was dark, exhibiting the appearance of the soakings of coffee and codfish, and that the goods had the offense smell of dead water. They were taken out about the 1st of May, so that those stowed in the lower hold, not more than four or five feet above the keelson, had been submerged in bilge water for nearly five months, and some of those above the water had been moistened by the dampness and become moldy. Damages to the amount of $3,763.76 were allowed by the District Judge, in the case first named, and in the other, $4,964.30, and it is not pretended in the argument that the respective amounts were either extravagant or unreasonable. It is not upon any such ground that the appellants seek to reverse the respective decrees in the court below. They deny that they are liable at all for any amount, and set up the first exception in the contract of shipment or bill of lading, and their counsel insist upon the following propositions:

I. That the damage to the goods resulting from the stranding of the steamer was wholly occasioned by the dangers of navigation, the risk of which was not taken by the master or owners of the steamer.

II. That after The Niagara was stranded and filled with water, and disabled from proceeding on her voyage, the appellants were responsible only for the ultimate delivery of the goods, and for reasonable care in preserving them from the effect of storms, bad air, leakage and embezzlement.

III. That the master, after the steamer was stranded, and the goods wetted, became and was the agent of the shippers of the goods as well as of the owners of the vessel, and as such, under the circumstances of this case, is responsible only for the due and proper care and diligence, and that it cannot be successfully contended, from the evidence, that such care and diligence were not exercised.

These propositions, whether taken separately or collectively, necessarily involve mixed questions of law and fact, which in a case, like the present must be determined by the court, acting instead of a jury to find the facts, and as a court to determine the law. Such propositions, therefore, must be considered in connection with all the legal evidence exhibited in the record, and their accuracy must be tested by the true state of the facts as found by the court from the evidence, and by the rules of law applicable to that state of the case. According to the admitted or undisputed facts of the case, The Niagara was enrolled and licensed for the coasting trade, and was employed by the owners in transporting goods, under contracts for freight, upon navigable waters between ports and places in different States; and at the time of the disaster she had a full cargo of merchandise, of various descriptions, on board, consigned to merchants or parties residing either at her port of destination or at Milwaukee, and other intermediate ports or places along the course of her voyage. She was a general ship, laden with goods to be transported for hire; and the goods in question having been received and taken charge of, as goods under a contract of shipment, corresponding in terms to the usual bill of lading for the transportation of goods on inland navigable waters, the question of liability in this case must be determined by the rules of law applicable to carriers of goods upon such inland waters. A common carrier is one who undertakes for hire to transport the goods of those who may choose to employ him, from place to place. He is, in general, bound to take the goods of all who offer, unless his complement for the trip is full, or the goods be of such a kind as to be liable to extraordinary danger, or such as he is unaccustomed to convey. In all cases where there is no special agreement to the contrary, he is entitled to demand the price of carriage before he receives the goods; and if not paid, he may refuse to receive them; but if he take charge of them for transportation, the non-payment of the price of carriage in advance will not discharge, affect or lessen his liability as a carrier in the case, and he may afterwards recover the price of the service performed. When he receives the goods, it is his duty to take all possible care of them in their passage, make due transport and safe and right delivery of them at the time agreed upon; or, in the absence of any stipulation in that behalf, within a reasonable time. Common carriers are usually described as of two kinds, namely: carriers by land and carriers by water. At common law, a carrier by land is in the nature of an insurer, and is bound to keep and carry the goods intrusted to his care safely, and is liable for all losses, and in all events, unless he can prove that the loss happened from the act of God, or the public enemy, or by the act of the owner of the goods.

Common carriers by water, like common carriers by land, in the absence of any legislative provisions prescribing a different rule, are also, in general, insurers, and liable in all events, and for every loss or damage, however occasioned, unless it happened by the act of God, or the public enemy, or by some other cause or accident, without any fault or negligence on the part of the carrier, and expressly excepted in the bill of lading. A carrier's first duty, and one that is implied by law, when he is engaged in transporting goods by water, is to provide a seaworthy vessel, tight and stanch, and well furnished with suitable tackle, sails, or motive power, as the case may be, and furniture necessary for the voyage. She must also be provided with a crew, adequate in number and sufficient and competent for the voyage, with reference to its length and other particulars, and with a competent and skillful master, of sound judgment and discretion; and, in general, especially in steamships and vessels of the larger size, with some person of sufficient ability and experience to supply his place temporarily, at least, in case of his sickness or physical disqualification. Owners must see to it that the master is qualified for his situation, as they are, in general, in respect to goods transported for hire, responsible for his acts and negligence. He must take care to stow and arrange the cargo, so that the different goods may not be injured by each other, or by the motion of the vessel, or its leakage; unless, by agreement, this duty is to be performed by persons employed by the shipper. In the absence of any special agreement, his duty extends to all that relates to the lading, as well as the transportation and delivery of the goods; and for the faithful performance of those duties the ship is liable, as well as the master and owners. A clean bill of lading, in general, imports, unless the contrary appear on its face, that the goods are to be safely and properly secured under deck. Fland. on Ship., sec. 192.

In the case of a parol shipment, the master is allowed to show a local custom to carry the goods on deck in a particular trade. It must, however, be a custom so generally known and recognized, that a fair presumption arises that the parties in entering into the contract agreed that their rights and duties should be regulated by it. Having received the goods for transportation, in the absence of any stipulation as to the period of sailing, the master must commence the voyage within a reasonable time, without delay, and as soon as the wind, weather and tide, will permit. After having set sail, he must proceed on the voyage, in the direct, shortest, and usual route, to the port of delivery, without unnecessary deviation, unless there is an express contract as to the course to be pursued; and where the vessel is destined for several ports and places, the master should proceed to them in the order in which they are usually visited, or that designed by the contract, or, in certain cases, by the advertisement relating to the particular voyage. A deviation from the direct route may be excusable if rendered necessary to execute repairs for the preservation of the ship, or the prosecution of the voyage, or to avoid a storm, or an enemy, or pirates, or for the purpose of obtaining necessary supplies of water or provisions, or, in the case of a steamer, to obtain necessary supplies of wood or coal for the prosecution of the voyage, or for the purpose of assisting another vessel in distress.

As agent of the owner, the master is bound to carry the goods to their place of destination in his own ship, unless he is prevented from so doing by some cause arising from irresistible force, over which he has no control, and which cannot be guarded against by the watchful exertion of human skill and prudence. When the vessel is wrecked or otherwise disabled in the course of the voyage, and cannot be repaired without too great delay and expense, he is at liberty to transship the goods and send them forward so as to earn the whole freight; and if another vessel can be had in the same or a contiguous port, or at one within a reasonable distance, it becomes his duty, under such circumstances, to procure it and transport the goods to their place of destination, and in that event he is entitled to charge the goods with the increased freight arising from the hire of the vessel so procured. That rule, however, is not obligatory in cases where the goods are not perishable, provided the ship can be repaired in a reasonable time. In that state of the case, he may, if he deems it best, retain the goods until the repairs are made, and forward them in his own vessel; and upon the same principle, and for the same end, if he have no means to transship the goods, it is his duty to repair his own vessel, when capable of being repaired, provided it can be done within a reasonable time, and he has the means at his command; and if not, and the means cannot be obtained from the owner, or upon the security of the ship, he may sell a part, or hypothecate the whole, and apply the proceeds to execute the repairs, in order that he may be enabled to resume the voyage and carry the goods, or the residue, as the case may be, to the place of destination; and he is not entitled to recover for freight if he refuses to transship the goods, unless he repairs his own vessel within a reasonable time, and carries them on to the place of delivery. Most of the rules of law prescribing the duties of a carrier for hire, and regulating the manner of their exercise, have existed for centuries, and they cannot be modified or relaxed except by the interposition of the legislative power of the Constitution. Time and experience have shown their value and demonstrated their utility and justice, and they ought not and cannot be changed by the judiciary. Some new and important provisions have been introduced into the law of carriers by water, by the Act of the 3d of March, 1851, entitled "An Act to limit the liability of ship owners." Owners of ships under that Act are not held liable for loss or damage to the cargo by reason of fire happening to or on board the vessel, unless the fire was caused by the design or neglect of such owner, except in cases where there is a special contract between the owner and the shipper, whereby the former assumes that risk. They are declared not liable as carriers for precious metals, precious stones, or jewels, or for the bills of any bank or public body, unless at the time of their lading a note in writing of their true character and value be given to the owner or his agent, and the same be entered on the bill of lading; and in no case, where that Act applies, will the owner be liable for the articles therein enumerated beyond the amount so notified and entered. It contains other provisions also of very great practical importance, and among the number the following: that for embezzlement, loss, damage, or injury by collision, or for any act, matter, or thing, loss, damage, or forfeiture done, occasioned, or incurred, without the privity or knowledge of the owner, his liability shall in no case exceed the amount or value of his interest in the vessel and the freight then pending. No part of the Act, however, applies to the owner of any canal boat, barge, or lighter, or to any vessel of any description whatsoever used in rivers or inland navigation.

A question may arise, whether the lakes bordering on a foreign jurisdiction are or are not excluded from the operation of the Act under the term inland navigation; but it is not necessary at the present time to determine or consider that question, as the first exception in the contract of shipment is the only one set up in this case, and there is no pretense that there has been any transfer of the steamer under the 4th section of the Act for the benefit of the libelants.

Carriers by water are liable at common law, and independently of any statutory provision, for losses arising from the acts or negligence of others to the same extent and upon the same principles as carriers by land—that is to say they are in the nature of insurers, and are liable, as before remarked, in all events and for any loss, however sustained, unless it happen from the act of God, or the public enemy, or by the act of the shipper, or from some other cause or accident expressly excepted in the bill of lading. Duties remain to be performed by the owner, or the master as the agent of the owner, after the vessel is wrecked or disabled, and after he has ascertained that he can neither procure another vessel nor repair his own, and those, too, of a very important character, arising immediately out of his original undertaking to carry the goods safely, to their place of destination. His obligation to take all possible care of the goods still continues, and is by no means discharged or lessened, while it appears that the goods have not perished with the wreck, and certainly not where, as in this case, the vessel is only stranded on the beach. Such disasters are of frequent occurrence along the seacoast in certain seasons of the year, as well as on the lakes, and it cannot for a moment be admitted that the duties and liabilities of a carrier or master are varied or in any manner lessened, by the happening of such an event. Safe custody is as much the duty of a carrier as conveyance and delivery; and when he is unable to carry the goods forward to their place of destination, from causes which he did not produce, and over which he has no control, as by the stranding of the vessel, he is still bound by the original obligation to take all possible care of the goods, and is responsible for every loss or injury which might have been prevented by human foresight, skill and prudence. An effort was made by able counsel, in King v. Shepherd, 3 Story, C. C., 358, to maintain the proposition, assumed by the respondents in this case, that the duties of a carrier after the ship was wrecked or stranded were varied, and therefore that he was exempted from all liability, except for reasonable diligence and care in his endeavors to save the property. Judge Story refused to sanction the doctrine, and held that his obligations, liabilities and duties, as a common carrier, still continued, and that he was bound to show that no human diligence, skill, or care, could save the property from being lost by the disaster. Anything short of that requirement would be inconsistent with the nature of the original undertaking and the meaning of the contract, as universally understood in courts of justice. Admit the proposition, and it is no longer true that where there is no provision in the contract of affreightment varying the liability of the carrier, he cannot relieve himself from liability for injuries to goods intrusted to his care, except by proving that it was the result of some natural and inevitable necessity superior to all human agency, or of a force exerted by a public enemy. Kent, Chief Justice, said in Elliott v. Russell. 10 Johns., 7, decided in 1813, that it has long been settled that a common carrier warrants the delivery of the goods in all but the excepted cases of the act of God and public enemies, and there is no distinction between a carrier by land and a carrier by water; and the same learned judge also held that the character, duty, and responsibility of a carrier continues to attach to a master as long as he has charge of the goods. A master, says a learned commentator, should always bear in mind that it is his duty to convey the cargo to its place of destination. This is the purpose for which he has been intrusted with it, and this purpose he is bound to accomplish by every reasonable and practicable method. Every act that is not properly and strictly in furtherance of this duty is an act for which both he and his owners may be made responsible. His duties as carrier are not ended until the goods are delivered at their place of destination, or are returned to the possession of the shipper, or kept safely until the shipper can resume their possession, or they are otherwise disposed of according to law. King v. Shepherd, 3 Story, C. C., 349; Abb. Ship., 8th ed. Perk., 478. These authorities are sufficient, it is believed, to demonstrate the proposition, that where a loss or damage is shown, it is incumbent upon the carrier to bring it within the excepted peril, in order to discharge himself from responsibility. It is not sufficient, without more, to show that the vessel was stranded, to bring the goods within the exception set up in this case. Had the goods perished with the wreck, it would be clear that the loss was the immediate consequence of the stranding of the vessel; and assuming that the disaster to the vessel was the result of the excepted peril, or of some natural and inevitable accident, then the carrier would be discharged. All the evidence, however, in this case, shows the fact to be otherwise; that the goods did not perish at the time the steamer was stranded; and the damage having since occurred, the rule of law to be ascertained is the one applicable in cases where the injury complained of arises subsequently to the disaster to the vessel. Such interruptions to a voyage are of frequent occurrence, and the rule of law is just and reasonable which holds that the master is bound to the utmost exertions in his power to save the goods from the impending peril, as it is no more than a prudent man would do under like circumstances. In great dangers great care is the ordinary care of prudent men, and in great emergencies prudent men employ their best exertions; so that the difference in the rule contended for, and the one here laid down, is much less than at first appears. Nevertheless there is a difference, and in a question of so much practical importance it is necessary to adhere strictly to the correct rule. Losses arising from the dangers of navigation within the meaning of the exception set up in this case are not such as are in any degree produced from the intervention of man. They are such as happen in spite of human exertions, and which cannot be prevented by human skill and prudence. When such efforts fail to save the goods from the excepted peril, the ultimate loss and damage, in judgment of law, results from the first cause, upon the ground that when human exertions are insufficient to ward off the consequences the excepted peril may be regarded as continuing its operation. Such, it is believed, is the nature of the contract between a carrier and shipper, so far as it becomes necessary to examine it in the cases under consideration. Carriers may be answerable for the goods, although no actual blame is imputed to them; and after the damage is established, the burden lies upon the respondents to show that it was occasioned by one of the perils from which they are exempted in the contract of shipment or bill of lading.

Applying these principles of law in the consideration of the case, we will proceed to a brief review of the evidence, in connection with that already given, bearing upon the questions of fact presented for decision. It has already appeared that the steamer made the light at Presque Isle on the 3d day of December, 1854, at four o'clock in the morning. At that time she was on the usual course, and was heading northwest. She had met with no difficulty up to that time, and was tight, stanch and strong, and in no want either of wood or water. Her master says, however, that he found it would be a great risk to haul her off to get round the point, doubtless referring to his previous statement that he had kept her off her course to ease her in the sea. She was then sailing northwest, and her course up to the straits would have been, as the witnesses say, either west-northwest, or northwest by west half west, and there is no difference of opinion among them that the course was direct and the wind was a fair wind for steamers; and one witness says that in a conversation with the mate, while he was at Presque Isle, he heard him say that they need not have entered the harbor. All or nearly all the witnesses agree that there is no difficulty in entering that harbor in the daytime, and that the anchorage, though rather limited in space, is safe and quite good just northwesterly of the end of the pier and out towards the lighthouse, and that the harbor affords a good shelter to vessels in a storm, except when the wind is blowing from a northeasterly direction or east-northeast, and then that its course is directly into the harbor, which fact must have been well known to the master and mate at the time they decided to make the attempt. Many of the witnesses say that it is more difficult to go in during the night, and several testify positively that it is dangerous, and some of the more experienced navigators say they would not risk the attempt in a dark night. One witness, the master of The Plymouth, called by the respondents, testified that the steamer did not come right in; that she broached to so near the mouth of the harbor, that she was detained at least a quarter of an hour. She, however, succeeded in entering the harbor, and cast her anchor as before stated. Four experienced navigators testify to the effect that she should have kept on her course; that it was not proper to enter the harbor. On the other side, one witness says, that whether it was good seamanship or not would depend upon the position of the vessel; and that if she was near in, he thinks it was prudent, and that he should have entered. Another says that if he had considered either vessel or cargo in danger, he should have gone in by all means; and the mate says that they concluded that it was better to go in. One witness, called by the libelants, says he heard the mate say, after the disaster, that it was unnecessary.

These are the principal facts bearing upon the question, whether the master exercised a sound judgment and discretion in entering the harbor. Most of the facts in evidence respecting the acts of the master after he entered the harbor, as they appear to the court, have already been stated, and need not be repeated. Experts were called and examined upon the question whether the master evinced proper skill and judgment in the attempt he made to anchor, and on that point three or four witnesses, who are experienced navigators, were called and examined by the libelants. They testify to the effect that a master of a steamer about to enter a harbor under the circumstances of this case ought to have both anchors ready, so that if one will not hold the vessel, he can cast the other; and they express the opinion that such precautionary steps are no more than ordinary prudence; and one of them says that it is customary to let go the small anchor first, and if that will not hold, then to let go the large anchor. On the other side, the mate of the steamer testifies that they had not time to let go the small anchor; and another witness expresses the opinion, that if the large anchor and the engine would not hold, then there was nothing that could be done; and the master of The Plymouth says that he knows of nothing else that could have been done, except to cast the anchor.

Numerous witnesses were examined on the question whether it was practicable to have removed the goods and stored them; and whether, if it had been done, it would have afforded any better protection to the goods. On this point the testimony of the witnesses is very conflicting. All that can be done is to state the principal facts, as they appear to the court.

Nineteen men were residing at Presque Isle at the time of the disaster, mostly temporary residents, in the employment of Frederick Barnham, a witness for the respondents. There were four dwelling-houses there in which people lived, and two unoccupied, and there were two barns and a vacant shop; all or nearly all the dwellings were built of logs, and were rudely finished. Three of those dwellings were within a half mile of the place where the steamer lay, which was within a quarter of a mile of a road extending round on the beach from the pier, where The Plymouth lay, with her officers and crew on board. Several days previously, the steamer Grand Turk had been wrecked, twelve miles distant from Presque Isle, and her officers and crew were there, consisting in all of eight or nine men. There was a large scow in the harbor, in good order, anchored near the pier, and not in use, which several witnesses testify might have been obtained to lighten the steamer; and one witness testifies that the same scow was used by the mate in the spring following, to carry the goods from the steamer to the dock, before she was taken off by the tug. Nine pumps, such as are used on board vessels, and brought up to use on the other disabled steamer, were lying on the beach, within a half mile. All the witnesses agree that the master of The Niagara never applied to any one of them for any assistance, either in respect to the goods or the steamer; and the mate admits that they had made up their minds to leave, the evening of the day after the disaster. Some of the witnesses offered assistance, and it was declined. Courtwright testifies that he heard a conversation between the master and the mate, in presence of fifteen or twenty persons, in reference to taking out the cargo of the steamer. The mate said to the master that they could get the goods out of the steamer, and get her alongside of the dock; to which the master replied, that it was too late in the season to do anything with her; that he was bound to go home; that he would not stop there for the steamer and all that was in her. Other declarations of the master, equally expressive of his determination to return home, are also in evidence; and being a part of the res gestæ, are clearly admissible to explain the motives of the master, in connection with his acts. Many witnesses on the side of the respondents express the opinion that the goods could not have been removed; and an equal or greater number called by the libelants express a contrary opinion, and suggest various modes by which it might have been accomplished in a very short time. Such opinions, however, cannot have much weight in determining the question. One important fact is clearly proved, namely: that the ice went out of the harbor the night before The Plymouth left, and it was mild weather after that, for the most part, till near the middle of January, 1855.

Our conclusions upon these several questions may be briefly stated. In respect to the one first presented, it is proper to remark that it depends upon the proof whether the act of the master, in seeking shelter in the harbor, was reasonably necessary; and if it was, then he is not in fault on that account. None of the circumstances exhibit such clear and decisive indications as would justify the conclusion that he did not think at the time that it was the most expedient course to be pursued. That he was without much experience as a master of a steamer of this description, does not seem to be denied; and it is equally clear that he had a strong preference for a sailing vessel, as is made evident by his own remarks, as well as in another fact proved in the case, that he has resumed his more favorite employment upon the water, for which, perhaps, he is better qualified than for the one in which he was then engaged. He says, in effect, that he found it would be dangerous to proceed on the voyage, and the mate says they concluded that it would be better to go into Presque Isle; and on their own opinions thus expressed, and the proofs as to the violence of the storm, his vindication mainly rests. Strong doubts are entertained whether he acted wisely in departing from the course of the voyage, and yet the evidence is not so full and clear in the case as to induce the court to place the decision upon that ground. Whatever dangers there were in entering the harbor, he succeeded in surmounting, and he cannot be held responsible for any accident which did not happen. Masters have a right, and oftentimes it is their duty, to seek shelter from a storm; and the fact that it would have been better to have kept on the course, may be more apparent now than it could have been to any one at the time. Something must be deferred to the judgment and discretion of the master on such occasions, so that although the circumstances tend strongly to prove that he misjudged, or was wanting in that fearless, prudent energy which he ought to have displayed, still they are not of that decisive character which incline the court to make the decision turn upon that ground; and the same remarks also apply to his acts, and endeavors to anchor the steamer after he entered the harbor. Knowing, as he did, that the wind was blowing directly into the harbor, it is difficult to see why it was that he brought the steamer round to the position in the wind, so as to expose her to the danger which finally overcame his efforts to accomplish the purpose for which he says he sought the harbor. He knew the course of the wind and the difficulties of the undertaking, before he entered; and ought to have been prepared to encounter them with the best precautions in his power to make. When he found that the anchor dragged, a great majority of the witnesses say he ought to have let go the other. His own description of what took place on the deck of the steamer after she entered the harbor, as well as that given by the mate, evinces an indecision and want of energy quite unsuited to the emergency in which he was placed, and tends strongly to show that he was wanting in the proper qualities of a skillful and well instructed master. These considerations create strong doubts in the mind of the court, whether the respondents are faultless in this particular, and yet the court is disinclined to place the decision entirely on that ground, as several witnesses, of some nautical skill, have testified that they are unable to see that anything more could have been done.

On the remaining ground of complaints against the master, we are all of the opinion that he was guilty of gross negligence. His steamer lay within ten or fifteen rods of the beach, and within a little more than a half mile of the settlement, the number of whose residents was temporarily augmented by the presence of the officers and crew of the steamer Plymouth and those of The Grand Turk; and yet all he did, so far as appears, to secure or recover the large amount of property he had on board, was to go on shore, consult with one or more of the residents, advise with the master of The Plymouth, and then came to the conclusion that nothing could be done, and that it was best to leave the goods on board, under the charge of three of his crew. He remained, however, for two or three days, until the storm had subsided and the weather had moderated; and after two other steamers had arrived in the harbor, he took passage on The Plymouth, and returned home, without having made any effort himself, or requested the aid of others, either to get off the steamer, or to remove and store the goods. We are satisfied from the evidence that the goods might have been removed between the time he left and the middle of January; and we are not satisfied that it could not have been done or successfully commenced during the time he remained in Presque Isle. A removal of a part would have enabled him to protect the residue on board; and there is no sufficient ground from the evidence to conclude that he would have encountered any serious difficulty in finding places enough for storing to have enabled him to remove from the steamer all of that class of goods exposed to damage, and store them on shore At that time the goods had not received any considerable injury, and most of them, in all probability, none whatever. Prompt attention would have saved the property and protected the shipper from loss. It must not be understood that a master can abandon his ship and cargo upon any such grounds as are proved by the evidence in this case, or, indeed, upon any other, so far as the goods are concerned, when it is practicable for human exertions, skill and prudence, to save them from the impending peril.

This view of the evidence renders it unnecessary to consider the other grounds of defense set up by the respondents.

The decrees, therefore, of the District Court in the respective cases are affirmed, with costs, in each case for the libelants.

THOMAS LEGGETT, JR., ET AL., Appts.,
v.
BENJAMIN G. HUMPHREYS.

(See S. C., 21 How., 66-80.)

Surety in sheriff's bond, discharged by payment in other suits, of amount of bond—where courts of law refuse relief, resort may be had to equity—plea puis darrein continuance—surety not liable beyond penalty of bond—substitution of, to securities—subsequent indemnity does not restore liability.

NOTE.—Sureties on official and other bonds; and for debts, liabilities. See note to U. S. v. Giles, 13 U. S. (9 Cranch), 212, and note to P. M. Gen. v. Early, 25 U. S. (12 Wheat., 13; Rights and liabilities of sureties. See note to Hall v. Smith, 46 U. S. (5 How.), 96.

That a surety in a sheriff's bond had been compelled to pay the whole amount of his bond in other suits, before present defendants obtained their judgment against him, but after the institution of their suit, is a good defense to the action, if pleaded puis darrein continuance.

Where the complainant tendered his plea at the proper time, and was refused the benefit of it, and was guilty of no laches, he is entitled to relief by bill in equity.

Sureties are never held responsible beyond the clear and absolute terms and meaning of their undertakings.

The liability of a surety cannot be extended by implication.

A surety who pays the debt of his principal, will be substituted in the place of the creditor to all the liens held by him to secure the payment of his debt; and the creditor is bound to preserve them unimpaired.

The liability of a surety is limited by the penalty of his bond.

A subsequent indemnity by his principal will not restore his liability when once discharged.

An open and honest effort of a principal to protect his surety against casualties incident to a responsibility about to be assumed for him, cannot be obnoxious to objection.

Argued Dec. 16, 1858. Decided Jan. 4, 1859.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Mississippi.

The bill in this case was filed in the court below, by the appellee, for an injunction against the enforcement of a certain judgment.

The Circuit Court decreed a perpetual injunction, according to the prayer of the bill; whereupon the defendants appealed to this court.

The case is very fully stated by the court.

Messrs. R. Johnson and J. H. Bradley, for the appellants:

Two questions arise in this case.

1. Can the aid of a court of equity be had, to stay proceedings at law, upon any facts of which the party might have availed himself in that suit?

2. Can the aid of a court of equity be had to protect a surety from payment of the penalty of an official bond, on the ground that he has once paid the full amount, when before payment by the surety, the principal had placed in his hands money or property exceeding the amount of the penalty?

On the part of the appellants, we will endeavor to maintain the negative of both of these propositions.

1. We assume that Humphreys was duly served with process, and employed counsel throughout the original cause. In that cause he "failed to make a proper defense at law through negligence, and equity will not aid him."

20 How., 161.

2. It appears by the record that the property of Humphreys was levied on Aug. 1, and Sept. 12, 1840; was all sold in large parcels on Sept. 1, 1840, to David G. Humphreys; the money for this was paid Sept. 23. It also appears that the assignment to secure Humphreys was made by Bland in March, 1840. It is fair to presume from the face of this deed, that it embraced a large portion of Bland's estate.

He admits that prior to the said executions, his principal had placed in his hands the very property which would have been primarily liable for these debts. Yet it does not show that he made any effort to avail himself of that security, or give any satisfactory account of it, and suffered his own property to be levied on and sold, under circumstances of great suspicion.

Under such circumstances, equity will not relieve him from the consequences of his own actions.

9 How., 312.

Messrs. George E. Badger and J. M. Carlisle, for the appellees:

The right of Humphreys, upon the facts set forth in his bill, to the relief he obtained in the court below, was established by the judgment of this court when this cause was here upon the demurrer to the bill.

9 How., 297.

The appellee is here, seeking to obtain in equity the benefit of a legal defense of which he has been deprived at law, not by his own oversight or misfortune, but by the rejection of his defense in consequence of the mistaken construction of the mandate.

The intention of the conveyance is declared to be, that the appellee "should be saved and and kept harmless and indemnified against all loss and damages." Or if he "should have anything to pay by reason of said obligations," that he "should be secured in the means of remuneration." The answer shows also that he received an assignment of certain choses in action from Bland for his further indemnity in the premises. And from the answer and an account exhibited therewith, it appears that after the application of all the conveyed and assigned effects, Bland is still his debtor to an amount exceeding the judgment at law. All the items charged to Bland in the account exhibited with the appellees' answer, are properly chargeable to him.

A principal is bound fully to indemnify his surety against all loss resulting from his suretyship, including therein all reasonable expenses to which he may have been put.

Heyden v. Cabot, 17 Mass., 172.

A surety as such, is deemed a creditor in equity, and both at law and in equity, an assignment for his indemnity is valid, though the liability be future and contingent.

Williams v. Washington, 1 Dev. Eq., 137; Stevens v. Bell, 6 Mass., 339; Hendricks v. Robinson, 2 Johns. Ch., 283, 306; Halsey v. Fairbanks, 4 Mas., 207; Miller v. Howry, 3 Penn., 374.

As to the money placed in the hands of the appellee in the creditors' suit, it is submitted that it cannot be considered here for any purpose.

1. For the reason already given as to a supposed surplus of the assigned effects.

2. Because it has not been applied, nor is he at liberty to apply it, for his indemnity.

3. Because he holds it subject to a Chancellor's decree, and has given bonds to replace it when directed. It should be added, that if an interest account be stated between Bland and the appellant, as to the funds assigned by the former and charges of the latter, there will result a balance in favor of the appellant, of many thousand dollars beyond everything which he has received.

Mr. Justice Daniel delivered the opinion of the court:

The controversy between these parties, although in its progress it has been much complicated and involved, yet, as to the principle by which its true character is defined, and by which its decision should be controlled, is simple enough. That principle is the extent of the pecuniary responsibility sustained by the surety in an official bond for the conduct of his principal.

To a correct comprehension of the position of the parties to this cause, some length of detail as to the facts and pleadings it contains, is necessary.

The appellee, together with one Grissom, having in the year 1837 bound himself in the penalty of $15,000, as surety, to the official bond of Richard J. Bland, sheriff of Claiborne County, in the State of Mississippi, a suit was instituted in the name of the Governor of the State upon that bond, for the use of the appellants, in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Mississippi, charging a breach of the condition of that bond by Bland, in having released from jail one McNider, against whom the appellants had recovered a judgment in the circuit court aforesaid, and whom, after being charged in execution in that court, the Marshal had committed to the custody of Bland, the sheriff. Under certain provisions of the Statutes of Mississippi, it was pleaded in defense to this action, that McNider being insolvent and unable to pay his prison fees, the appellants, who were non-residents, had failed to pay those fees, or, as required by the law of the State, to give security for their payment, or to appoint an agent within the county on whom demand for the prison fees could be made; and that, in consequence of such failure, McNider had, by a regular judicial order, been discharged from jail as an insolvent debtor. Upon a demurrer to the plaintiff's replications to these pleas, the circuit court gave judgment with costs in favor of the sheriff and the appellee, Humphreys, the suit having been previously discontinued as to the other surety, Grissom. This judgment was upon a writ of error reversed by this court, and the cause was remanded to the circuit court with instructions (Bland, the sheriff, pending the cause here, having died) to enter a judgment against the appellee, as surety, for the sum of $3,910.78, besides the costs. Vide McNutt v. Bland et al., 2 How., 28. In the interval between the emanation of the writ of error and the reversal of the judgment of the circuit court, two judgments were, on motion, obtained in the state court against the sheriff and Humphreys as his surety, by the Planters' Bank of Mississippi, one for the sum of $12,325.22, and the other for $2,674.75, making an aggregate amount exceeding the penalty of the bond in which the appellee was surety; and the property of that surety was levied upon and sold under execution, and the proceeds applied in full satisfaction of the amount of the penalty. Upon the receipt in the circuit court of the mandate of this court, the appellee, as surety as aforesaid, moved the circuit court for leave to plead puis darrein continuance, the judgments, levy, and satisfaction above mentioned, in fulfillment of his bond and of his liability for the sheriff; but the circuit court refused leave to plead these facts in discharge or satisfaction of the penalty, and, in literal obedience to the mandate of this court, rendered judgment against the appellee, as surety for the sum hereinbefore mentioned. The appellee, Humphreys, then exhibited his bill on the equity side of the circuit court, alleging the aforegoing facts, and averring, moreover, that no notice or process of any kind had ever been served upon him in the suit of McNutt v. Bland et al., but that the return of the officer of service as to the appellee was absolutely false. Upon these allegations, an injunction to the judgment at law was granted by the circuit court, but subsequently, upon a demurrer to the bill by the appellants, the injunction was dissolved and the bill dismissed. From this decree of dismission an appeal was taken to this court, who, after a hearing, expressed the following conclusions, viz.:

"In the case before us, the surety had been compelled to pay the whole amount of his bond by process from the state courts before the present defendants obtained their judgment against him, but after the institution of their suit. This would have been a good defense to the action, if pleaded puis darrein continuance. The complainant tendered his plea at the proper time, and was refused the benefit of it, not because it was adjudged insufficient as a defense, but because the court considered they had no discretion to allow it. The mandate from this court was probably made without reference to the possible consequences which might flow from it. At all events, it operated unjustly by precluding the plaintiff from an opportunity of making a just and legal defense to the action. The payment was made whilst the cause was pending here. The party was guilty of no laches, but lost the benefit of his defense by an accident over which he had no control. He is, therefore, in the same condition as if the defense had arisen after judgment; which would entitle him to relief audita querela, or bill in equity. We are, therefore, of the opinion that the complainant was entitled to the relief prayed for in the bill, and that the decree of the court below should be reversed."

The cause was thereupon remanded to the circuit court for further proceedings to be had therein, in conformity with the above opinion. Vide 9 How., 313, 314, Humphreys v. Leggett et al. On the filing of the mandate in this latter case, the defendants (the present appellants) being ruled by the circuit court to answer the bill for the injunction, admit by their answer the recovery of their judgment against Humphreys as surety for Bland. They acknowledge their belief of the judgments in the state court against the sheriff and his surety, and the levy under those judgments, and the return of satisfaction upon the executions by the proper officer, but allege that the judgments were fraudulently suffered in order to defeat the appellants; that no money was paid under the pretended sale, and that the property was retained by Humphreys. In an amended answer, filed by leave of the court, the appellants allege that Bland, the sheriff, had transferred the judgments in the state court, for $10,524, to Humphreys, who, under that assignment, had received the sum of $18,000; that he had not discharged the penalty of the sheriff's bond, and from various sources had received funds exceeding all his liabilities arising therefrom. Subsequently, viz.: in 1851, the appellants, by a cross-bill against the appellee, charged that Bland, to indemnify the appellee as surety in the bond of 1837, had assigned certain debts and other subjects of property, real and personal, to an amount more than equal to the penalty of that bond; that among these subjects were the fee bills due to Bland, as sheriff, to a large amount, and also the judgments set forth in the original bill as having been recovered in the state courts; and that these judgments had been discharged by Humphreys by notes purchased by him at the depreciation of fifty cents in the dollar. To this cross-bill a demurrer was interposed by Humphreys, but, upon being ruled by the court to answer, he admitted that in March, 1840, Bland conveyed, in a deed of that date, to Volney Stamps, the property mentioned in that deed, in trust to indemnify the appellee as surety in the official bond of Bland, of November, 1837, and to indemnify the same appellee and one Flowers, as sureties for Bland on his official bond of 1839, and to save them harmless against all loss and damage, and all money paid, or charge or expense to be incurred, in consequence of being sureties in the said official bonds. He admits that so much of the property as could be found has been sold by the trustee, and that from the proceeds of sale, after deducting the expenses of sale, respondent has received three fourths, amounting to $3,825, and the said Flowers one fourth, amounting to $1,275, which make the whole amount that has been realized from the trust fund. He admits that in 1840, for his further indemnity, Bland assigned him all the fees then due to the former as Sheriff of Claiborne County, but alleges that from this source there has been received an aggregate amount of only $3,288.17, as shown by the statements of the persons employed in the collection of those fees, filed as exhibits with the answer. The respondent further admits, that after the recovery by the Planters' Bank of the $12,325.22 against said Bland and respondent, which recovery was founded on an original judgment of the said bank against P. Hoopes, J. H. Moore, and John M. Carpenter, the said Bland claiming to be the owner of that judgment, did assign all his rights and interests therein to respondent, for his indemnity, as he had to pay the penalty of the bond.

The respondent claims the benefit of that judgment, but alleges that he has collected nothing under it from either Hoopes or Moore, each of whom became insolvent prior to 1840, and still continued insolvent. That the judgment of the Planters' Bank against Campbell Pierson and Moore, for $3,702.66, had always been unproductive and worthless, and that nothing had been or would be received therefrom, by reason of the insolvency of the defendants in that judgment. That in a suit pending in the Superior Court of Chancery of the State of Mississippi, upon a creditor's bill, the respondent has exhibited the former judgment of the Planters' Bank for $10,855.93, as a claim against the estate of H. Carpenter & Co., and the commissioner has reported it as a valid claim for that amount, with interest thereon from November 1st, 1840. That this report having been excepted to, and remaining still a subject of contest, the Court of Chancery had in the mean time, out of the funds of the estate, ordered the payment to the appellee of the amount of the said judgment or claim for $10,855.93 with interest, amounting in the whole to $18,852.75, upon his entering into bond with security to refund that amount in the event that it should be disallowed by the court. With this answer denying his having been indemnified, were exhibited as parts thereof, the deed of trust from Bland, the amount of fees collected under the assignment from Bland, and a statement of the account between Bland and Humphreys. With the original bill of Humphreys were exhibited also the bonds in which he was bound as surety, the records of the judgments on motion against the sheriff and Humphreys; and by the deposition of Maury, the attorney for the Planters' Bank, was proved the satisfaction of those judgments by sales of the property of Humphreys under execution. At the May Term of the Circuit Court, in the year 1856, this cause having been submitted to the court upon the original bill, the answer and replication, and the exhibits and proofs, and upon the cross-bill and the answer thereto, and upon the exhibits therewith, the following decree was then made: It is ordered, adjudged and decreed, that the injunction heretofore granted in this cause be made perpetual, and that the defendants, Leggett, Smith and Lawrence, and their agents and attorneys, be, and they are hereby forever enjoined and restrained from taking out any execution upon a certain judgment rendered on the law side of this court, on the 14th day of May, 1845, in favor of Alexander McNutt, Governor, suing for the use of Leggett, Smith and Lawrence, against the said Humphreys, the complainant, for the sum of $6,355.33, being the judgment mentioned in the bill of complaint in this cause, and that they be forever enjoined and restrained from taking or adopting any step or proceeding to enforce the payment of the said judgment by the complainant Humphreys, or the collection thereof out of his estate. And it is further adjudged and decreed, that the said complainant do recover of the said defendants his costs of suit to be taxed." This decree having been brought by appeal before the court, its legality and justice are now the subjects for our examination.

With reference to the defense essayed by the defendant in the suit of McNutt v. Bland, after the filing of the mandate of this court in that cause, the opinion of this court in the case of Humphreys v. Leggett et al. would seem to be conclusive, both as to the period at which the defense was proffered, and the legitimacy and sufficiency of the defense, if substantiated by proof. The facts tendered in defense coming into existence after the issues previously made up, were not on that account less essentially connected with the character of the controversy, nor could the defendant for that reason have been justly deprived of their influence upon that controversy. He appears to have sought to avail himself of the earliest and only opportunity for alleging them by plea puis darrein continuance. In support of his right so to plead, it would be adding nothing to the clearly expressed opinion of this court in the 9th of Howard, to refer to cases collated in elementary treatises on pleading.

In judging of the character or suffciency of the defense alleged for the exemption of the appellee, there should be taken as a guide the rule, which is perhaps without an exception, that sureties are never held responsible beyond the clear and absolute terms and meaning of their undertakings. Presumptions or equities are never allowed to enlarge or in any degree to change their legal obligations. This rule is thus forcibly put by Chancellor Kent in the 3d Commentaries, p. 124, where he says: "When the contract of a guarantor or surety is duly ascertained and understood by a fair and liberal construction of the instrument, the principle is well settled, that the case must be brought strictly within the terms of the guaranty, and the liability of the surety cannot be extended by implication." It will be seen that, to a certain extent, even the creditor whose claim the surety has under the terms of his obligation been compelled to satisfy, may be required to co-operate in effecting the indemnity of the latter. Thus it is said, on the same page of the work just quoted, that "the claim against a surety is strictissimi juris; and it is a well settled principle, that a surety who pays the debt of his principal, will in a clear case in equity be substituted in the place of the creditor to all the liens held by him to secure the payment of his debt; and the creditor is bound to preserve them unimpaired when he intends to look to the surety." For this doctrine are cited numerous English and American authorities.

In the case of Graves v. McCall, 1 Wash. Rep., 364, it is said by the Court of Appeals of Virginia, "that a court of equity will not charge a surety farther than he is bound at law; but if a surety bound at law cannot be charged there for the want of the instrument of which the creditor is deprived by accident or fraud, a court of equity will restore the paper to its legal force."

In the case of The United States v. White et. al., 1 Wash. Cir. Ct. 417, it is ruled by Washington, Justice, "that a surety can never be bound beyond the scope of his engagement, and therefore a surety for the faithful service of B as clerk to C, who afterwards enters into partnership with D, is not liable for unfaithful conduct to C and D." The same law has been explicitly and repeatedly ruled by this court, as will be seen in the cases of Miller v. Stewart, 9 Wheat., 680; of McGill v. The Bank of the United States, 12 Wheat., 511; and The United States v. Boyd et al., 15 Pet., 187.

The principle which limits the liability of the surety by the penalty of his bond, inheres intrinsically in the character of his engagement. He does not undertake to perform the acts of duties stipulated by his principal, and would not be permitted to control their performance; and could not, where his principal was a public officer, legally assume the functions of that principal. The undertaking of the surety is essentially a pledge to make good the misfeasance or non feasance of his principal to an amount co-exensive with the penalty of his bond. In addition to this interpretation, resulting from the character of the obligation of the surety, the Statute of Mississippi, which necessarily enters into and controls all contracts made under its authority, expressly limits the responsibility of a surety in a sheriff's bond to the amount of the penalty of that bond. Vide Hut. Miss. Co., p. 441, art. 3, sec. 1. Indeed, it has scarcely been contested in argument in this case, that the extent of the surety's liability upon the sheriff's bond was measured by the amount of the penalty. The great effort of counsel has been to show in this case that satisfaction of the penalty of the bond has not been honestly made, but has been fraudulently evaded.

1st. By the provisions of the deed of trust for the indemnity of the appellee, and in the application of the property thereby conveyed, and by the subsequent assignment of fees to a large amount, exceeding together in value the judgments of the Planters' Bank against the sheriff and his surety.

2d. By the sale of the property of the appellee under the executions in behalf of the Planters' Bank at a sacrifice greatly below its value.

The force of those positions will now be considered.

Whilst it may be conceded that a fraudulent combination between the officer and his surety for the purpose of shielding the property of both or either from just responsibility, and in contemplation of delinquency in the former, would have the effect of vitiating any compact or instrument made with such a design, it is undeniable that an open and honest effort of a principal to protect his surety against casualties incident to a responsibility about to be assumed for him, cannot be obnoxious to objection; and it is equally clear, that the simple fact of the existence of such an effort, unattended by any known indicium of fraud, and unassailed by plain or probable direct proofs, can warrant no just impeachment of such an effort, which may be praiseworthy and just with reference to its object, and calculated to promote the performance of services to the public which otherwise could not be undertaken. The practice of providing such an indemnity for sureties is known to be usual and frequent, and it would be difficult to imagine an objection, either legal or moral, to its application to the extent to which the surety had been made answerable upon his bond. The right of a debtor in the first instance, to apply his payments wherever his funds are not specifically bound, is universally admitted. The judgment of the circuit court in the case of McNutt v. Bland, having been against the plaintiff, and the deed by Bland for the indemnity of the appellee having been executed for a bona fide consideration pending the proceedings on the writ of error to the circuit court, and no final judgment of that court having been entered to this day there was no specific lien on the property of Bland which prevented its appropriation in exoneration of his surety, or which forbade any payments or assignments by him in discharge of his liability. A strong illustration of this position may be seen in the case of The United States v. Cochran, decided by Marshall, Chief Justice, and reported in the 2d vol. of Brockenbrough's Reports, p. 274. It is one of that class in which priority is claimed for the United States in instances of insolvency of their debtors. It is thus stated by the judge:

"Robert Cochran, Collector at the port of Wilmington, N. C., being very largely indebted to the United States, made a deed of his property for their benefit. Previous to the execution of this deed, he deposited $10,000, the amount of the bond executed to the United States for the faithful performance of his duty, in a trunk which was placed in the bank, and absconded. From Baltimore he addressed a letter to his sureties, requesting the trunk to be taken out, and the money to be applied to their exoneration. The money was received at the Treasury, and the bond given up. It being afterwards discovered that this was the money of the Collector, and not of the sureties, this suit is brought to compel the sureties to pay the amount of the bond, considering the money received as constituting no equitable discharge as to them. * * * The Act of Congress does not transfer the property itself to the United States, but subjects it to their debts in the first instance. The assignee holds it as the debtor would hold it, liable to the claim of the United States, and if he converts it to his own use, or puts it out of the reach of the United States, he is undoubtedly responsible for its value. * * * But the power of the debtor to apply his payments is co-extensive with that of the creditor. This principle has, it is believed, never been denied. If it be correct, then the power of Mr. Cochran to apply this sum of money in discharge of the bond, and in exoneration of the sureties to it, is co-extensive with that of the United States to make the same application of it. If, then, Mr. Cochran had, without any assignment of his property, paid this money into the Treasury, with a direction that it should be applied to the bond, he would have exercised a right which the law gives to every debtor. * * * Does the transfer of this money to the sureties change the law of the case? We think not. It has been very properly argued that the Act of Congress gives to the debt due to the United States priority over debts due to individuals; but not to one part of the debt due to the Udited States, over any other part of it; nor does it vest the property absolutely in the United States, though it gives them the right to pursue it for the purpose of appropriating it in payment. It would seem to follow, that the right to apply payments whilst the money is in the hands of the debtors, is not affected by the Act of Congress, but remains as it would stand independent of that Act. If, then, the sureties had declared to the Treasury Department that the money was received from Mr. Cochran, to be paid in discharge of their bond, and had tendered it in payment thereof, we think the tender would have been valid, and might have been pleaded in a suit on the bond."

This was a case where there was a legal priority in the creditor, where there existed a quasi lien, or a restriction upon the power of the debtor to dispose of his property, so as to exempt it or its value from the claim of the creditor. In the case under consideration, no such restriction existed; no lien by judgment or other specific claim, upon the property conveyed in trust to Stamps; and no evidence having been adduced, of a fraudulent purpose in making that conveyance, no valid objection is perceived to an application of the proceeds of that conveyance towards the indemnity of the surety; and these proceeds, together with the amount of the sheriff's fee bills collected, it is shown by the testimony, are far short of the penalty of the bond discharged by the surety.

The right to any surplus which, upon a settlement between the appellee and Bland or his representatives, may remain in the hands of the former, we regard as not involved in nor pertinent to this controversy, which relates regularly and exclusively to the question whether the appellee, as the surety for Bland, has fulfilled the exigency of his bond by a satisfaction of the penalty.

In answer to the objection which has been urged, and founded on the alleged sacrifice of the property of the appellee in the sale under the judgments of the Planters' Bank, it may be remarked, that the relevancy or force of such an objection is not perceived. The questions here are these, and these only, viz.: whether the penalty of the bond executed by the appellee has been satisfied, or whether there remains still a portion of that penalty of which the appellants can claim the benefit. The judgments in favor of the bank, the levy upon the property of the appellee, the sale and satisfaction to the full amount of the penalty, are facts all established of record. Whatever sacrifice of the property of the appellee by these undoubted proceedings may have been produced, is his loss, and his only, and can in no wise affect the validity of his release by the fulfillment of his obligation.

The decree of the Circuit Court is, therefore, affirmed, with costs.

EDWARD M. LIVERMORE AND DAVID SEXTON, Appts.,

v.

THOMAS A. JENCKES, ALEXANDER FARNUM, SAMUEL HARRIS AND STEPHEN WATERMAN.

Rhode Island assignment, when legal.

In Rhode Island an assignment is not voidable, as tending to hinder, delay and defraud creditors; because there is a reservation in it to the assignor of the dividends of such creditors as should refuse to become parties to it, and to release their demands in consideration of the dividends they might receive.

It would have been had the assignment been made in New York, by persons residing there.

But the assignment was made in Rhode Island, by a person, and to persons, residing there, and is in every particular just such an one as, by the laws of that State, merchants and others in failing circumstances, residing there, are allowed to make in favor of creditors, wherever the property of the assignor may be.

The complainants never acquired any lien upon the property in New York, so as to subject it legally or equitably to their demand.

Submitted Dec. 17, 1858. Decided Jan. 4, 1859.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York.

NOTE.—Assignment with preferences, when valid, when not. See note to Marbury v Brooks, 20 U. S. (7 Wheat.), 556.

The bill in this case was filed in the court below, by the appellants, as judgment creditors of the respondents, Harris & Waterman, to avoid an assignment made by Waterman to respondents, Jenckes and Farnum, in trust for the payment of the creditors of said Harris & Waterman, and Waterman individually. The assignor and assignees were citizens of Rhode Island, where the assignment was made. The circuit court, having found that the property, situated in the State of New York, covered by the assignment, had been converted into money and the proceeds transferred to Rhode Island prior to the filing of the bill in this case, that the complainants had no lien on said property, and that there was no fraud in making said assignment, entered a decree dismissing the bill, with costs.

From this decree the complainants took an appeal to this court.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Mr. C. L. Monell, for appellants:

1. The circuit court erred in not deciding that the assignment from Waterman to Jenckes and Farnum was fraudulent and void as affecting the complainants below, and the other creditors of Waterman residing within the State of New York at the time of the assignment, so far at least as the assignment affected the estate of the assignor within the State of New York at the time of the execution and delivery.

Waterman, being insolvent, and holding property in the State of New York, assigned to J. and F., giving certain preferences, and directing the residue to be paid to such of his creditors at large as should release their demand within six months, reserving to himself the dividends of such creditors as should refuse to release.

Such an assignment is adjudged fraudulent as to the creditors, by the laws of the State of New York. As to the property situated within the State of New York and the claims of resident creditors, the laws of the State of New York are paramount, and do not yield to the laws of the domicil of the debtor.

The States have not seen fit to lodge in Congress power to harmonize the conflict of their internal systems. Such a power, if lodged in the Federal Government, would necessarily involve the right to carry the laws and systems of polity prevailing in one State, within the territorial limits of another.

Story's Confl. Laws, sec. 18.

The language used by Mr. Justice Grier in Caskie v. Webster, 2 Wall., Jr., 131, would, on a cursory examination, appear to imply that it was a part of the duty of the federal courts to apply to controversies of this character a sort of modified jus gentium, adapted to harmonize with the objects and purposes of the union of the States. A careful examination of that case will show that such was not his intent.

The court must give the same judgment which the courts of the State of New York would have been bound to give, had they adjudicated the case.

See remarks of Ch. J. Marshall in Elmendorf v. Taylor, 10 Wheat., 159.

By the laws of the State of New York, an insolvent's assignment containing the clause requiring creditors to release or forfeit their dividends, and directing them to be paid in that case to the assignor, is fraudulent as to creditors, and is void.

The Revised Statutes re-enact the Statute of 13 Eliz., which is an affirmance of the common law.

2 R. S., 137, sec. 1; Meeker v. Wilson, 1 Gall., 419.

The question of the invalidity of such a reservation, was finally settled in the State of New York by the decision in Grover v. Wakeman, 11 Wend., 187, in the Court for the Correction of Errors.

Goodrich v. Downs, 6 Hill, 438; see, also, Hyslop v. Clarke, 14 Johns., 458; Austin v. Bell, 20 Johns., 442; Seaving v. Brinkerhoff, 5 Johns. Ch., 329; Murray v. Riggs, 15 Johns., 571.

The assignment being of a nature forbidden by the laws of New York, according to the acknowledged principles governing the jurisprudence of that State, it cannot be asserted there as affecting property within that State, and as against a creditor of the assignor there resident.

In Leroy v. Crowningshield, 2 Mas., 157, Judge Story says: that "personal contracts are to have the same validity, interpretation and obligatory force in every other country, which they have in the country where they are made or are to be executed." "An exception is, that no nation is bound to enforce or hold valid any contract which is injurious to its own rights and those of its own citizens, or which offend public morals or violate the public faith."

The same doctrine was held by Judge Washington in Ogden v. Saunders, 12 Wheat., 259.

In The Watchman, 1 Ware, 232, Ware, Dist. J., says: "No principle can be more incontrovertible than this: that every nation has the exclusive legislative and judicial authority within its own territorial limits."

No rule or notion of comity can require a State to permit to foreigners privileges denied to its own citizens. Per Judge Nelson, in Frost v. Brisbin, 19 Wend., 15.

Huberus says: "The effect of a contract entered into at any place, will be allowed according to the law of that place, in other countries, if no inconvenience will result therefrom to the citizens of that other country, with respect to the right which they demand."

See translation in note, 3 Dall., 370; Olivier v. Townes, 2 Mart., N. S., 93, 102; Story, Confl. Laws, sec. 390; see, also, Hunter v. Potts, 4 T. R., 192; Potter v. Brown, 5 East, 124.

The greatest diversity exists between the insolvent systems of the different States and foreign countries; all, however, recognize, in greater or less degree, the right of the State to assume the disposition of the estates of insolvents.

If the insolvent or bankrupt laws of a foreign country or State are not permitted to have any extra-territorial efficacy, for the reason that every State must determine for itself the best mode of administering the estates of insolvents, with how much more reason should we refuse to permit a citizen of a foreign State voluntarily to make such a disposition of his property in this State, at variance with our insolvent laws.

Le Chevalier v. Lynch, 1 Doug., 76; Abraham v. Plestoro, 8 Wend., 538, 551; Harrison v. Sterry, 5 Cranch, 298; Ogden v. Saunders, 12 Wheat., 213; 2 Kent's Com., 330, 331.

The cases on insolvency and administration, are similar in principle in this respect.

Harrison v. Sterry, 5 Cranch, 289.

In Ingraham v. Geyer, 13 Mass., 146, it was held that the assignment, though valid in Pennsylvania, was prejudicial to citizens of Massachusetts who were creditors of the insolvent, and therefore void, as far as debts due to the insolvent from citizens of Massachusetts were concerned. The principle upon which this case was decided, is more fully presented in Blake v. Williams, 6 Pick., 286, and is in strict accordance with the authorities above cited. Under the laws of Massachusetts, all insolvents' assignments were held void for want of consideration, except so far as creditors had actually become parties to them.

Nostrand v. Atwood, 19 Pick., 281; see, also, Fall River Iron Works v. Croade, 15 Pick., 11; Means v. Hapgood, 19 Pick., 105.

In Maine, in Fox v. Adams, 5 Greenl., 245, the court held all foreign assignments void as to the attaching creditors; but it appears to be doubtful whether the rule may not be there limited to the reasonable bounds contended for in the present case.

Pearson v. Crosby, 23 Me., 261; The Watchman, 1 Ware, 232.

In Connecticut, the doctrine contended for is fully established.

Atwood v. Protection Ins. Co., 14 Conn., 555; Richmondville Man. Co. v. Prall, 9 Conn., 487.

So in New Jersey.

Varnum v. Camp, 1 Green., 326.

And in Missouri.

Brown v. Knox, 6 Mo., 302.

In Pennsylvania, the precise point does not appear to be adjudicated, although there are floating dicta adverse to the principle contended for.

Speed v. May, 17 Pa., 91; see, also, Law v. Mills, 18 Pa., 185.

These cases are very brief, and evidently received little examination or careful consideration.

The counsel also referred to the case of Caskie v. Webster, 2 Wall., Jr., 131, decided by Judge Grier in the third circuit, and contended that it was not controlling. The courts of the United States must either recognize that the decisions of each State are final in all questions of state origin and jurisdiction, or they must harmonize the discord, by deciding independently of the state courts upon authority and principle.

Should the latter course be pursued, it remains for us to consider how the question of the validity of such assignment stands in that point of view. In Albert v. Winn, 7 Gill, 446, decided in the Court of Appeals of the State of Maryland, the court states the condition of the question upon the state authorities at that time.

See authorities cited in 1 Am. Lead. Cas., 69, 85; see. also, Sanderson v. Bradford, 10 N. H., 260; 19 Pick., 11, 281.

Massachusetts was improperly placed among the latter States; for in that State all assignments being held void, except so far as the creditors actually became parties to them, the question could arise.

Counsel also referred to the case of Phippen v. Durham, 8 Grat., 457, as supporting his view on principle.

Since the decision in Albert v. Winn, New Jersey has acceded to the States holding such assignments void.

Varnum v. Camp, 1 Green, 326.

Rhode Island should be added to the States sustaining the clause. At the present time, the States whose systems of jurisprudence forbid such clauses, are New York, Ohio, North Carolina, Mississippi, Missouri, Alabama, Connecticut, Illinois, Pennsylvania, New Hampshire, Maine, Maryland and New Jersey.

On the other side stand Rhode Island and South Carolina, side by side.

See, also, the opinion of Marshall, Ch., J., in Brashear v. West, 7 Pet., 608; Judge Curtis in Heydock v. Stanhope, 1 Curt., 471; and remarks of Judge Nelson in Cunningham v. Freeborn, 11 Wend., 256.

The assignment, therefore, being void, the appellants are entitled to a decree against the assignees for the payment of their debt.

2. The assignment to J. & F. being void by the laws of the State of New York, the appellants were entitled to a decree in the court below, for an account of the property or the proceeds thereof, which came into the assignee's hands from the State of New York.

Had this case been carried to a decree in the New York courts, the appellants would have been entitled to an account against the assignees, as above stated.

Upon these points, the counsel referred to and discussed the following authorities:

Beck v. Burdett, 1 Paige, 308; N. Y. Rev. Stat., part III, ch. 1, tit. 2, sec. 58; Hadden v. Spader, 20 Johns., 553.

By the law of the State of New York, the assignment was void as to creditors. The test of that is, that a creditor may by a levy take the property out of the hands of the assignee; and the invalidity of the assignment is a bar to an action of trespass brought by the assignee.

Hyslop v. Clarke, 14 Johns., 458.

The cases of Hone v. Henriques, 13 Wend., 243, and Mills v. Argall, 6 Paige, 577, relied on by the respondent, are not in point.

The assigned estate, notwithstanding the fraudulent conveyance, remaining as against creditors the property of the insolvent, no act of the assignees could defeat the right of the creditors to have their estate applied to the payment of their debt.

Ames v. Blunt, 5 Paige, 22; Hadden v. Spader, 20 Johns., 553.

The pretended sale to Hill, Carpenter & Co., far from being a protection to the assignees, was in itself an act of fraud directly aimed against the N. Y. creditors.

The conveyance of the proceeds of this sale into the State of Rhode Island, does not relieve the assignee from liability to the New York creditors.

If the act of Waterman in assigning was an illegal act, that of the assignees, in carrying the assets of the estate to Rhode Island, was equally illegal.

In the first place, the assigned effects were not, in fact, transferred to Rhode Island; but even if they had been so transferred, there are two difficulties in making good the respondents' position.

It is not made to appear, that under the laws of Rhode Island any such equities have attached.

If they have attached, that is no ground of protection to the assignees in New York.

The assignees do not pretend to have transferred all the assigned effects to the State of Rhode Island.

As to the part remaining in New York, the appellants are clearly entitled to an account.

3. Even should the appellants fail to establish the invalidity of the assignment, yet they are entitled to an account of the amount in the hands of the assignees, arising from the lapsed dividends of non-releasing creditors. These dividends belong, by the terms of the assignment, to the assignees. As to this fund, we are clearly entitled to a decree of payment on account of our debt.

Edmeston v. Lyde, 1 Paige, 637.

Messrs. Thomas A. Jenckes and Clarence A. Seward, for appellees:

1. The assignment was valid inter partes, and the assignees legally acquired and legally translated to Rhode Island, the property covered by it.

1. The assignment was valid lege loci.

See point 4, 2 b.

2. It was also valid in the State of New York, until its invalidity had been judicially declared.

3. The action of the assignees in reducing the property to their possession and removing it prior to such judicial declaration, cannot be impeached.

Henriques v. Hone, 2 Edw. Ch., 120; Mills v. Argall, 6 Paige, 577; Porter v. Williams, 9 N. Y., 149, and cases there cited; Averill v. Loucks, 6 Barb., 477.

2. The appellants had not, at the time of filing their bill, acquired that lien upon the estate which is an indispensable prerequisite to the granting of the relief sought.

At that time the entire assigned estate, with the exception of a few worthless claims, was in possession of the assignees in Rhode Island. The assignees were Rhode Island creditors of the New York insolvents. These debts followed the persons of the creditors, and if collectable, were the property of the assignees in Rhode Island. But even if the debts had been collectable, or if the assignees had casually brought some portion of the assigned estate into New York prior to the filing of the bill, the appellants would not, by service of process upon the assignees, have acquired any lien upon the assigned estate. The period during which the lien could attach, ceased when the assignees took possession of the property transferred to Rhode Island, and there became vested with the title to it. Without such lien, the title of the assignees cannot be questioned.

The Watchman, 1 Ware, 241; The U. S. v. The Bank of The U. S., 8 Rob. La., 415; Richardson v. Leavitt, 1 La. Ann., 430.

3. The relief sought by the appellants cannot be granted consistently with the rights of other creditors of Waterman, who are not now before the court.

The Fall River Works v. Croade, 15 Pick., 11.

4. A conflict between the lex fori and the lex loci, does not necessarily or properly arise. It is only in cases of rival claimants to property within the jurisdiction of the lex fori, that such a conflict can arise.

But if the question of the construction of the assignment is necessarily before the court, then, both upon principle and authority, it should sustain the assignment.

The question is one of law, and not of fact. By the Revised Statutes of the State of New York (2 R. S., 138, sec. 4) the question of fraud in an assignment is a question of fact, and as such is to be decided, first, upon the evidence, and second, by the language of the instrument.

The question of fraud in fact, does not arise.

The bill is verified and calls for an answer under oath. The answers are fully responsive to all the charges of fraud alleged in the bill, and so far as they are responsive, are evidence for the defendants, to be taken as absolutely true because not disproved.

Hough v. Richardson, 3 Story, 692; Langdon v. Goddard, 2 Story, 267.

When the question to be decided arises upon the language of the assignment, it becomes one of law rather than of fact. Its answer determines the legal construction or effect of the instrument.

Cunningham v. Freeborn, 3 Paige, 557; Sheldon v. Dodge, 4 Den., 217; Goodrich v. Downs, 6 Hill, 438.

The single question, then, presented for the consideration of the court is, is this assignment upon its face valid or fraudulent, within the State of New York. It must be borne in mind:

1st. That the assignor and the assignees were neither citizens of, nor residents in, New York. They were citizens of Rhode Island and residents of Providence.

2d. That the assignment was not executed in New York, but was executed in Rhode Island, the domicil of the parties.

3d. That by the laws of Rhode Island, it is valid.

4th. That it operated upon personal property only in the State of New York.

5th. That the personal property is not within the jurisdiction of the lex fori.

6th. That the parties proposing the question, have no lien upon the property.

Personal property has no locality. It follows the law of the person. The law, therefore, can only reach his property through him.

Sill v. Worswick, 1 H. Bl., 690 Pipon v. Pipon, Amb., 25.

Hence it follows, that a transfer of property by its owner, whether inter vivos or post mortem valid by the law of his domicil, will, if made before the law of another country has actually attached upon the property by a proceeding against its owner, be esteemed valid within every other jurisdiction where the property may be.

Story, Confl. L., secs. 380, 383, 384.

The law of the domicil regulates the succession to, and the distribution of, the personal property of the intestate.

Story, Conf. of L.; Holmes v. Remsen, 20 Johns., 267.

The assignment is valid in Rhode Island. This is proved by the answer of the assignees and by the decisions of the courts of that State.

Stewart v. Spencer, 1 Curt., 157, Dockerry v. Dockerry, 2 R. I., 547; Heydock v. Stanhope, 1 Curt., 471.

This court should interpret the assignment as it would be interpreted by the courts of Rhode Island, not only in compliance with authority, nor upon principles of comity only, but upon principles of justice. Contracts are to be interpreted by the lex loci, to which the parties had reference when the contract was made. The integrity of the instrument where, as here, there is no fraud in fact, is to be tried by the law of the place of its execution.

Brashear v. West, 7 Pet., 608; Dundas v. Bowler, 3 McLean, 397.

The rule is too well established to be now shaken or disturbed.

Speed v. May, 17 Pa., 91; Adams v. Storey, 1 Paine, 100; Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 13 Pet., 519; Van Reimsdyk v. Kane, 1 Gall., 371; Leroy v. Crowinshield, 2 Mas., 151.

The only remaining question is upon the interpretation of the instrument itself. By what law shall the assignment be interpreted? In England, effect is given to the claims of foreign assignees as against creditors resident there, and this, whether the assignment be voluntary or in invitum.

Locke, Attach., 36; Sill v. Worswick, 1 H. Bl., 690; Story, Confl. of L., secs. 408, 409.

The rule is not recognized to an equal extent in the United States. A distinction obtains here, between bankruptcy in invitum and a voluntary assignment. Any extraterritorial effect is almost universally denied to an assignment made compulsorily under foreign bankrupt laws, while to an assignment voluntarily made ex mero motu by a failing debtor, effect is or is not given, as the authorities of each particular State may require. These authorities are of course numerous, and it is to be admitted, conflicting. Numerically they uphold the assignment. The rule sustaining the lex domicilii, and the assignment to which all the authorities refer, is thus stated by Story in his Conflict of Laws (sec. 8): "It is therefore admitted, that a voluntary assignment by a party, made according to the law of his domicil, will pass the personal estate whatever may be its locality, abroad as well as at home." The distinction is also alluded to in the case of The Watchman, 1 Ware, 240, "The law separates that which is derived from the public power, from that which comes from the will of the party. Tried by this principle, if the assignment of the debtor in the present case is valid in Massachusetts, it is valid everywhere, and operated a transfer of his property wherever situated; for the transfer was made by the simple will of the owner, and not by virtue of the public power, as in the case of bankruptcy.

1st. The authorities supporting this rule are as follows:

Saunders v. Williams, 5 N. H., 213; Sanderson v. Bradford, 10 N. H., 260; Frazier v. Fredericks, 4 Zab., 162; Means v. Hapgood, 19 Pick., 105; Fox v. Adams, 5 Greenl., 245; Atwood v. Protection Ins. Co., 14 Conn., 555; Holmes v. Remsen, 4 Johns. Ch., 460; The Same v. The Same, 20 Johns., 266; Abraham v. Plestow, 8 Wend., 566; Johnson v. Hunt, 23 Wend., 87; Hooper v. Tuckerman, 3 Sandf., 316; Hoyt v. Thompson, 5 N. Y., 353, decided in 1851; Carnley v. Tuckerman, N. Y. S. P. T. R., 1st Judic. Dist.; Milne v. Moreton, 6 Binn., 353; Speed v. May, 17 Pa., 91; Mulliken v. Aughinbaugh, 1 Penn., 117; Lowry v. Hall, 2 W. & S., 181; Law v. Mills, 18 Pa., 186; Greene v. Mowry, 2 Bailey, 168; West v. Tupper, 1 Bailey, 193; The U. S. v. The Bank of the U. S., 8 Rob. La., 262, 418; Richardson v. Leavitt, 1 La. Ann., 430; The Watchman, 1 Ware, 232; Dundas v. Bowler, 3 McLean, 397; Caskie v. Webster, 2 Wall., Jr., 132; Ogden v. Saunders, 12 Wheat., 213; Harrison v. Sterry, 5 Cranch, 298; Brashear v. West, 7 Pet., 608; The Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 18 Pet., 519; Black v. Zacharie, 3 How., 488.

In no case have the claims of the assignees been disregarded, when the property covered by the assignment has become vested in them and they have transmitted it beyond the jurisdiction of the court whose aid is invoked by the attacking creditor, before he has acquired any lien upon it.

The English cases do not hold such an assignment void.

Jackson v. Lomas, 4 T. R., 166; The King v. Watson, 3 Price, 6.

There is no conflict in the decisions of the local courts of the several States as to the effect upon an assignment of a clause requiring a release.

In Massachusetts, New Hampshire (Haven v. Richardson, 5 N. H., 113, before the Statute of that State), Pennsylvania, Virginia, South Carolina, Alabama and Rhode Island, the assignment is held valid; and in New York, Ohio, Missouri, Connecticut, Maine and Illinois, it is held to be void.

1 Am. Lead. Cas. 94, 95, and cases there cited.

In Pearpoint v. Graham, 4 Wash. C. C., 232, the assignment was upheld, and the decision in this case was followed by Judge Story in Halsey v. Fairbanks, 4 Mason, 206, and in the case of Brashear v. West, 7 Pet., 608, where the assignment excluded from the benefit of its provisions all creditors who should not, within ninety days, execute a release. The question of the construction of this assignment is not an open question, but is to be decided by reference to local law, and the court must follow the decision in Brashear v. West, and adopt the construction given by the courts of Rhode Island, and thus also the assignment must be sustained, and the decree below must be affirmed with costs.

Mr. Justice Wayne delivered the opinion of the court:

This bill was filed by the appellants in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York, as judgment creditors of the respondents, Waterman & Samuel Harris, to avoid an assignment made by Waterman to the respondents, Jenckes & Farnum, in trust, for the payment of the creditors of Harris & Waterman, and of Waterman individually.

The appellants seek to avoid the assignment, on the ground that it was voidable, from its tending to hinder, delay and defraud creditors; because there is a reservation in it to the assignee of the dividends of such creditors as should refuse to become parties to it, and to release their demands in consideration of the dividends they might receive. It appears that a large amount of the property conveyed was in the State of New York; that the appellants resided there, and that they were then creditors of Harris & Waterman. The trusts in the deed were, first, to pay the expenses of the assignment; secondly, to pay the debts of several preferred creditors of Harris & Waterman, and of Waterman individually; and thirdly, to pay all the residue of the debts of Waterman individually, and as a member of the firm of Harris & Waterman. The assignment contained the following proviso: "Provided, that none of my said creditors named in the third class of this assignment shall be entitled to receive any dividend or benefit under the deed of assignment, unless they shall execute and deliver to my said assignee, within six months from the date hereof, a full release and discharge, under seal, of all their claims and demands against me, the assignor; but the dividends on the claims and demands of the creditors who shall not execute such release shall be paid over to me, the said assignor, or to such person as I shall appoint."

It appears that Harris, the copartner of Waterman, had given to the latter a bill of sale of all their partnership property; that the firm was then dissolved; that Waterman had the possession of it, and that he afterwards made the deed of assignment to Jenckes & Farnum. Now, Jenckes & Farnum received and held the property under the assignment, as well that which was in New York as all that was elsewhere. A part of the copartnership property was the Owasco Lake mill, situated at Auburn, Cayuga County, State of New York, and it is admitted that it exceeded in value the debt due by Harris & Waterman to the complainants. As to that property, James Fitton was a copartner; but it appears that he joined with Harris & Waterman in dissolving the copartnership, and in authorizing Waterman to "settle up" its business, having on the same day agreed that Harris should convey to Waterman the bond and mortgage which he had given to Harris & Waterman, for the purchase money due by him for an undivided fourth part of the Owasco Lake mill. Thus Waterman was made the sole owner of it. He supposed himself at that time to be solvent, and that he could carry on the business of the mill, and worked it for some time; but finding himself unable to do so, he conveyed it to Jenckes & Farnum, with all the other property of the late concern which had become his, with the intention that they should, as his assignees, make an equitable distribution of it among his creditors; and, in his answer to the bill of the complainants, he declares he did so without any fraudulent intent to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors. Waterman had been, was then, and was when he made the assignment, a citizen of the State of Rhode Island. The property assigned was in different States. Jenckes & Farnum accepted the trusts of the assignment. Waterman ceased to have any control over it, and, for aught that appears, the assignees have executed their trust unimpeachably. After the assignment was made, the complainants obtained, in the Supreme Court of New York, a judgment upon their demand against Harris & Waterman.

They have now brought their bill as judgment creditors against Waterman and Jenckes & Farnum, the assignees, to avoid the assignment; alleging that they have a lien upon the property in New York or its proceeds, as creditors of Harris & Waterman, because Waterman's assignment to Jenckes & Farnum contained a reservation to the assignor, which, by the laws of New York, was fraudulent. And so it would have been, had the assignment been made in that State, by persons residing there. But the assignment was made in the State of Rhode Island, by a person and to persons residing there, and is in every particular just such a one as, by the laws of that State, merchants and others in failing circumstances, residing there, are allowed to make in favor of creditors within that State and those residing elsewhere, wherever the property of the assignor may be. We see no cause for thinking it was fraudulently made. The respondents deny it upon their oaths, as responsively to the charge made by the complainants as that can be done. The latter have not sustained their charge by any proof whatever. For that cause alone, if there was no other, we should concur with the Circuit Judge in the decree given by him in this case. And we also concur with him, that the complainants never acquired nor ever had any lien upon the property in New York, so as to subject it legally or equitably to their demand against Harris & Waterman, either before or after it was carried into judgment in the Supreme Court of New York. Deeming the grounds stated, decisive of this controversy, we abstain from a discussion of other points learnedly and ably argued by the counsel in the cause, in their respective printed briefs. They were appropriate to the cause, but we do not deem them necessary for the decision of it.

We direct the affirmance of the decree given in the court below.

DEAN RICHMOND, Appt., v. THE CITY OF MILWAUKEE AND FERDINAND KUEHN.

Appeals, how regulated—value in controversy must be over $2,000, and be shown.

Appeals to this court, from circuit and district courts, are regulated by the Act of 1803, ch. 40, where not otherwise specially provided for by Act of Congress.

By that law no appeal will lie, unless the sum or value in controversy exceeds $2,000; and that fact must be shown to the court in order to give jurisdiction in the appeal.

Argued Dec. 10, 1858. Decided Jan. 10, 1859.

APPEAL from the District Court of the United States for the District of Wisconsin. The case is stated by the court.

Messrs. Brown and Ogden, for appellant.

Mr. J. R. Doolittle, for appellees.

Mr. Chief Justice Taney delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from the District Court of the United States for the District of Wisconsin, exercising the powers of a circuit court.

It appears that a bill was filed in that court by the appellant, praying an injunction to prohibit the conveyance of certain lots in the City of Milwaukee, which had been sold for the payment of city taxes assessed upon it by the Corporation.

The bill states that the City of Milwaukee is a Corporation, chartered by the State; that, under its charter and the Constitution and laws of the State, it is authorized to assess certain taxes for corporate purposes upon the lots and property in the city, and if the taxes are not paid according to law, to sell the lot upon which it is charged. The bill further sets forth, that the appellant was the owner of sundry lots in the City, which are particularly described by their respective numbers, and also the assessment imposed upon them, respectively, the manner and purposes for which it was imposed, and the proceedings of the corporate authorities under this assessment, and the sale of the lots to pay the amount claimed to be due.

And the bill then charges that the Corporation exceeded its powers in imposing these taxes, and even if lawfully imposed, that the proceedings afterwards had, were not conformable to the law of the State, which points out particularly the steps to be taken before the lot assessed can be sold. The bill charges, that upon the grounds above stated, the sale of his lots was illegal and invalid, and prays an injunction to prevent a conveyance to the purchaser, as such a conveyance would be a cloud upon his title.

The bill alleges that the lots so sold are worth $500, and that the taxes imposed exceed their value as assessed on the books of the Corporation, more than two hundred per cent.

The Corporation and their treasurer answered, and admitted the sale of the lots, and aver that the City had a lawful right to impose the tax; that their proceedings to recover it were fully authorized by law, and that the sales were valid, and will entitle the purchasers to a conveyance unless the appellant shall within three years redeem them, in the manner and upon the terms provided for by the law of the State where lands or lots have been sold for the non-payment of taxes.

Testimony was taken on both sides, which is set out in the transcript. But in the view which the court take of the case it is unnecessary to state it particularly, or to set out at large the various points in controversy between the parties upon the bill and answer, because, upon the appellant's own showing, this court have no jurisdiction.

Appeals to this court from the Circuit Courts of the United States, and from District Courts exercising the jurisdiction of Circuit Courts, are regulated by the Act of 1803, ch. 40, where not otherwise specially provided for by Act of Congress. There is no special provision in the Act establishing the District Court in Wisconsin which regulates appeals to this court, and consequently they are governed by the general law above referred to; and by that law no appeal will lie, unless the sum or value in controversy exceeds $2,000; and that fact must be shown to the court in order to give jurisdiction in the appeal.

Now, the matter in dispute in this case is the title to the lots which have been sold by the municipal authorities for the non-payment of the taxes. The taxes assessed were charged upon the respective lots, and created no personal responsibility upon the owner, the lots alone being liable for the payment. And the only evidence or averment of their value is the statement of the complainant in his bill, that they were worth more than $500, and his complaint that more than two hundred per cent. upon their value as mentioned in the books of the Corporation, was charged upon them by the assessment, and the proceedings of the City authorities under it. There is nothing in the allegations of the parties, or in the evidence, to show that the value of the lots in question exceeded $2,000, nor anything from which it can be inferred.

The appeal must, therefore, be dismissed for want of jurisdiction in this court.

THE UNION INSURANCE COMPANY,

Plffs. in Er.,

v.

JOHN BLAIR HOGE.

(See S. C., 21 How., 35–66.)

Mutual Insurance Company, who is member of —cash premiums and premium notes are a common fund—payment of premiums prescribed by the company—State construction of charter, when decisive.

In a mutual insurance company, a person insured upon a cash premium, without any further liability, is a member.

In a mutual insurance company, the premiums paid by each member for insurance constitute a common fund; and the cash premium as well represents the insured in such fund as the premium note.

In the absence of any prescribed mode of payment of premiums, the power to prescribe it by the company, is necessarily implied.

The construction of the New York Insurance Act of 1849, by the public officers of the State, that a charter is in accordance with it, should be regarded as decisive in a case of doubt.

Submitted Dec. 20, 1858. Decided Jan. 10, 1859.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of New York.

This suit was brought in the court below, by the defendant in error, on a certain policy of insurance to cover $2,500.

The Company based its defense on the ground that the Act of April 10, 1849, of the laws of New York, under which it was incorporated, authorized it to conduct its business on the plan of mutual insurance; that the receiving of a definite sum of money in lieu of a premium note for the policy of insurance in this case, was not warranted by the Act of 1849; and that the policy is void, as made without authority and in violation of said Statute. The plaintiff demurred. The court having sustained the demurrer and entered judgment in favor of the plaintiff, the defendant sued out this writ of error.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Henry Van Derlyn, for plaintiff in error:

The question to be decided by this court is: Is the policy of insurance issued by defendants for an advance cash premium paid to defendants, a valid policy as claimed by plaintiff; or is it invalid, because it was not founded on a premium note as claimed by defendants?

The Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of New York have decided that the policy in question was a valid policy. This decision is deemed erroneous; and to reverse it, this writ of error is brought.

1. The issuing of policies upon the plan of stock companies, and the receiving of a definite sum in lieu of a premium note, is not warranted by the Act of 1849, and is in violation of its manifest spirit; and therefore the policy declared on is void, being made without authority and in violation of the Statute.

We say this for several reasons:

1. This is a Mutual Insurance Company, formed to do business on the plan of mutual insurance and is so declared in the charter, in pursuance of the Act of 1849, sec. 10.

See 2d sec. of the charter.

"Its business shall be conducted on the plan of mutual insurance." The Company was organized without a dollar of cash capital, and with $100,000 of premium notes (sections 5 and 11), and was prohibited from commencing business without $100,000 of premium notes. The Act has not a word or provision indicating the right to do business after the stock or cash plan; and a corporation can exercise no powers not expressly granted, or that are not necessary to carry into effect those that are granted.

See authorities cited under point 3d, post.

And moreover, that Statute expressly prohibited the commencing business on the stock plan, without $50,000 of cash capital.

2. The Company being organized under the General Act as a mutual company, and with a capital made up of premium notes by direction of the Statute, the Legislature, by the term "mutual insurance," used in the Act, must be deemed to have adopted the term as it had become known in the legislation of the State, and as expressed in the Jefferson and Madison County Mutual Insurance Company charters.

Laws of 1836, pp. 42 and 89.

In 1849, when a General Act was to be passed, it had become a settled feature in the mutual insurance companies, that a premium note instead of a cash premium, was essential to the idea of a mutual company; and that interpretation of the word "mutual," was clearly indicated by the requirement, in mutual companies, of a capital made up of premium or deposit notes, instead of a cash capital, which was required in companies organized on the plan of stock companies, and in life insurance.

Act of 1849, p. 441, secs. 5, 6.

An additional reason to infer the intent of the Legislature, is found in the prevalence of this premium note principle in the other States.

Angell, 424, sec. 418.

In Indiana, Connecticut, Maine, Massachusetts, Vermont, Illinois, New Hampshire, Pennsylvania, and many others, the Legislatures, at the time of the Act of 1849, had adopted the premium note system, as we claim it to be. I infer this from the decisions of their courts, without an actual examination of the Acts in the several States.

It is some evidence of the necessity of having legislative authority for issuing policies for a definite sum paid in cash in lieu of a premium note, that a special enactment has been resorted to for that purpose, instead of coming in under the 14th section of the General Act, which would have given the power, if it were possible, under the provisions of that Statute.

Session laws of N. Y., 1849, pp. 436, 184; Session laws of N. Y., 1850, p. 337; Session laws of N. Y., 1852, pp. 27, 399, 65; 3 Ohio, N. S., 348.

4. Another and to our minds a conclusive objection to the exercise of this power of receiving a definite sum in lieu of a premium note (without an express legislative sanction) is, that it destroys the principle of mutuality, which is the leading characteristic of mutual companies formed under the Act of 1849, and confounds the operation of a company "organized to do business on the mutual plan," with that of those companies which are organized on the plan of stock companies, and which are in their nature and principle antagonistic to the mutual companies.

To illustrate this idea, suppose that an individual desires to make an insurance in a mutual company. He makes his application and receives a policy for $1,000, and executes a premium note for $100, and pays in addition five per cent. of that sum in cash. If the company is prudently and successfully managed, this five per cent. will pay expenses and all ordinary losses. But he is liable to pay, if any exigency like a disastrous fire renders it necessary, upon a just assessment; the whole of his hundred-dollar note to satisfy the losses of any of his associates who have also given their premium notes; and all who have given premium notes share in this contribution, which constitutes the principle of mutuality. Now, let us suppose that he applies to, and is insured in a stock company; he gets his policy for $1,000 and pays for it 1 per cent.—$10. He is entitled to the same indemnity in case of a loss, as he was in the mutual company; but when he pays his premium, he ceases to have any further interest in the successful operation of the Company; he is the insured, but not the insurer. In the mutual company, he was not only the insured, but he was also one of the insurers, and suffered a loss by the loss of any one of his fellow-members. By the device in question, the makers of the premium notes are turned into a stock company, and become insurers to stock policy holders to a ruinous amount, without any liability on their part to contribute to any loss whatever.

Rhinehart v. All. Mut. Ins. Co., 1 Penn. St., 359; Angell, p. 424; Bangs v. Gray, 12 N. Y., 477-479; 7 W. & S., 349, 351.

After saying "that any person insured is a member of the company," Gibson, Ch. J., says: "and on no other plan could a mutual company be constituted; the object of the members being to share each other's losses for the general weal, and not to bear the risk of losses for a premium"—which is quite significant, when we remember that the stock companies bear the risk of losses for a premium.

See, also, Mut. Benefit Ins. Co. v. Jarvis, 22 Conn., 133, 145.

5. There is another consideration which serves to show that this practice of receiving a definite sum in lieu of a premium note, is wholly unwarranted by the spirit of the Act of 1849. A company might, in the course of two or three years, entirely change the charter of a mutual insurance company into that of a stock company, without having at the outset a dollar of cash capital, and in defiance of the prohibition in the 7th section, by which the company was forbidden to commence, that is, to do any business as a stock company, without a stock capital. Such is the absurdity into which our opponents are driven by their own hypothesis.

II. There is no force in the pretense that the definite sum which is be taken in lieu of a premium note, is really an equivalent for a premium note. This pretense is deceptive and fraudulent, and so transparently absurd as to deceive no one.

It can never be an equivalent for a premium note, unless the sum is as large as that expressed in the premium note.

The premium note was intended to be so large as to meet all possible contingencies, and no one was expected to have to pay the whole of it, if the Company was conducted prudently. How, then, was it expected that individuals would pay in cash any such sum?

There can be no mistake in the case of this Company, because the directors who framed the by-laws have stated the definite sum to mean the ordinary stock rates in the fundamental laws for the practical operation of the Company.

III. Conceding that the receiving a definite sum in lieu of a premium note was a practice not authorized by the Statute of 1849, and in violation of its provisions, the insertion of such a power in the charter would not legalize such practice, especially as those who dealt with the Company on the plan of stock insurance, had legal notice of the powers of the Mutual Company.

1. The Act of 1849 is a public Act of which all must take notice; and the Act requires a copy of the charter to be filed in the office of the Secretary of State and County of Montgomery, which is sufficient notice.

Dutchess Cotton Manuf. v. Davis, 14 Johns., 238, 245.

The name and by-laws of the Company indicate that it was a Mutual Insurance Company.

All who deal with a corporation, are bound to know the powers of the corporation with which they deal or connect themselves.

4 McLean, 8; Root v. Godard, 3 McLean, 102, 276; Mumma v. Potomac Co., 8 Pet., 287.

Though not a technical estoppel, it is nevertheless notice.

2. The Corporation was an artificial person with limited powers, embracing only those expressed and such as are necessary to carry into effect the express powers.

Their powers are to be strictly construed.

3. The Corporation not only had no power to issue stock policies by the Act, but the doing of these acts were expressly prohibited by section 7 of the Act, and were void for that reason.

Tracy v. Talmage, 14 N. Y., 179, Selden, J.:

"It has long been settled that contracts founded on an illegal consideration," "or prohibited by some positive statute, are void." "That a contract by a corporation which it has no legal power to make, is void and cannot be enforced, it would seem difficult to deny."

Page 204, Comstock, to the same effect in the note.

Mr. Henry R. Mygatt, for defendant in error:

The leading questions presented are:

1st. Was the cash policy of insurance on which this action was brought, ultra vires?

2d. Are the premium notes of the Company capital stock, and as such liable to pay pro rata the losses and liabilities of the Company?

I. The issuing of policies by this Company for a cash advance premium, was not unlawful. It was not the exercise of a power not granted or forbidden by the Act of April 10, 1849, but it was the exercise of a lawful, and necessary, and proper act.

II. This question was distinctly presented by the decision of the Court of Appeals of New York in the case of White, Receiver, against Haight, which case was decided at the last December Term, and the judgment in favor of the receiver affirmed, on the ground that the note in that action formed part of the original capital of $100,000, and was collectable without any allegation of losses and without an assessment. That case is reported in 16 N. Y., 310, but only the opinion of Denio, Ch. J., is reported. Opinions were written by two others of the then members of the Court of Appeals, and this question is debated by said two of the members, to wit: Mr. Justice Brown and Mr. Justice Shankland. The following extract from the opinion of Mr. Justice Brown is in point:

"The 1st section of the Act of 1849 is sufficiently broad and comprehensive in its terms to authorize the existence of companies with power to make insurance, both upon the mutual and stock principle. The 21st section, which provides for uniting a cash capital to any extent, as additional security to the members over and above their premium and stock shares, certainly favors that construction. * * * * * The 8th section of the Company's charter contains an express provision, that any person applying to the Company for insurance, may "pay a cash premium in addition to a premium note, or a definite sum in money, to be fixed by the Corporation, in full for insurance and in lieu of a premium note." All the policies to which the defendant's answer takes exception, were issued under this provision. When he became a member, he was cognizant of its existence, and must be deemed to have assented that the contracts should be made and the policies issued in conformity with it. In executing this part of their trust the directors represented him, and did no more than he assented they should do. The moneys received by them upon this class of risks, have been applied to the uses of the Corporation in the payment of losses, chargeable pro rata upon the premium notes, his own amongst the number. To that extent his note has been exonerated and he has been benefited. Upon the plainest principles of justice, he should not be allowed to set up acts of which he was cognizant, and to which he gave his assent, and of which he has taken the benefit, in evasion and repudiation of his contract."

The following is an extract from the opinion of Mr. Justice Shankland:

"It is now urged against the validity of this 8th clause of the charter, that the taking of cash premiums, in lieu of premium notes, is not in accordance with the mutual principles on which this Company was authorized to be organized, because it might happen that the makers of the premium notes may have to pay more than those who pay cash premiums. To this it may be justly answered, that the Act nowhere declares what is mutuality, nor does it either expressly or impliedly require that premium notes shall be given by persons insured after the Organization of the Company. * * * * * It certainly cannot be alleged as a want of mutuality, that some members of the Company have paid their premiums in cash instead of giving a note. It is rather beneficial than otherwise, because by the rules of this Company, the cash premium must be exhausted before the notes can be assessed; and the answer admits it was so in this case.

Perfect equality and mutuality between the members of this Company is impossible, nor is it contemplated by the Statute. The different localities in which insured property is situated, the mode in which fires are kept, and the care of the owners, varies the risks infinitely; yet this diversity of risk is called mutual insurance. It is so in fact; for what parties agree shall be considerated mutuality, the law will adjudge so. * * * * *

But the defendant became a member of this Company, with full knowledge of the charter and by-laws thereof. That charter gave him an election to be insured for cash or on a premium note. He chose the latter mode, as most likely to cost less in the end. If he mistook in this respect, he should not be heard to say there was not complete and perfect mutuality between the members of the Company.

There have been several decisions in the Supreme Court of this State, which concur in this construction of the Statute; some of which are reported, and none reported to the contrary that I am aware of.

21 Barb. S. C., 610.

In Ohio Mut. Ins. Co. v. Marietta Woolen Fac., 8 Ohio St., 348, the Statute authorized the Company to take cash premiums in lieu of premium notes, or to give premium notes, at the election of the insured; it was held that the Company was nevertheless a mutual Company, but that the cash premiums must be applied to losses occurring on policies concurrent in time with the note policies. So in 3d Gray, Mass., 210, it was held that a mutual insurance company, which took part cash for premiums and the balance in notes, could recover an assessment on the latter, although the proportion of cash received from the various members differed from each other, whereby inequality was produced, unless the defendant could show that he was injured thereby.

These authorities confirm the views I have above taken, that equality is not attainable, nor does its absence render these companies the less mutual insurance companies on that account.

It appears from said opinions, that said Justices regarded the payment of an advance cash premium as the lawful and proper exercise of the powers granted by the Statute and the charter, and as beneficial to the members; and that by the well-known and continued course of business of the Company, the policies issued therefor precluded the Company, from repudiating these contracts, issued to those who parted with value upon the faith of, and in consideration of their interest in, the Company.

2. This is not a Mutual Insurance Company, with a stock branch engrafted on it. It is purely a Mutual Insurance Company, and as such, has power to issue policies of insurance for a cash premium, or premium note, or both.

This Company was formed under a general law, which was passed at the last session of the Legislature, after an amendment of the Charter of the Albany County Mutual Insurance Company. By its charter, like to the Albany Company, it expressly allows of the cash premium in the place of the premium note, or of both the cash premium and the premium note.

"The leading principle of mutual insurance companies is, that each person whose property is insured, becomes a corporator or a member of the company."

Angell on Fire and Life Insurance, 45, sec. 10; Susquehanna Ins. Co. v. Perrine, 7 W. & S., 348; Liscom v. Boston Mut. Fire Ins. Co., 9 Met., 205.

"A mutual insurance company, in its origin, was a body of persons each of whom was desirous of effecting an insurance, and he agreed with the rest of the members to contribute his premiums to a common fund, on the terms that he should be entitled to receive out of that fund."

Dodesdell, 22; Angell on Fire and Life Ins., 422, sec. 413.

"The whole body becomes reciprocally bound to make good the losses, and are literally mutual insurers." Ib.

Parsons says that there are "mutual companies in which everyone who is insured becomes, thereby, a member."

Pars. Merc. L., 489.

Reynolds on Life Assurance, p. 180, refers to the difficulty of collecting assessments on notes which are often of trifling amount, and are liable to be called on for frequent assessments; and then remarks: "to obviate these objections, another modification of the mutual system has been introduced by some companies, which is for the assured to pay the whole premium in cash."

"The giving of the premium note is not necessary to the consummation of the contract of insurance."

Blanchard v. Waite, 28 Me., 51.

This Company was purely a Mutual Insurance company.

The case of The Utica Insurance Co. v. Bristol, decided at the General Term in the 5th District of New York, in which case the opinion of the court is by Justices Allen and Pratt, was the case of a stock branch engrafted on a mutual insurance company.

Mutual insurance companies were formed in Ohio in 1844, with charters like the one in question.

In the Ohio Mut. Ins. Co. v. Marietta Woolen Fac., 3 Ohio St., 348, it was held, that in cases of losses on policies issued on cash premiums, the cash fund must be first exhausted to meet said losses, and then resort may be had to the premium notes.

In the case of Tuckerman, Receiver, v. McLean, in the Superior Court of New York, the defense in an action on a premium note was, that it was assessed to pay cash policy losses. By the Court, Duer, Justice:

"This is clearly no defense. The Company had the right by statute and their charter to receive cash premiums and issue policies on them, and the defendant's note has been greatly relieved by the practice. It was the best thing the Company could do. These notes are the basis of the transactions of the Company, and they must be paid when the cash is exhausted. The plaintiff is entitled to judgment."

This question was also decided at the General Term of the Supreme Court of New York, in the 6th District, in the case of White, Receiver, v. Haight, 16 N. Y., 310, Justices Mason, Gray, and Balcom, concurring in the decision.

See, also, Shaughnessy v. The Rensselaer Ins. Co., 21 Barb., 610.

3. This Company had power to issue policies of insurance for a cash premium.

The plaintiff in error's argument is, that these cash policies engrafted a stock branch upon a mutual insurance company, and that said cash policy should be repudiated as ultra vires.

Admit, for the argument, that the Act of April 10, 1849, contains no express authority to the Corporation to issue policies for a cash premium; it does not follow that the corporators are not answerable for losses arising from said policies in their corporate capacity. The Company have received value for them in cash, and it hardly comports with fair dealing that they should seek to exonerate themselves from a debt on this account, contracted by and through their accredited directors. It is not true that a corporation cannot bind the corporators beyond what is expressly authorized in the Act of Incorporation. There is power to make policies of insurance, and if a series of such contracts based on a cash premium have been made, openly and palpably within the knowledge of the corporators, the public have a right to presume that they are within the scope of the authority granted, unless it can be established that cash in hand is not as good as a premium note.

The Court of Appeals in New York say, in Conover v. The Mut. Ins. Co., 1 N. Y., 292: "Incorporated companies, whose business is necessarily conducted altogether by agents, should be required at their peril to see to it that the officers and agents whom they employ, not only know what their powers and duties are, but that they do not habitually, and as a part of their system of business, transcend those powers. How else are third persons to deal with them with any decree of safety?"

When a charter and act of incorporation and the statute are silent as to what contracts corporations may make as a general rule, it has power to make all such contracts as are necessary and usual in the course of business, as means to enable it to attain the object for which it was created.

Ang. & A., Corp., 2d Am. ed., 200, and cases.

The creation of a corporation for a specified purpose, implies a power to use the necessary and usual means to effect that purpose; and though their charters were entirely silent on the subject, banks would necessarily be empowered to issue and discount promissory notes and bills of exchange, and insurance companies to make contracts of indemnity against losses by fire.

Ketchum v. The City of Buffalo 21 Barb., 300; Broughton v. Manch. Water works Co., 8 B. & Ald., 11 12; Yarborough v. Bank of England, 16 East, 6; Murray v. E. Ind. Co., 5 B. & Ald., 204; Edie v. E. Ind. Co. 2 Burr., 1216.

Corporations are liable even for torts and trespasses, but their charter does not authorize them.

Beach v. Fulton Bank, 7 Cow., 485; Life & Fire Ins. Co., v. Mech. Fire Ins. Co., 7 Wend., 31.

The case of Stoney v. The Am. Life Ins. Co., 11 Paige, 635, decides that the negotiable security of a corporation, which upon its face appears to have been duly issued by such corporation, and in conformity with the provisions of its charter, is valid in the hands of a bona fide holder thereof, although such security was, in fact, issued for a purpose and at a place not authorized by the charter of the Company, and in violation of the laws of the State where it was actually issued.

When corporations "confine themselves to the purposes and objects of their incorporation, they should not be deemed as transcending their authority, but should be regarded as acting within the scope of those inplied incidental powers necessary to the full and advantageous development of those which are expressly given."

Mead v. Keeler, 24 Barb. N. Y., 24; see, also, Wright v. Scott, in House of Lords, 34 Eng. L. & Eq., McIntyre v. Preston, 5 Gilm. Ind., 48.

When by its charter a company is prohibited insuring on property to an amount exceeding two thirds of its value, yet if the company voluntarily insure to a greater amount without and fraud on the part of the insured, the policy is not thereby void. 31 Maine, 220.

By the 21st section of the Act, the Company may "unite a cash capital to any extent as an additional security for the members, over and above their premium and stock notes."

This word "premiums," as here used, establishes the right of this Company to receive advance premiums for policies. The certificate of the comptroller is "that the Company are in possession of the capital, premiums, or "engagements of insurance," as the case may be.

In Hone et al., Receivers, v. Allen and Paxson, reported in the note to Brouwer v. Appleby, 1 Sandf. S. C., 185, Jones, Ch. J., says: "The Company purports to be a mutual insurance. Originally mutual insurance was, where all the insurers agreed to apportion all the losses among themselves ratably." The learned Chief Justice says further: "The system underwent various modifications. Notes were dispensed with, to rely on premiums only, or on insurances agreed for as soon as the Company was ready to make them. In this respect the parties were left much to fix their own standard."

Art. 10 expressly allows this premium to be paid in a definite sum in money, in full for said insurance, and in lieu of a premium note.

The Act incorporating the Schoharie Mutual Insurance Company allowed the making of contracts of insurance "for such term or terms of time, and for such premium or consideration as may be agreed on."

Session Laws of New York, 1831, p. 280, sec. 2; see, also, Session Laws of New York, 1832, p. 129, sec. 2; Session Laws of New York, 1834, p. 182, sec. 2; Session Laws of New York, 1836, p. 315; Session Laws of New York, 1848, p. 66.

The real question here is, whether this Company, by its agent and the consent of its corporators, could carry on its business in any given mode, and act contrary to the general course of business of such corporation, so long as it proved profitable to the Company, and when a disaster occurs, be allowed to shield themselves from liability by a resort to a more than literal construction of their charter powers, which they themselves had extended by a liberal construction of its terms.

It would seem that there could be but one answer; and such is the uniform current of the more recent decisions upon the subject.

Curtis v. Leavitt, 15 N. Y., 9, and authorities there cited; E. Co. Railway Co. v. Hawkes, 35 Eng. L. & Eq., 8, and authorities there cited.

11. The premium notes of this Company constitute its capital stock, and as such are liable to pay all the losses and liabilities thereof.

Brown v. Crooke, 4 N. Y., 51; Van Buren v. Chenango Co. Mut. Ins. Co., 12 Barb., 676.

It has been decided in Pennsylvania that the deposit or premium notes of a mutual insurance company are part of its capital.

Rhinehart v Allegheny Co. Mut. Ins. Co., 1 Penn. St., 359, and the Court of Appeals of New York, in Hyde v. Lynde, 4 N. Y., 391, by Bronson, Ch. J.: "I agree with the Supreme Court, that the deposit or premium notes are to be regarded as capital, for the security of those who may deal with the Company."

As these premium notes are a security for all who may deal with these companies, and as this Company, as appears by the pleadings, has issued more policies for a cash advance premium than for premium notes, and has received $43,000 for said cash policies, and expended the same in payment of the general liabilities of said Company, common justice and mutuality would seem to require that said premium notes be applied equally, to pay all the just creditors of this Company.

Mr. Justice Nelson delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a writ of error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of New York.

The suit was brought against the defendants on a policy of insurance against fire, in the sum of $2,500, upon a paper mill, machinery and stock of one R. K. Kounsler, of the State of Virginia, the property situate in that State. The defendants are incorporated under the laws of the State of New York, and the place of business at the Village of Fort Plain, an interior town of that State. The policy and all interest under the same have been duly assigned to the plaintiff.

There is no question in the case upon the loss, or upon the preliminary proofs; the defense being placed exclusively upon a defect of authority in the defendants to issue the policy. The Act of the Legislature of New York, passed April 10, 1849, under which they were incorporated, provided, section 1, that any number of persons, not less than thirteen, might associate and form an incorporated company, among other things, to make insurance on dwellings, houses, &c., against loss or damage by fire; section 3, that these persons should file in the office of the Secretary of the State a declaration, signed by them, expressing their intention to form a Company for transacting the business of insurance, which declaration should comprise a copy of the charter proposed to be adopted by them, and requiring notice of their intention to be published in a newspaper a given number of weeks. Section 4 provides for opening books of subscription to the capital stock, and that in case the business of the Company was to be conducted on the plan of mutual insurance, then to open books to receive propositions and enter into agreements in the manner afterwards specified; which in substance is, that the Company shall not commence business until agreements shall have been entered into for insurance, the premiums on which shall amount to $100,000, and notes have been received in advance for the premiums on such risks, payable at the end of or within twelve months from date, which notes shall be considered a part of the capital stock, and shall be deemed valid, negotiable and collectable, for the purpose of paying losses or otherwise. Section 11, that the charter of the Company should be examined by the Attorney-General of the State, and if found in accordance with the requirements of the Act, and not inconsistent with the Constitution or laws of the State, he should certify the same to the Comptroller of the State; and thereupon the Comptroller should institute an examination to ascertain if the Company had received and had in its actual possession, the capital premiums, &c., to the full extent required by the Act; and upon a certificate to this effect by the Comptroller, filed in the office of the Secretary of State, this officer should furnish the Company with a certified copy of the charter and certificates, which, upon being filed in the office of the clerk of the county in which the Company is located, shall be its authority to commence business and issue policies.

By section 10 it is made the duty of the corporators to declare in the charter the mode and manner in which the corporate powers conferred by the general Act are to be exercised; and by section 12 the corporators, trustees, or directors, as the case may be, shall have power to make such by-laws, not inconsistent with the Constitution or laws of the State, as may be deemed necessary for the government of its officers and the conduct of its affairs.

By the 5th section of the charter formed under this general Act, it is provided that the rights, powers, &c., conferred by law on the Company, shall be vested in and exercised by a board of directors, to consist of thirteen persons, to be elected by persons holding the polcies of insurance in the company or their proxies, and one vote shall be allowed on every one hundred dollars insured. The 8th section of the charter provides that the rates of insurance shall be fixed and regulated by the Company; and premium notes therefor shall be received from the insured, and shall be paid at such time or times and in such sum or sums as the Company shall from time to time require; and any person applying for insurance, so electing, may pay a cash premium, in addition to a premium note, or a definite sum in money, to be fixed by the Company, in full of said insurance and in lieu of a premium note.

The policy in question was issued on the payment of a cash premium, under this 8th section of the charter, the insured paying a gross sum of $56.25 for the insurance of his paper mill and stock to the amount of $2,500 for one year.

The ground taken in the defense is, that, according to the general Act under which the defendants were organized, they were empowered to make contracts and issue policies of insurance to such persons only as became members of the Company by giving premium notes; and that the 8th section of the charter, providing for the payment of the premium in cash, was without authority, and the policy, therefore, void.

It is stated in the plea upon which the question in the case is raised, that from the time the Company began business (August, 1850) till June, 1853, when it became insolvent, over two thousand policies were issued, founded upon premium notes, and over two thousand five hundred founded upon cash premiums; and that the amount of $43,000 was received by the Company for policies issued upon cash premiums.

The general Act, conferring the power upon companies organized under it to make contracts of insurance against fire, and issue policies, provides for a certain amount of capital ($100.000), secured by premium notes upon engagements of insurance entered into by the companies, as a condition to the right of commencing the business of insurance. This capital, thus obtained, is essential to a complete organization under the Act; for, without it, the Corporation is forbidden to enter upon the business of insurance.

These preliminary engagements and the giving of premium notes were designed as an immediate security to persons who, confiding in the responsibility of the Company, should make application for insurance on its going into operation.

The notes thus constituting capital are to be made payable at or within a year from their date; they may be made payable, therefore, within the terms of the Act, on demand, or at any short period; and they are made negotiable and collectable for the payment of any losses which may accrue in the business of insurance or otherwise. And it has been held in the Court of Appeals, in New York, that they are collectable by the Company, irrespective of losses, or assessments to pay losses. 16 N. Y., 310; 2 Smith.

Now, although the general Act provides for premium notes upon these preliminary engagements of insurance to be consummated on the organization of the Company, and with a view to capital upon which to begin the business of insurance, there is no provision to be found in it prescribing the mode or manner in which premiums shall be paid or secured after the Company has become organized and commenced operations. That seems to have been left to be regulated in the charter formed under the Act.

The provision prescribing the giving of notes in advance for premiums, with a view to create capital, has no necessary relation to the subject of premiums to be received by the company after its organization, and in the course of conducting its ordinary business. The Act had in view a different object in requiring the giving these notes, and provided specially for their disposition and use with reference thereto. They are made a part of the capital stock of the Company, and negotiable and collectable for the payment of losses or otherwise, and, as we have seen, collectable as such capital, irrespective of loss or assessment for losses; and as they may be made payable on demand, or at a short day, are convertible into money, according to the decision in the Court of Appeals of New York, immediately on the Company's becoming organized and ready for business.

Even if this provision could be regarded as bearing upon the subject of premiums after the organization of the Company, it would furnish but feeble support to the argument against cash premiums, the difference being simply between cash and a note payable and collectable immediately. According to the Act, and construction given to it in the case referred to, these notes have no necessary existence after the organization of the Company. They may then be converted into money. They seem to have been made necessary under this system of insurance while the Company was in the process of organization, by way of furnishing the incipient amount of capital required by the Act.

It is argued, however, that the Company in question is a mutual insurance company, as declared by the Act; that, according to this system, the insured must be a member of it, and that a person insured upon a cash premium, without any further liability, cannot be a member. This argument is not well founded, either upon principle or authority. Admitting that the insured must be a member of the Company, he is made so by the payment of the cash premium. The theory of a mutual insurance company is, that the premiums paid by each member for the insurance of his property constitute a common fund, devoted to the payment of any losses that may occur. Now, the cash premium may as well represent the insured in the common fund as the premium note; and this class of companies has been so long engaged in the business of insurance, it may well be that they can determine, with sufficient certainty for all practical purposes, the just difference in the rates of premium between cash and notes. These mutual companies, possessing the authority contained in the 8th section of this charter, namely: to take cash premiums or premium notes, are, at the present day, in operation in several of the States, and it has never been supposed that the mutual principle has been thereby abrogated.

3 Ohio, 348, N. S.

It has also been argued, that inasmuch as the defendants have been organized upon the principle of a mutual insurance company, its business must be conducted, as it respects the premiums to be received, according to the plan of mutual companies previously chartered in the State of New York. If the previous companies were required by their charters to receive premium notes, and not cash, then this requirement distinguishes them from the one before us. If their charters contained no such provision, then they were left, like the present one, to regulate the mode of payment at discretion. Besides, mutual companies upon both plans had been chartered by the Legislature of New York previous to the Act of 1849, and hence no inference can be drawn, as it respects the charters of previous companies, from the unexpressed intent of the Legislature in this Act, if otherwise admissible.

The true answer, however, to this argument, we think, is, that in the absence of any reference to previous charters, by which the provisions of the same might have been incorporated in the present one, the court must look to the law itself for the purpose of expounding its provisions and ascertaining the intent of the Legislature.

The general Act prescribed the outlines of the system, and all the conditions and guards that were deemed essential to the security of persons applying for insurance, leaving the details and interior regulations to be arranged and determined by the Company in their charter. Large powers were conferred, in general terms, as in the 10th section, "to declare in the charters" "the mode and manner in which the corporate powers given under and by virtue of this Act are to be exercised;" and again, in the 12th section, the Company "shall have power to make such by-laws" "as may be deemed necessary for the government of its officers and the conduct of its affairs." And besides these general powers, inasmuch as the Company is incorporated for the express purpose of insurance of property against fire, in the absence of any prescribed mode of payment of premiums, the power to prescribe it by the Company is necessarily implied; otherwise, the object for which it was created would be defeated.

This question has been indirectly before several of the courts of New York, and in all of them, so far as any opinion has been expressed, as I understand, it has been in favor of the validity of these policies.

The practical construction of this Act of 1849 by the public officers of the State, including the Attorney-General, who were required to supervise the preliminary steps made necessary to the organization of the Company, and to certify that it had conformed to the provisions of the Act, and the latter officers especially, that the charter was in accordance with it, is deserving of consideration. Under the construction thus given, numerous companies have been organized with charters like the present, providing for cash premiums, or premium notes, at the election of the insured, and an extensive business of insurance carried on in New York and several of the sister States; and, although this practical construction cannot be admitted as controlling, it is not to be overlooked, and perhaps should be regarded as decisive in a case of doubt, or where the error is not plain.

The judgment of the court below is affirmed.

Mr. Justice Daniel dissents on the ground of a want of jurisdiction.

ROSS WINANS, Plff. in Er.,
v.
THE NEW YORK AND ERIE RAILROAD COMPANY.

(See S. C., 21 How., 88-103.)

Formal objection to deposition cannot be made at trial, when there is time, before trial, for motion to suppress or re-examine—experts, to what may be examined—not to prove construction of instruments—error, what is not, in refusing construction or evidence.

The refusal of the court to reject a deposition because the witness had not annexed to it a copy of a former deposition, which, in answer to a previous interrogatory, he admitted he had seen and had used to refresh his memory, is right.

Such an objection cannot be made on the trial, when the party had full time and opportunity before trial, to move for a suppression of the deposition or a re-examination of the witness.

Experts may be examined to explain terms of art, and the state of the art, at any given time, and may explain to the court the machines, models or drawings exhibited.

But professors or mechanics cannot be received to prove to the court or jury what is the proper or legal construction of any instrument of writing.

A judge may obtain information from them, if he desire it, but cannot be compelled to receive their opinion as matter of evidence.

Where the court has given a correct construction to the patent, there was no error in refusing to give a different one, or in refusing to admit testimony which, under this construction, was wholly irrelevant to the issue on which the jury were about to pass.

Argued Dec. 20, 1858. Decided Jan. 10, 1859.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of New York.

The suit below was an action at law brought by Winans against the Company for the infringement of letters patent. The patent was NOTE.—Depositions in U. S. courts, defects and irregularities in, how taken advantage of, and how waived.

The general rule is that a deposition not taken according to the rules of law must be excluded if objection is made, unless there is waiver of the objection or consent to the mode in which they are granted said Winans on Oct. 1, 1834, for an "improvement in the construction of cars or carriages intended to run upon railroads."

The defendants pleaded the general issue, and gave notice of special matters of defense.

Upon the trial there was a verdict for the defendants, and the plaintiff made a bill of exceptions.

The first exception arose as follows:

In the course of the trial, the defendants offered to read in evidence the deposition of one Conduce Gatch, taken under a commission. The deposition consisted of 106 direct interrogatories and 103 cross interrogatories, and of the answers of the said Gatch thereto, and of three additional direct interrogatories, and the answers thereto.

The 100th cross-interrogatory and the answer thereto, referred to a copy of answers of said Gatch in the case of Winans v. The N. Y. and Harlem Railroad Co.,

This copy "was not, nor was any copy of such copy, annexed to said deposition, nor were there any answers by Gatch to any part of the 102d cross-interrogatory, other than the said answer to the 100th cross-interrogatory."

The plaintiff's attorneys objected to the reading in evidence of the whole of said deposition, on the ground that Gatch was called by said 102d cross-interrogatory to annex to his said deposition a correct copy of the copy of the answers of said Gatch in the case of Winans v. The N. Y. & Harlem Railroad Company, and that Gatch had failed so to do. The court, thereupon, overruled said objection.

The substance of the other numerous exceptions, with a further statement of the case, appears in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Charles M. Keller, and Samuel Blatchford, for the plaintiffs in error:

As to the first exception, the rule of evidence which excludes depositions under such circumstances, is well settled by authority.

Richardson v. Golden, 3 Wash. C. C., 109; Dodge v. Israel, 4 Wash. C. C., 323; Kimball v. Davis, 19 Wend., 437; Brown v. Kimball, 25 Wend., 259, 265; Smith v. Griffith, 3 Hill, 338.

As to the exceptions which relate to the offers to prove, made on the part of the plaintiff and overruled by the court below; these offers relate to expert testimony on the facts presented and proved by the plaintiffs' letters patent, which were in evidence as the foundation of the action; the said expert testimony being essential to enable the court to construe as matter of law the claim in the patent, and to enable the jury to ascertain as matter of fact the principle or mode of operation of the invention patented, and to determine the novelty thereof, as well as the infringement of the patent by the defendants. This testimony was admissible:

1st. As addressed to the court, with a view to the correct construction of the claim in the patent.

Winans v. Denmead, 15 How., 330, 340; Curt. Pat., secs. 123, 395; Washburn v. Gould, 3 Story, 122; Neilson v. Harford, Webst. Pat. Cas., 370; Silsby v. Foote, 14 How., 218, 226.

2d. Testimony was admissible as addressed to the jury as matter of fact. The claim is to be liberally construed, to give effect to the patent and to secure the invention actually made and described, if the language of the specification would admit of it.

Winans v. Denmead, and cases cited, 15 How., 330, 341.

And it was susceptible of proof, that the invention described in the plaintiff's patent was substantially different, and had a different mode of operation from a car of prior date. No construction of the claim of the patent can be sound in judgment of law, which includes in its scope, both the patent and the prior car.

Mr. Justice Grier delivered the opinion of the court:

The patent, which the defendants are charged to have infringed, purports to be, "for a new and useful improvement in the construction of cars or carriages intended to travel upon railroads."

The specification commences with an enumeration of the difficulties attending short curves in railroads from friction, and the consequent necessity of placing the wheels, where four only are used, near together. But in high velocities the shocks from obstructions or inequalities on the rails are thus greatly increased; so that a compromise is usually made between the evils consequent on too great a separation and too near approach, wherein the advantage of one is necessarily sacrificed for the sake of the other. The incessant vibration felt in traveling on railroad cars is mainly imputed to the minute obstructions which unavoidably exist, and the approximation of the wheels necessary to avoid friction tends to increase the effect of this motion, and its power to derange the machinery of the road.

The important object which the plaintiff's invention seeks to obtain, as regards comfort, safety and economy, "is to devise a mode of combining the advantages derived from placing the axles at a considerable distance, with those of allowing them to be situated near each other."

The specification then states the methods heretofore used to remedy these difficulties; such as making the track wheels conical, which, in case of slow traveling, has been found an effectual correction. But in high velocities it caused a serpentine motion, not only on curves, but where the track was straight. To avoid this effect, an additional motive is furnished for placing the axles at a considerable distance apart.

For this purpose the patentee proposes to construct two bearing carriages, each with four wheels, to sustain the body of the cars, one at or near each end thereof; the two wheels on either side of these carriages to be placed very near each other. These wheels may be connected by a strong spring, double the usual strength employed for ordinary cars. The use of this spring, though preferable, is not absolutely required, as the end in view may be obtained by constructing the bearing carriages in any of the modes usually practiced, provided the fore and hind wheels of each of the carriages be placed near together; because the closeness of the fore and hind wheels of each bearing carriage, coupled remotely from each other, is considered as the most important feature of the invention.

On each of these carriages a bolster is placed, on which the car body rests, connected with each by a center pin or bolt passing down through them, thus allowing them to swivel or turn upon each other.

After this description of the improvement contemplated, and the objects to be gained by it (of which we have given a brief summary), the specification concludes with the following disclaimer and statement of what the patentee claims to have invented:

"I do not claim as my invention the running of cars or carriages upon eight wheels, this having been previously done; not, however, in the manner or for the purposes herein described, but merely with a view of distributing the weight carried more evenly upon a rail or other road, and for objects distinct in character from those which I have had in view, as hereinbefore set forth. Nor have the wheels, when thus increased in number, been so arranged and connected with each other, either by design or accident, as to accomplish this purpose. What I claim, therefore, as my invention, and for which I ask a patent, is the before-described manner of arranging and connnecting the eight wheels, which constitute the two bearing carriages, with a railroad car, so as to accomplish the end proposed by the means set forth, or by any others which are analogous and dependent upon the same principles."

The defense set up in the pleadings does not deny that defendants use cars constructed as described in the patent, but takes issue on the originality of the invention, averring, among numerous other matters, that the same, or substantially the same, improvement had been previously made and used on the Quincy Railroad, near Boston.

The first bill of exceptions taken on the trial is to the refusal of the court to reject a deposition taken on interrogatories, because the witness had not annexed to it a copy of a former deposition, which, in answer to a previous interrogatory, he admitted he had seen and had used to refresh his memory.

There are two sufficient reasons why this exception cannot be sustained. 1st. By the rules of practice in force in the Circuit Court, such an objection cannot be made on the trial of another cause, when the party, as in this case, had full time and opportunity to move for a suppression of a deposition or a re-examination of the witness.

And second, the paper was not in the power of the witness, but in that of the commissioner, or the plaintiff himself, who might have used it if he thought proper.

After the parties had each given evidence tending to prove the issues between them, and the defendants had closed their testimony, the plaintiff's counsel made nine distinct offers of proof, which were severally overruled as irrelevant, and exceptions taken.

They then proposed eight several instructions, which they requested the court to give to the jury, and took exceptions to the court's refusal. Besides all this, the charge was parceled out into fourteen paragraphs, and an exception taken to each.

To state each one of these thirty-one propositions at length, and discuss them severally, would be a tedious as well as an unprofitable labor.

There was in fact but one question to be decided by the court, viz.: the construction of the patent; the question of novelty being the fact to be passed on by the jury.

The testimony of experts which was rejected had no relevancy to the facts on which the jury were to pass, but seemed rather to be intended to instruct the court on some mechanical facts or principles on which the court needed no instruction, or to teach them what was the true construction of the patent.

Experts may be examined to explain terms of art, and the state of the art, at any given time.

They may explain to the court and jury the machines, models or drawings exhibited. They may point out the difference or identity of the mechanical devices involved in their construction. The maxim of "cuique in suâ arte credendum" permits them to be examined to questions of art or science peculiar to their trade or profession; but professors or mechanics cannot be received to prove to the court or jury what is the proper or legal construction of any instrument of writing. A judge may obtain information from them, if he desire it, on matters which he does not clearly comprehend, but cannot be compelled to receive their opinions as matter of evidence. Experience has shown that opposite opinions of persons professing to be experts, may be obtained to any amount; and it often occurs that not only many days, but even weeks are consumed in cross-examinations, to test the skill or knowledge of such witnesses and the correctness of their opinions, wasting the time and wearying the patience of both court and jury; and perplexing, instead of elucidating the questions involved in the issue.

If the construction given by the court to the specification be correct, and in fact the only construction of which it is capable, as we think it is, it would be wholly superfluous to examine experts to teach the court, what they could clearly perceive without such information, that the necessity for coned wheels to avoid friction on curves was a consequence of the fact that the wheels were fixed to the axle.

The improvement claimed by the patent being a device to remedy, among other things, the serpentine or wabbling motion of such wheels in high velocities, the testimony offered concerning them, if it would have any effect at all, would tend only to mislead both court and jury from the only issue in the case.

The following extracts from the charge will show that the judge has given the only construction which the language of this specification will admit, and one which had been previously given by Mr. Chief Justice Taney in 1839, and again by Mr. Justice Nelson:

"According to the import and true construction of the plaintiff's patent and specification, he claims to be the first inventor of 'a new and useful improvement in the construction of cars and carriages intended to travel upon railroads,' which improvement consists in the manner of arranging and connecting the eight wheels, which constitute the two bearing carriages, with a railroad car, the object of which is to make such an adjustment of the wheels, axles, and bearings of the car, as shall enable a car with a comparatively long body to pass curves with greater facility and safety, and less friction, and as shall at the same time cause the body of the car to pursue a more smooth, even, direct and safe course, over the curvatures and irregularities, and over the straight parts of the road.

"The manner of such arrangement and connection is to place upon the upper bolsters of two bearing carriages, each having four wheels, with the flanches of each pair of wheels very near together, the body of a car, so as to rest its weight and have the bearing of the load upon the center or central portion of the bolsters, being also the center or central portion of the bearing carriages; the bolsters of the bearing carriages and car body, respectively, being connected by center pins or bolts, so as to allow them to swivel and turn upon each other, in the manner of the front bolster of a common road wagon, and the bolsters being placed at, near, or beyond the ends of the body.

"And the closeness of the fore and hind wheels of each of the two bearing carriages coupled as remotely from each other as may be desired, or can conveniently be done, for the support of one body, is a most important feature of the invention, with a view to the ob jects and on the principles set forth in the specification.

"The patentee does not claim to be the inventor of a car body (either for freight or for passengers) of a new or peculiar construction in size or form, nor of any single and wholly separate part of the entire car; but he claims, as his invention, the manner of arranging and connecting the eight wheels, which constitute the two bearing carriages, with a railroad car, in the mode and by the means described in his specification, for the ends before described, whether such railroad car is adapted to the transportation of freight or of passengers.

"The leading principle set forth in the specification, upon which the arrangement and connection act to effect the objects aimed at, is, that by the contiguity of the fore and hind wheels of each bearing carriage, and the swiveling motion of the trucks or bearing carriages, the planes of the flanches of the wheels conform more nearly to the line of the rails, and the lateral friction of the flanches on the rails, while entering, passing through, and leaving curves, is thereby diminished; while at the same time, in consequence of the two bearing carriages being arranged and connected with the body of a passenger or burden car, by means of the king bolts or center pins and bolsters, placed as remotely from each other as may be desired or can be conveniently done, and with the weight bearing upon the central portion of the bolsters and bearing carriages, the injurious effects of the shocks and concussions received from slight irregularities and imperfections of the track, and other minute disturbing causes, are greatly lessened."

The remarks of the court about the want of a disclaimer, where the patent claimed too much, though correct as a general statement of the law, could have little bearing on the present case, where the disclaimer, to be effectual, would include the whole invention claimed.

It is abundantly evident, therefore, that the court having given a correct construction to the patent, there could be no error in refusing to give a different one, or in refusing to admit testimony which, under this construction, was wholly irrelevant to the issue on which the jury were about to pass.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is, therefore, affirmed, with costs.

Mr. Justice Daniel dissents on the ground of a want of jurisdiction.

v.

THE CITY OF MILWAUKEE AND FERDINAND KUEHN.

(See S. C., 21 How., 391–393.)

Value, how shown, to give jurisdiction—when to be shown—when too late—value in pleadings.

Where, as in ejectment or a suit for dower, the value does not appear in the pleadings or evidence, affidavits may be received to show that the value is large enough to give jurisdiction to this court.

A case will not be postponed or re-instated, in order to give the party time to produce affidavits of value.

They come too late, after the case has been heard and dismissed for want of jurisdiction.

Where the value is stated in the pleadings or proceedings of the court below, affidavits are never received to vary or enhance it, in order to give jurisdiction.

Argued Feb. 18, 1859. Decided Feb. 28, 1859.

APPEAL from the District Court of the United States for the District of Wisconsin.

On motion to re-instate and decide the case on the merits.

This case is stated by the court.

See, also, 62 U. S. (21 How.), 80.

NOTE.—Jurisdiction of U. S. Supreme Court, dependent on amount. Interest cannot be added to give jurisdiction. How value of thing demanded may be shown. What cases reviewable without regard to sum in controversy. See note to Gordon v. Ogden, 28 U. S. (3 Pet.), 33.

Messrs. R. H. Gillet and Brown & Ogden, for appellant.

Mr. J. R. Doolittle, for appellees.

This case was dismissed at a former day of the present term, because it did not appear that the value of the property in controversy exceeded $2,000. An affidavit has now been filed on the part of the appellant, stating that the property was worth $2,500; and a motion made thereupon to re-instate the case, to which the counsel for the appellees consent.

There are cases—such, for example, as an ejectment, or a suit for dower—in which the value does not, according to the usual forms of proceeding, appear in the pleadings or evidence in the record. In such cases, affidavits of value have been received here, in order to show that the value is large enough to give jurisdiction to this court. That was the case in Course v. Steadman, referred to in the 13th rule of this court. The case is reported in 4 Dall., 22.

It was a proceeding to charge a tract with a lien created by a judgment; and, as the decree was against the respondent, it was necessary for her to show that the land was worth more than $2,000, in order to support the appeal. The case of William v. Kincaid, referred to in the above-mentioned case (4 Dall., 19), was an action for dower. But in both of these cases, the affidavits were filed before the argument on the merits; and in Rush v. Parker, 5 Cranch, 287, Mr. Justice Livingston expressed his opinion strongly against giving time to file affidavits of value, and the court refused to continue the case for that purpose. And in the class of cases above mentioned, in which affidavits are received, there is no instance in which a case has been postponed or re-instated in order to give the party time to produce affidavits of value. Indeed, such a practice would be irregular and inconvenient, and might sometimes produce conflicting affidavits and bring on a controversy about value, occupying as much of the time of the court as the merits of the case.

And if this case were one of those in which affidavits could be received, they come too late after the case has been heard and dismissed for want of jurisdiction. But it is not a case of that description. The value of the lots about to be sold for corporation taxes was involved directly in the dispute. Their value is stated in the bill, and the amount of taxes imposed upon them, in order to show that the overcharge made by the corporation was unreasonable and oppressive; and their value is stated by the complainant to be "over $500"—the sum mentioned being only one fourth of the amount required to give jurisdiction to this court; and where the value is stated in the pleadings or proceedings of the court below, affidavits here have never been received to vary it or enhance it, in order to give jurisdiction. And the affidavit now offered could not have been received, even if filed before the argument of the case.

The motion to re-instate is, therefore, overruled.

THE PHILADELPHIA, WILMINGTON & BALTIMORE RAILROAD COMPANY.

Plffs. in Er.,

v.

PHILIP QUIGLEY.

(See S. C., 21 How., 202-228.)

Corporations, liable for agent's acts in contractu or in delicto—communication by corporation to their constituents, privileged—but not when inserted in book for distribution—responsible for libel—publication, after suit commenced—general issue waives jurisdictional questions.

For acts done by the agents of a corporation, either in contractu or in delictu, in the course of its business, and of their employment, the corporation is responsible, as an individual is responsible under similar circumstances.

The communication by a corporation to their constituents, of the evidence collected by them as to the conduct of their officers and agents, and their conclusions upon the evidence, was a privileged communication, in the absence of any malice or bad faith.

But the privilege does not extend to the preservation of the report and evidence, in the permanent form of a book for distribution.

So far as the corporate body authorized the publication of the libel complained of in the form employed, they are responsible in damages.

Publication which took place after the commencement of the suit, cannot sustain a verdict.

The general issue raises an issue upon the merits of the complaint, and leaves the jurisdictional allegations without a traverse.

No question, involving the capacity of the parties in the cause to litigate in the Circuit Court, can be raised before the jury, under the general issue.

Argued Dec. 29, 1858. Decided Jan. 17, 1859.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Maryland.

This was an action on the case brought in the court below, by the defendant in error, to recover damages for a libel alleged to have been published by the plaintiff in error.

The trial in the court below having resulted in a verdict and judgment in favor of the plaintiff for $5,000, with costs, the defendant sued out this writ of error.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Wm. Schley, C. Robinson and Thos. Donaldson, for plaintiff in error:

1. An action of libel cannot be sustained against the plaintiff in error. It is a Railroad Company, with defined and limited faculties and powers; and it can exercise no incidental powers, except such as are necessary to the full exercise of the faculties and powers expressly given by its charter. Being a mere legal entity, it is incapable of malice; and in the very definition of libel, malice is an essential element. The action should have been instituted against the natural persons, who published the alleged libel.

B., 315; Stevens v. Midland Co.'s Railway Co., 10 Exch., 352; Commonwealth v. The Proprietors of New Bedford Bridge, 2 Gray, 345; State v. Great Work's Mill and Man. Co., 20 Me., 41; McLelland v. Bank of Cumberland, 24 Me., 566; Childs v. Bank of Missouri, 17 Mo., 213; and, for illustration, the cases of Colman v. The Eastern Counties Railway Co., 4 Railway C., 518; and Salomans v. Laing, 6 Railway C., 301, are referred to—showing that the Corporation is not bound by acts of directors when such acts are ultra vires.

2. Even if the action of libel could be maintained against the plaintiff in error in a case of unlawful publication, yet upon the proof in this case there was no such publication.

The communication by the president and directors to the stockholders, of the results of the investigation into the conduct of the Company's officers, was a privileged communication; and even if it amounted to a publication, no action will lie, unless upon proof of express malice and the want of probable cause; and the burden of proving malice and the want of a probable cause was on the plaintiff below.

3. But there was no evidence of publication by the defendant of the matter complained of as libelous. The report of the president and directors to the stockholders of the Company, communicating the results of the investigation,

NOTE.—Privileged communications in libel and slander. See note to White v. Nichols, 44 U. S. (3 How.), 266.

Libel and slander, actions for, by and against corporations.

An action will lie against a corporation for libel. Aldrich v. Press Print. Co. 9 Minn., 133; Lawless v. Anglo-Egyptian Cotton Co., Law Rep., 4 Q. B., 262; 10 B. & S., 226. Maynard v. Fireman's Ins. A corporation may have a reputation which is equally as valuable to it as to a natural person, and may be injured in it in the same way. Trenton Ins. Co. v. Perrine, 3 Zab., 402.

A corporation aggregate may maintain an action for libel for words published of them concerning their trade or business, by which they have suffered special damage; and that, too, against a shareholder in the company. Met. Saloon Omnibus Co. v. Hawkins, 4 Hurl. N., 87.

Publishing of the plaintiff, an incorporated bank, that "it was liable at any time to be closed up by an injunction," is libelous without allegations of special damages. Shoe and Leather B'k v. Thompson, 18 Abb. Pr., 413.

Where chairman of a joint stock company was by statute authorized to sue for company, it was held he might sue for a libel on the company though it was not a corporate body. Williams v. Beaumont, 10 Bing., 260; 3 M. & Sc., 705; Woodward v. Cotton, 1 C., M. & R., 44.

A corporation is capable of voluntary action, and hence may be the publisher of a libel. It is as possible for a corporation as for an individual to act maliciously. It may, therefore, cause the publication of a defamatory statement under such circumstances as would imply malice in law sufficient to support the action, and there may be such circumstances that express malice in fact may be proved. Whitfield v. South E. R. R. Co., 1 Ell., B. & E., 115; Aldrich v. Press Printing Co., 9 Minn., 133; Alexander v. N. East. R. R. Co., 34 L. J. N. S., 152, Q. B.; 11 Jur., N. S., 619.

was no such publication; and the adoption of their report, and the consequent printing of the testimony, and its authorized distribution among the stockholders, was no such publication.

Rex v. Baillie, 2 Esp. N. P., 91, cited in Howard v. Thompson, 21 Wend., 319.

4. There was no evidence of express malice on the part of the corporation, or on the part of the board of directors, or on the part of the stockholders. It is not a case in which vindictive damages could properly be given.

2 Greenl., secs. 253, 420; Day v. Woodworth, 13 How., 371.

5. The first instruction of the court below was erroneous in several particulars. It directed the jury that they might infer malice from the mere falsehood of any statement in the letter of Mahoney, respecting the plaintiff in his trade and occupation; and that the distribution of the printed book among any of the stockholders rendered the defendant liable in the action. The defendant, under this instruction, was not at liberty to claim a verdict, except upon proof of the truth of every statement in said letter; for the distribution of the book to some extent amongst the stockholders was not denied.

6. But the second instruction was even more exceptionable. It seemingly suggests to the jury the propriety of giving exemplary damages. The quantum of damages under this instruction was to be composed of two items; first, such amount as would render reparation to the plaintiff; and second, such amount as would act as an adequate punishment to the defendant; and in making up this blended amount the jury were told to give such damages as in their opinion were called for and justified, in view of all the circumstances of the case. The plaintiff sued in his character as a mechanic—for an alleged libel against him as a mechanic; and he complains of injury to his reputation, not as a man, but as a mechanic; and he claims special and not general damages. Now, there was certainly evidence, and strong evidence, to show that the plaintiff had not sustained any actual damage in his reputation, or in his business as a mechanic; and if so, the case was one not for vindictive, but nominal damages.

7. The Circuit Court, upon the proof adduced, had not jurisdiction in this case. The plaintiff and defendant were not citizens of different States.

The plaintiff sued as a citizen of Delaware. The defendant was described as "a body corporate in the State of Maryland, incorporated by a law of the General Assembly of Maryland." But the proof showed that the defendant was also a body corporate in Delaware, incorporated by an Act of the Legislature of Delaware.

In the case of this Company against Howard, 13 How., 307, this point did not arise, as the plaintiff in that case was a citizen of Illinois.

In the case of Marshall v. The Balt. and O. R. R. Co., 16 How., 314, no question was made below in relation to jurisdiction; and the proof did not present the precise question which arises in this case.

In Rundle v. The Del. and Rar. Can. Co., 14 How., 80-95, the facts were essentially different.

Ner it was necessary that this objection should have been made by plea in abatement. The cases of Sheppard v. Graves, 14 How., 510, and of Jones v. League, 18 How., 76, it is supposed, do not apply to a case like this. The objection does not present any question of disability of the plaintiff, or of privilege of the defendant.

Messrs. Reverdy Johnson and Henry Winter Davis, for defendant in error:

The defendant asked instructions.

1. That there was no right to a recovery, though the book were published by defendant; in other words, that libel will not lie against a corporation.

2. That if it would, this publication was a privileged communication.

3. That there could be no recovery unless express malice were found.

4. That there is no evidence of express malice.

The court refused those instructions and gave others to this effect:

1. If the jury find the publishing by defendants the falsehood of the libel, the report to the stockholders and acceptance by them, and the distribution among the stockholders or any of them after adjournment, the plaintiff can recover.

2. The damages are not what plaintiff has lost pecuniarily, but what beyond that the jury may think a fit reparation to plaintiff and punishment to defendant.

On the above case it will be insisted:

1. That a corporation may be liable for a libel.

P. & D. St. Co. v. Hungerford, 6 G. & J., 291; 7 G. & J., 44; East Counties Railway v. Broom, 2 Eng. L. & Eq., 406; 16 East, 8; Ang. & A., ch. 10, sec. 9; 14 Eng. C. L., 159; Merrils v. Tariff Manuf. Co., 10 Conn., 384; Williams v. Beaumont, 10 Bing., 260–270; Goodspeed v. E. Haddam Bk., 22 Conn., 530, 538; Trenton M. L. I. Co. v. Perrine, 3 Zab., 402.

2. That there is sufficient proof of the publication and printing by the Corporation.

Clark v. Corp. Washington, 12 Wheat., 40; Bank U. S. v. Dandridge, 12 Wheat., 64; Bank Columbia v. Patterson, 7 Cranch, 299; Union Bank v. Ridgeley, 1 H. & G., 326.

3. That the publication was not in form or substance a privileged communication.

4. The measure of damages was rightly assigned by the court.

14 How., 468.

5. (a) The jurisdiction is sufficiently alleged.

(b) The question cannot now be raised on the record.

(c) If it could, the facts show jurisdiction as well as the averment.

Mr. Justice Campbell delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff (Quigley), a citizen of Delaware, complained of the defendants, "a body corporate in the State of Maryland, by a law of the General Assembly of Maryland," for the publication of a libel by them, in which his capacity and skill as a mechanic and builder of depots, bridges, station houses, and other structures for railroad companies, had been falsely and maliciously disparaged and undervalued.

The defendants pleaded the general issue. On the trial of the cause, it appeared that in 1854, the president and directors, then in charge of the affairs of the defendants, instituted an inquiry into the administration and management of a person who had been superintendent of their railroad for ten years. Among other subjects the nature of his connection and dealings with the plaintiff, who had likewise been in the service of the Corporation as "general foreman of all their carpenters," engaged the attention of the committee of investigation. The president of the Company, who conducted this inquiry before this committee on behalf of the Corporation, seems to have been convinced that the superintendent had exhibited partiality for the plaintiff, and had allowed him extravagant compensation for service, and the privilege of free transit over the road for himself, his workmen, and freight, to the detriment of the Company, and in breach of his duty as superintendent. The superintendent defended himself against these and other imputations, and produced testimony to the skill and fidelity of the plaintiff while in the service of the Company; also, to the value of his services, and to the effect that no unusual or improper favor had been extended to him.

The president of the Company, in the course of the investigation, addressed a letter to an architect, who had some acquaintance with the plaintiff, to request his opinion of his skill as a mechanic, and whether the services of the plaintiff could have had any peculiar value to to a railroad company. The reply of this architect was very pointed and depreciative of the plaintiff, affirming that "he was not entitled to rank as a third-rate workman," and "was unable to make the simplest geometrical calculations." All the testimony collected by the committee, as produced by the superintendent, was carefully reduced to writing, and printed; first for the use of the president and directors, and afterwards was submitted to the Company at their meeting on the 8th of January, 1855, with a report which exonerated in a great measure the superintendent from any malpractice in consequence of his relations with the plaintiff. The investigation was searching, and testimony, which, with the report of the committee, fills two printed volumes, was submitted to the Company. The letter of the architect, in answer to the letter of the president, is printed in one of these volumes, and this publication is the libel complained of. Several of the directors testify they were not aware of the publication, and evidence was adduced that the plaintiff had declared that the investigation had resulted in increasing his business. A verdict was returned in favor of the plaintiff. The defendants are a Company incorporated by the Legislatures of Delaware and Pennsylvania, as well as of Maryland, to construct a railroad to connect the three cities which contribute to form its name, and a portion of their directors and stockholders are citizens of Delaware.

The defendants contend that they are not liable to be sued in this action; that theirs is a railroad Corporation, with defined and limited faculties and powers, and having only such incidental authority as is necessary to the full exercise of the faculties and powers granted by their charter; that, being a mere legal entity, they are incapable of malice, and that malice is a necessary ingredient in a libel; that this action should have been instituted against the natural persons who were concerned in the publication of the libel. To support this argument, we should be required to concede that a corporate body could only act within the limits and according to the faculties determined by the Act of Incorporation, and therefore that no crime or offense can be imputed to it. That although illegal acts might be committed for the benefit or within the service of the Corporation, and to accomplish objects for which it was created by the direction of their dominant body, that such acts, not being contemplated by the charter, must be referred to the rational and sensible agents who performed them, and the whole responsibility must be limited to those agents, and we should be forced, as a legitimate consequence, to conclude that no action ex delicto or indictment will lie against a corporation for any misfeasance. But this conclusion would be entirely inconsistent with the legislation and jurisprudence of the States of the Union relative to these artificial persons. Legislation has encouraged their organization, as they concentrate and employ the intelligence, energy and capital of society, for the development of enterprises of public utility. There is scarcely an object of general interest for which some association has not been formed, and there are institutions whose members are found in every part of the Union, who contribute their efforts to the common object. To enable impersonal beings—mere legal entities, which exist only in contemplation of the law—to perform corporal acts, or deal with personal agents, the principle of representation has been adopted as a part of their constitution. The powers of the corporation are placed in the hands of a governing body selected by the members, who manage its affairs, and who appoint the agents that exercise its faculties for the accomplishment of the object of its being. But these agents may infringe the rights of persons who are unconnected with the corporation, or who are brought into relations of business or intercourse with it. As a necessary correlative to the principle of the exercise of corporate powers and faculties by legal representatives, is the recognition of a corporate responsibility for the acts of those representatives.

With much wariness, and after close and exact scrutiny into the nature of their constitution, have the judicial tribunals determined the legal relations which are established for the corporation by their governing body, and their agents, with the natural persons with whom they are brought into contact or collision. The result of the cases is, that for acts done by the agents of a corporation, either in contractu or in delicto, in the course of its business, and of their employment, the corporation is responsible, as an individual is responsible under similar circumstances. At a very early period, it was decided in Great Britain, as well as in the United States, that actions might be maintained against corporations for torts; and instances may be found, in the judicial annals of both countries, of suits for torts arising from the acts of their agents, of nearly every variety.

Trespass quare clausum fregit was supported in 9 Serg. & R., 94; Mound v. Monmouthshire Canal Co., 4 Mann. & G., 452, Assault and Battery; Moore v. Fitchburg R. R. Co., 4 Gray, Mass., 465; East'n Co.'s Ry. Co. v. Broom, 6 Exch., 314. For damages by a collision of rail cars and steamboats, Phil. & Read. R. R Co. v. Derby, 14 How., 465; N. Y. & Va. S. S. Co., 19 How., 241. For a false representation, Finnie v. Glasgow & S. W. R. Co., 34 L. & Eq. R., 14; Etting v. Bk. U. S., 11 Wheat., 59.

The case of The National Exchange Co. of Glasgow v. Drew, 2 Mac. H. of L. Cas., 103, was that of a company in failing circumstances whose managers sought to appreciate its stock by a fraudulent representation to the company, and a publication of the report as adopted by it, that its affairs were prosperous. Two of its stockholders were induced to borrow money from the company to invest in its stock. The question in the cause was, whether the company was responsible for the fraud. In the House of Lords, upon appeal, Lord St. Leonards said: "I have come to the conclusion, that if representations are made by a company fraudulently, for the purpose of enhancing the value of stock; and they induce a third person to purchase stock, those representations so made by them, bind the company. I consider representations by the directors of a company as representations by the company, although they may be representations made to the company." * * * The report "becomes the act of the company by its adoption and sending it forth as a true representation of their affairs; and if that representation is made use of in dealing with third persons, for the benefit of the company, it subjects them to the loss which may accrue to the party who deals, trusting to those representations."

It would be difficult to furnish a reason for the liability of a corporation for a fraud, under such circumstances, that would not apply to sustain an action for the publication of a libel.

The defendants are a corporation, having a large capital distributed among several hundred of persons. Their railroad connects large cities, and passes through a fertile district. Their business brings them in competition with companies and individuals concerned in the business of transportation. They have a numerous body of officers, agents and servants, for whose fidelity and skill they are responsible, and on whose care the success of their business depends. The stock of the company is a vendible security, and the community expects statements of its condition and management. There is no doubt that it was the duty of the president and directors to investigate the conduct of their officers and agents, and to report the result of that investigation to the stockholders, and that a publication of the evidence and report is within the scope of the powers of the corporation.

But the publication must be made under all the conditions and responsibilities that attach to individuals under such circumstances. The Court of Queen's Bench, in Whitfield v. South Eas. R. R. Co., 96 Eng. C. L. (May, 1858), say: "If we yield to the authorities which say that, in an action for defamation, malice must be alleged, notwithstanding authorities to the contrary, this allegation may be proved by showing that the publication of the libel took place by order of the defendants, and was, therefore, wrongful, although the defendants had no ill will to the plaintiffs, and did not mean to injure them." And the court concluded: "That for what is done by the authority of a corporation aggregate, that a corporation ought as such to be liable, as well as the individuals who compose it."

The question arises, whether the publication is excused by the relations of the president and directors, as a committee from their board, to the corporation itself. It cannot be denied that the inquiries directed by those officers were within the scope of their power, and in the performance of a moral and legal duty, and that the communication to their constituents of the evidence collected by them, and their conclusions upon the evidence, was a privileged communication in the absence of any malice or bad faith. But the privilege of the officers of the corporation as individuals, or of the corporate body, does not extend to the preservation of the report and evidence in the permanent form of a book for distribution among the persons belonging to the corporation or the members of the community. It has never been decided that the proceedings of a public meeting, though it may have been convened by the authority of law, or of an association engaged in an enterprise of public utility, could be reported in a newspaper as a privileged publication. But a libel contained in such proceedings, if preserved in the form of a bound volume, might be attended with more mischief to private character than any publication in a newspaper of the same document. The opinion of the court is, that in so far as the corporate body authorized the publication in the form employed, they are responsible in damages. The circuit court instructed the jury:

1. If the jury find, from the evidence in this case, that the defendants, by the President and Directors of said Company, published the letter from John T. Mahoney to S. M. Felton, President, &c., dated March 3d, 1854, in the declaration mentioned, and that any or all of the statements in the said letter respecting the plaintiff in his trade and occupation are false; and shall further find, that the said President and Directors, at the annual meeting of the stockholders of said Company, held 8th January, 1855, reported to the said stockholders their action in the premises, and that the proceedings of the committee of investigation (which contained the said letter) were then being printed, and, as soon as printed, would be distributed to the stockholders, and that said report was accepted by the stockholders; and if the jury shall further find, that, after the meeting of the stockholders had adjourned, the President and Directors of said Company distributed the book containing the said letter among the stockholders of this Company, or any of them, then the jury may find for the plaintiff.

2. And if the jury find for the plaintiff under the first instruction, they are not restricted in giving damages to the actual positive injury sustained by the plaintiff, but may give such exemplary damages, if any, as in their opinion are called for and justified, in view of all the circumstances in this case, to render reparation to the plaintiff, and act as an adequate punishment to the defendant.

The first instruction is erroneous, because the publication to which the court referred as blameworthy, and to authorize the jury to find a verdict against the defendant, took place after the commencement of this suit.

The second instruction contains the same error, and is objectionable for the additional reason that the rule of damages is not accurately stated to the jury.

In Day v. Woodworth, 13 How. S. C., 371, this court recognized the power of a jury in certain actions of tort to assess against the tort-feasor punitive or exemplary damages. Whenever the injury complained of has been inflicted maliciously or wantonly, and with circumstances of contumely or indignity, the jury are not limited to the ascertainment of a simple compensation for the wrong committed against the aggrieved person. But the malice spoken of in this rule is not merely the doing of an unlawful or injurious act. The word implies that the act complained of was conceived in the spirit of mischief, or of criminal indifference to civil obligations. Nothing of this kind can be imputed to these defendants.

The letter of Mahoney was reported to the Company with other evidence that rendered it innocuous, and its statements were never adopted by them. The plaintiff has repeatedly affirmed that he had derived an advantage from the investigation by the Company, and, upon reading all the evidence, as reported and published, we do not perceive how an impression unfavorable to him could have been made by it upon any candid mind. The circumstances under which the evidence was collected, and the publication made, repel the presumption of the existence of malice on the part of the Corporation, and so the jury should have been instructed

The averments in the declaration of the facts proper to give the Circuit Court jurisdiction over the parties, are identical with those which were fully considered by this court, and received the sanction of two thirds of the Judges in Marshall v. The Baltimore and Ohio R. R. Co., 16 How., 314. A repetition of the discussion that took place and was reported with that case is deemed to be unnecessary.

The only plea filed in this cause is the general issue. That plea raises an issue upon the merits of the complaint, and leaves the jurisdictional allegations without a traverse.

No question involving the capacity of the parties in the cause to litigate in the Circuit Court can be raised before the jury under such pleadings. Conard v. Atlantic Insurance Co., 1 Pet., 386; Evans v. Gee, 11 Pet., 80; Wickliffe v. Owings, 17 How., 47. The testimony that the States of Delaware and Pennsylvania had respectively granted a corporate character to the same corporators that form the corporation in Maryland, for the extension of the railroad through those States, to connect the cities that appear in the name of the Corporation, and the testimony that some of the directors of the several corporations reside in Delaware, in the condition of the pleadings, was immaterial and irrelevant.

For the errors we have noticed, the judgment of the Circuit Court is reversed, and the cause remanded.

PHILA., WILM. & B. R. R. Co.
v.
QUIGLEY.

Mr. Justice Daniel:

In the judgment of this court, so far as it directs a reversal of that of the Circuit Court, I fully concur. But, in my view, the decision has performed but half its proper office, by omitting to order a dismission of this case by the circuit court.

It is not designed here to repeat the arguments or the authorities so often and so unavailingly adduced, in opposition to the cognizance of the federal court of controversies in which corporations are parties.

Some cursory recapitulation will, however, be attempted of previous decisions made here, as evincing the progress of relaxation and inconsistency from the first departure, from what, by me, at least, are deemed sound, legal, and constitutional principles, down to the remarkable instance exemplified in the case before us.

The first step in this progress was the decision that a corporation might be made a party in the federal courts, by entirely destroying the existence of such a body; and by this process it was pretended that it was made capable of suing and being sued, and by imposing liabilities on private natural persons, who, by the very nature and character of the corporate body, and by the terms of its organization, possessed not one of its powers, and could exercise not one of its functions. Vide 5 Cranch, 61, The Bank of the United States v. Deveaux. Next, and in order to cover this glaring irregularity, it seemed necessary to transform a corporation into a quasi, or into so much of a citizen as would authorize its pleading and being impleaded in the federal courts, although the Constitution and the laws of the United States do not recognize nor make mention of any particular part or fraction of a citizen, but confine the cognizance of the courts to controversies between citizens of different States, sustaining their full natural political, and social relations. This was the object attempted in the case of The Cincinnati Railroad Company v. Letson, in the 2d of Howard, 497. It then became necessary to give to this citizen corporation a local habitation or residence, in order to fix his origin and position, on which it was, and is yet, perhaps, conceded, that his admission into the courts of the United States was dependent; and this court, to accomplish this purpose, seems to have settled upon one or the other of the following conclusions, or perhaps in part on both: that either the locality within which this citizen may be fabricated, or that within which his agents or factors (viz.: the president and directors) hold their place of business, determines his political position, his capacities and responsibilities, although it is palpable this latter conclusion abrogates completely the previous doctrine of this court, that the rights and powers of a corporation remain and adhere in the individuals interested in the company, and do not appertain regularly to the associated or organized body. From these anomalous conclusions have arisen the curious formula in pleading, by which access has been sought and permitted in the courts of the United States—as, for instance, a certain company, a body corporate, created by some stated authority, but without averring citizenship or residence on the part of that body, but leaving these to be implied by the court, sues or is sued. In the case under review, the party defendant below is averred to be the Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore Railroad Company, a body corporate in Maryland, incorporated by a law of Maryland. Here, then, is averred neither citizenship, nor an identity with, nor an equivalent for citizenship, nor residence, nor commorancy anywhere, on the part of the defendant. The corporate body is stated to be in Maryland, but whether in its organized constitution, or by the citizenship of its president and directors, or by its individual members, or whether in either character it is or is not of Maryland, is left for the court to supply; and this, too, in defiance of the unbroken chain of decisions from Bingham v. Cabot, 3 Dall., 382, down to Sullivan v. Fulton S. B. Co., 6 Wheat., p. 450, comprising twelve distinct cases, ruling, in totidem verbis, that under the 2d section of the 3d article of the Constitution, not only must the parties to suits in the federal courts be citizens and inhabitants of different States, but that this character must be averred expressly, and must appear upon the record, and cannot be inferred from residence or locality, however unequivocally stated; and that the failure to make the required averment will be fatal to the jurisdiction of a federal court, either original or appellate, and is not cured by the want of a plea or of a formal exception in any form, and that even the party who is guilty of the irregularity may avail himself of it upon appeal.

This case is marked by peculiarities, which, if they can, consistently with the rules of pleading and evidence, be regularly brought into view, will show more clearly than has hitherto been done, the effects of the anomalous proceedings above adverted to. It is ruled by all the cases, that where want of jurisdiction in the federal courts is apparent on the face of the pleadings, the courts, original and appellate, are bound to take notice of this defect, and that there can be no requisition on parties to show it either by averment or proof. The establishment of this principle certainly dispenses with the necessity for proofs in such a case, for why undertake to establish by proof that which is admitted? Moreover, the character of the defect partakes more, perhaps, of matter of law than of fact. Hence it may be questionable, how far the introduction of any evidence, and still more of cumulative evidence, is or was admissible to show this admitted or patent defect, which it has been so often ruled that the court must take notice of without plea or demurrer. But we see by the record, that evidence, extensive and documentary, was introduced as to this point, and read without objection. And to what conclusions does this evidence, if admissible, inevitably lead? According to the decisions previously made here with respect to corporations—according, too, to the argument of counsel for the defendant in error—the Baltimore Railroad Company was created separately and exclusively by the State of Maryland, and its attributes of suing or being sued, and every other attribute or function, was imparted and perfected by that separate authority, which was limited by the power of Maryland. So, too, the Philadelphia Railroad Company was separately and independently created by Pennsylvania; and, in like manner, and with like effect, the Delaware Railroad Company, by the State of Delaware. Neither of the States just mentioned had the power to create a citizen of another State, nor to create or invest any attribute or right of citizenship beyond its own jurisdiction. It follows, then, that the incorporation of these companies was in each a separate, independent and distinct and complete Act, operating only within the sphere of the legitimate authority that performed it, and any right or attribute of citizenship it could confer, would be imparted to its own subjects alone; it could not determine the polity of other communities, or the rights of their people. But, by some professional magic, these three separate creations, which, if invested with any of the qualities of citizenship, were necessarily circumscribed as to these by the authority of their respective States, are here converted into one. These three quasi citizens of different States are transformed into one; and, although threefold in form, less than one; and by this transformation are brought into tribunals where real citizens are not permitted to litigate without averring, and if denied, not without proving the truth and reality of their character in obedience to the command of the Constitution. In the present instance, this may subserve the convenience of the individual, but in another aspect the mischiefs incident to such a relaxation would be apparent and serious. It would be putting it in the power of separate corporations, deriving their origin from distinct sources by claiming a joint name or title, to select at will, for its purposes, a forum within that jurisdiction, within which either corporate body was created. The averments of citizenship and residence being dispensed with by this court, no check is left to such a combination and irregularity; and by this practice there is extended to artificial bodies, which are not, and cannot, from the nature of things, be citizens, privileges which belong by the Constitution to citizens only, and upon proof, if required, of the reality of their character as such.

It has just been remarked that the arguments against the jurisdiction of the federal courts over corporate bodies may be found in some of the opinions delivered in the case of Marshall v. The Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, and it is said that these arguments it is unnecessary to repeat, and it is seen that they have not been deemed of sufficient cogency to prevent a concurrence in proceedings and pretensions which those arguments were urged to condemn.

The relevancy or the justice of the above declaration I confess myself somewhat at a loss to comprehend. If it be intended by way of recantation, prompted by a conviction of the unsoundness of those arguments, and as a criticism upon those who are unable to chime in with the notes of such a palinodia, it would seem to me that a direct avowal of that conviction, and of the consequences to which it had led, would have been nothing more than justice to all. If, on the other hand, the soundness of those arguments is still regarded as a regular deduction from constitutional principle, and from fealty to the Constitution, then a relinquishment of those arguments, or the failure to assert them on every occasion similar to that first calling them forth, however justifiable in the view of others, would in myself, by myself, be felt as a compromise of a sacred and solemn duty. The vindication of truth, whenever we shall be called on to speak or to act, can never, in my opinion, be properly shunned; I, therefore, am bound to re-assert all which I have endeavored earnestly, however feebly, to maintain, and which I still believe.

I am further of the opinion, that apart from any question as to the peculiar jurisdiction of the federal courts, this action could not be maintained in any forum possessing even general legal powers. It is to be borne in mind, that the proceedings in this case are not founded upon any express or peculiar right or authority vested by statute or other special and competent power, but are claimed as the legitimate consequences inherent in, and flowing from, thenature and constitution of corporations aggregate. By those who affirm this doctrine it is indispensable that they should show as inherent in, and consistent with, the constitution of such corporations, the attributes and qualities to which proceedings like the present are calculated to apply, and with which they can, by any rational or logical comprehension, be made applicable. The metamorphosis which would transmute an aggregate corporation into a natural person, must necessarily transfuse into this new creation the capabilities and qualities of the being into which it is changed. Upon any other hypothesis, the fact of identity could not be. Natural persons are capable of the passions of love and hate; can contend in mortal combat by duel or otherwise; can go into the field in command of armies; can sit upon the bench of justice, or in the legislative or executive departments of the Government. According to this transmutation theory, all these qualities are imparted to its new Promethean experiment, who, of course, could he be only apprehended or laid hold of, might, like his prototype—or, more properly, his other self—be subjected for the misuse of those qualities to the extremest penalties of the law, the scaffold or the gallows. To my apprehension, this theory involves the confounding of all political, legal, moral and social distinctions. By that apprehension, derived from the definitions of corporations aggregate, as given by Brooke, Coke and Blackstone, and by the express language of this tribunal in the earlier cases decided by it, these bodies are regarded as merely artificial—a species of fictiones juris, created for particular objects, and vested certainly with no greater or higher attributes than the creator of those bodies has power to bestow. Man can have no power to confer mind, passion, or moral perception, nor moral powers, upon a mere fabrication of his own—a mere piece of parchment or paper. No quo animo, therefore, can be affirmed of a fiction to which no animus, or passion, or moral quality, can be imparted.

It has ever been admitted, that into slander or libel, malice essentially enters. Slander or libel is an injury inflicted with a wicked or malevolent motive. Reason and common sense would hence conclude, that where there could be motive of no kind whatsoever, there could be no malice, and therefore no offense, of which malice is the essential, the leading and distinguishing characteristic.

In several of the English cases it has been ruled, that trover and trespass quare clausum fregit may be maintained against a corporation; and this, with respect to the latter action, is going a great way, as it is not very easy to explain in what mode a mere fiction or legal faculty can act vi et armis; yet a conceivable distinction may be taken between acts injurious in their effects and viewed as mere facts, and performed independently of or without motive, and for which the actor is bound to make reparation, and conduct, the character of which lies exclusively in the motive, and which, apart from such motive, can neither exist nor be conceived.

In conformity with these conclusions is the opinion of Aldersen, Baron, as late as the year 1854. Vide, Stevens v. Midland Counties Railway Co., 10 Exchequer Rep., 356.

But a precedent for the affirmation of such a legal, physical, and moral anomaly as an act to be characterized and appreciated by a quality which by no possibility can appertain to it, is relied upon in this case; and so far as that precedent is comprehended, it seems designed, at any rate, for an application like the one made of it in this cause. It is believed, however, to be a solitary precedent; and as the force of that precedent (owing, perhaps, to no fault in his Lordship's reasoning, but in those who are incapable of understanding his logic) is not very clearly apprehended; and as it most certainly contravenes the course of decision for centuries, the presumption of not yielding implicitly to the ruling of a Lord Chief Justice may perhaps be pardoned. This precedent is found in the case of Whitfield et al. v. The Southeastern Railway Company, just cited from the bench. That was an action for a libel, and the declaration was demurred to, for the reason that malice could not be affirmed of a corporation aggregate.

His Lordship says: "The demurrer to the declaration in this case can only be maintained on the ground that the action will not lie without proof of express malice, as contradistinguished from legal malice."

How is this expression of his Lordship to be understood? The averment of malice, and the application of that averment to the defendants, was a question arising upon the pleadings, and upon the character or capacity of the party complained of, as disclosed upon the face of the declaration. Whether malice, either express or implied, could be imputed to the plaintiff, could have no influence a priori; if malice was alleged, it opened at once the only legitimate question arising upon the demurrer, viz.: could the defendants be guilty of malice? The character or the degree of malice was a question arising upon the proofs, and was the proper subject for the instructions from the judge. It would be difficult to find a precedent in pleading, wherein a distinct averment as to express or implied or legal malice was made.

His Lordship proceeds: "But if we yield to the authorities which say that in an action for defamation malice must be alleged, notwithstanding authorities to the contrary." And here, with a willingness always to be instructed, I would gladly learn what authorities those are to which reference is thus made; for within the sphere of my own inquiries, going as far back as Owen, 51; Noy, 85; 1 Saunders, 242; 4 Bur., 2422; 8 Taunton, 246; and coming down to 8 Adolph. & Ell., 652; 1 M. & S., 639, it is held, without a dissentient, that the declaration must show a malicious intent in defendant; and although the word "maliciously" is not absolutely necessarily requisite, yet words of equivalent import must be used; and it is said that the usual and better form of pleading is, falsely and maliciously. Vide 1 Rep., 273.

His Lordship further proceeds, or is made to say: "This allegation may be proved, by showing that the publication of the libel took place by order of the defendants, and was therefore wrongful, although the defendants had no ill will to the plaintiffs, and did not mean to injure them. Therefore (note the conclusion), "The ground on which it is contended that an action for a libel cannot be maintained against a corporation aggregate, fails." He who can connect this corollary with the premises surpasses any ingenuity of mine.

To return to his Lordship's argument:

"This allegation may be proved." What allegation, we ask? Why, the libel, a malicious publication, "by showing that it took place by order of the defendants, although the defendants had no ill will to the plaintiffs, and did not intend to injure them." Thus it is said to be the law, that a libel may exist without an unfriendly intention; and with equal reason might it be alleged or imputed where the intention was amicable.

I give the concluding reasons ascribed to his Lordship for his decision. They are as follows:

"I may mention, that corporations aggregate are now so common, that I believe that a public journal is conducted by a corporation aggregate, limited. Therefore, it seems to us, that for what is done by the authority of a corporation aggregate, that a corporation aggregate ought, as such, to be liable as well, perhaps, as the individuals. Therefore, we think there ought to be judgment for the plaintiffs."

The connection between the number of aggregate corporations and their capacities or liabilities, and the dependence in any degree of the one upon the other, I leave to those who have been favored with greater perspicacity than has been given to me. I am wholly unable to perceive them.

In fine, with due respect for others, and with becoming diffidence of myself, I am constrained to say, of the opinion in the case of Whitfield v. The Southeastern Railway Company, as it has been broughtto the view of this court, that in its argument and conclusions it is confused and obscure; and is incongruous and contradictory, both in its reasoning and its conclusions. In the line of English adjudications it presents itself as solitary and eccentric, and in opposition to the most inveterate, the clearest, and reiterated distinctions announced by the sages of the law—distinctions having their foundation in reason and in the essential character of the subjects to which those distinctions have been applied. I cannot yield to that opinion my assent. I think, therefore, that for either of the objections before assigned there should be added to the reversal of the judgment of the Circuit Court an order for a dismission of the suit.

JOSIAH L. PARRISH.

Appeals and writs of error from court of Oregon Territory—jurisdiction, as to subject and amount.

By the Act of Congress organizing Oregon Territory it is provided (sec. 9) that writs of error and appeals from final decisions of the Supreme Court of Oregon shall be allowed to the Supreme Court of the United States, where the value of the property, or the amount in controversy, shall exceed $2,000, and also in cases where the Constitution of the United States, or an Act of Congress, or a Treaty of the United States, is brought in question.

Where the amount of damages does not appear from the bill, or otherwise, and it is difficult to see how either party to the suit could sustain damage, and neither the Constitution of the United States, nor an Act of Congress, nor a Treaty, was brought in question in the lower court; there is no jurisdiction in this court to examine and revise the decree of the Supreme Court of Oregon.

Argued Dec. 22, 1858. Decided Jan. 17, 1859.

APPEAL from the Supreme Court of the Territory of Oregon.

The case is fully stated by the court.

Messrs. R. Johnson, R. Johnson, Jr., C. Cushing and R. H. Gillet, for appellants.

Mr. S. S. Baxter, for appellee.

Mr. Justice Catron delivered the opinion of the court.

Parrish filed his bill in equity against Lownsdale and others in a District Court of Oregon Territory, praying for an injunction to restrain the defendants from obstructing a narrow piece of land, claimed as Water Street, lying in front of the complainant's storehouse, and a square of ground claimed as his, two hundred feet on each side, laid off into eight lots, as city property, within the City of Portland, and on one of which the storehouse stands. The strip of land lying in front of these lots extends to the Wallamette River; at that point, the land is several hundred feet wide. The complainant alleges that it was dedicated to the public as a street, to the use of the proprietors of the town, for the purposes of commerce; the river there being within the flow of tide, navigable for ships, and requiring a wide front space to accommodate loading and discharge of cargoes.

The District Court found that Water Street,

NOTE.—Jurisdiction of U. S. Supreme Court dependent on amount. Interest cannot be added to give jurisdiction. How value of thing demanded may be shown. What cases reviewable without regard to sum in controversy. See note to Gordon v. Ogden, 28 U. S. (3 Pet.), 33.

in the City of Portland, was bounded by the river, opposite the lots of the complainant; and that the defendants at the commencement of the suit were about to obstruct the same, to the special injury of the plaintiff, as stated in the bill; and thereupon an injunction was granted, as prayed for. This decree was affirmed in the Supreme Court of Oregon, where the respondents carried the cause by appeal, and from that decree they have appealed to this court, and we are called on to revise the proceedings below.

The first question presented is, whether this court has jurisdiction and power to re-examine the controversy.

By the Act of Congress organizing the inhabitants of Oregon Territory into a government, it is provided (sec. 9) that writs of error and appeals from final decisions of the Supreme Court of Oregon shall be allowed to the Supreme Court of the United States, where the value of the property, or the amount in controversy, shall exceed $2,000, to be ascertained by the the oath of either party, or by a competent witness; and also in cases "where the Constitution of the United States, or an Act of Congress, or a Treaty of the United States, is brought in question."

The complainant assumes that he would sustain special damage by the obstruction of the space between his property and the river, but how much damage does not appear from the allegations in the bill, or otherwise; and it is difficult for us to see how either party to the suit could sustain damage to his rights of property, as the town was laid off in 1845, on property of the United States, whilst our inhabitants who had emigrated there, and those of Great Britain, held joint possession of the country in virtue of the Treaty between the two Nations of October 20th, 1818 (art. 13), which was continued in force by the Convention of August 6th, 1827.

In June and July, 1845, the people of Oregon Territory, "for mutual protection, and to secure peace and prosperity among themselves," elected delegates, who met in convention, and adopted laws and regulations for their government, "until such time (say they) as the United States of America extend jurisdiction over us." In this plan of government, it is provided that anyone wishing to establish a claim to land shall designate the extent of his claim by line marks, and have it recorded in the Office of the Territorial Recorder; the claim not to exceed a mile square, or 640 acres. The description of claim under which the complainant and the respondents set up title is founded on this regulation. By the Treaty of 15th June, 1846, the line dividing our possessions and those of Great Britain west of the Rocky Mountains was concluded; and on the 14th of August, 1848, Congress passed an Act to establish the Territorial Government of Oregon, in which the laws then existing under the Provisional Government (established by the people) are continued, and declared to be operative until altered. "But (says the Act, sec. 14) all laws heretofore passed in said Territory, making grants of land, or otherwise affecting or incumbering the title to lands, shall be, and are hereby declared to be, null and void." Congress passed no law in any wise affecting title to lands in Oregon Territory till September 27, 1850; and the bill in this case was filed July 29, 1850, so that, when the litigation commenced, neither party to the suit had any title to or interest in the land whatever; and therefore the respondents and appellees could not sustain injury by being enjoined not to erect buildings on lands belonging to the Government in which they had no interest. It is proper to remark here, that we have nothing to do with, nor can we notice, rights acquired to this property by Acts of Congress passed subsequently to the origin of this controversy.

Neither the Constitution of the United States, nor an Act of Congress, nor a Treaty, was "brought in question" in the lower court; neither side could have legitimately raised such a question, and called for its decision; and to give this court jurisdiction of the case, in this instance, the question must have been raised and decided in the lower courts, and it must so appear on the record. 16 Pet., 281.

Being of opinion that there is no jurisdiction in this court to examine and revise the decree of the Supreme Court of Oregon, we order the appeal to be dismissed.

v.

JOSEPH C. GAMBLE AND DAVID GAMBLE.

Writ of error in revenue cases—value in controversy immaterial, when U. S. is plaintiff—otherwise, in suits by importer.

The Act of May 31st, 1844 (5 Stat., 658), authorizes a writ of error, at the instance of either party, upon a final judgment in a circuit court in any civil action brought by the United States for the enforcement of the revenue laws, or for the collection of duties, due or alleged to be due, without regard to the sum or value in controversy.

The writ of error is authorized in those cases only in which the United States is plaintiff, in the suit.

The law cannot be extended to suits brought by the importer against the Collector; and in such cases where the sum or value in controversy does not exceed $2,000, the writ must be dismissed for want of jurisdiction in this court.

Argued Jan. 14, 1859. Decided Jan. 18, 1859.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Maryland.

On motion to dismiss for want of jurisdiction.

The case is stated by the court.

Mr. J. S. Black, Atty-Gen., for plaintiff in error.

Mr. J. M. Campbell, for defendants in error.

Mr. Chief Justice Taney delivered the opinion of the court:

A motion has been made to dismiss this case for want of jurisdiction, upon the ground that the sum in dispute does not exceed $2,000.

The case is this: the plaintiff in error is the Collector of the Port of Baltimore, and, as such, demanded a certain amount of duties on goods imported by the defendants in error, which they believed was greater than the amount imposed by law. The duties demanded were paid under protest, and this suit was brought to recover back the amount alleged to be overpaid. At the trial, the jury, under the instruction of the court, found a verdict in favor of the defendants in error for the sum of $193.88, upon which a judgment was entered against the Collector; and this writ of error is brought on that judgment.

The Act of Congress which is supposed to give jurisdiction in cases of this description is the Act of May 31st, 1844, 5 Stat., U.S., 658. This Act authorizes a writ of error, at the instance of either party, upon a final judgment in a circuit court in any civil action brought by the United States for the enforcement of the revenue laws, or for the collection of duties due or alleged to be due, without regard to the sum or value in controversy. And it is true, that the same reasons which induced the Legislature to give the writ of error in the cases mentioned in the law, apply with equal force to suits against a collector to recover back duties which he alleged to be due, and had already collected. The questions are of the same character, and the interest of the United States the same in either case. And it is most probable that suits against the Collector were omitted in the Act of Congress by some oversight or accident.

But, however that may be, the writ of error is authorized in those cases only in which the United States are plaintiffs in the suit. The language of the law is too plain to admit of doubt, and the words cannot by any reasonable or fair construction be extended to suits brought by the importer against the Collector; and as the sum or value in controversy does not exceed $2,000, and the case is not provided for by the Act of Congress referred to, the writ must be dismissed for want of jurisdiction in this court.

General objection, when not sufficient—Deed, when evidence in Arkansas—tax deed prima facie evidence of regularity of proceedings and validity of sale—onus probandi thrown on assailant of tax title—decree of court of that State, a bar against claims of illegality in proceedings.

Where the objections against the admission of a deed, were that the deed and the certificate bore upon their face unmistakable evidence of fraud, but what those marks of fraud were, is not stated, this court cannot inquire whether the decision admitting the deed was right.

By the law of Arkansas, every deed which shall be acknowledged or proved and certified as prescribed by that Act and recorded, may be read in evidence in any court in that State without further proof of execution.

By a law of the same State, sales and conveyances made by the sheriff and collector for the non-payment of taxes, shall vest in the grantee a good and valid title, and shall be evidence of the regularity and legality of the sale of such lands.

The intention of the Statute is to cast the onus probandi on the assailant of the tax title, by making the deed evidence of the title of the purchaser, subject to be overthrown by proof of non-compliance with the law.

A deed from sheriff and collector on a tax sale, is prima facie evidence of the assessment, taxation, and forfeiture of the land; of the regularity of every proceeding previous to the sale; of the competency of the officer making the sale and conveyance; of the validity of the sale; and casts upon the assailant of any of these prerequisites, the burden of showing the absence or defectiveness of any of them.

But every question with respect to the assessment, or the non-payment of the taxes, or the regularity of the proceedings of the sheriff and collector was in this case concluded by the petition of the purchaser to the State Court, and the decree of confirmation pronounced upon that petition.

The jurisdiction of that court over the controversy is founded on the presence of the property, and like a proceeding in rem it becomes conclusive against the absent claimant as well as the present contestant.

By the law of that State, a judgment or decree confirming such sale operates as a bar against all persons thereafter claiming said land, in consequence of informality or illegality in the proceedings.

The history of the case and a statement of facts appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. A. Fowler, for plaintiff in error:

The deed from Borden, as collector, to Lawson, embracing the land in controversy, was clearly inadmissible as evidence, upon the following grounds, to wit:

1st. The general objection applicable to all collectors' deeds upon general principles, in the absence of any statute making them per se evidence of title, or evidence at all, unless all the material previous steps and acts required by the laws, providing for the assessment and collection of taxes and sale of lands for the non-payment thereof, &c., make it utterly inadmissible.

Art. Dig. (1848), ch. 139, p. 888, sec. 112.

Mr. G. C. Watkins, for defendants in error.

Mr. Justice Daniel delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action of ejectment, instituted by the plaintiff, a citizen of Indiana, and as sole heiress of John Crow, deceased, against James Lawson, a citizen of the State of Arkansas, for the recovery of a tract of land situated in the State last mentioned, described in the declaration, and averred to be of greater value than $2,000. Pending the proceedings in the Circuit Court, Lawson, the original defendant, having died, the cause was revived against the defendants upon the record as his heirs, and upon a trial of the cause, on the 16th day of April, 1856, the jury rendered a verdict for the plaintiff, and on that verdict the court gave a judgment in favor of the plaintiff, with costs of suit. At a subsequent day of the term, the court, on motion of the defendants, awarded a new trial in their behalf; and on the 22d day of April, 1857, this cause being again heard, a verdict was rendered in favor of the defendants below, the defendants in error, and upon this verdict the court pronounced judgment in behalf of the defendants, inclusive of all the costs of suit.

In this action the defendant pleaded six several pleas: first, the general issue not guilty, on which there was a joinder; and five other pleas, all of which were either stricken out or overruled upon demurrer except the fifth, to the following effect: that the defendant was a purchaser of the tract of land in the declaration mentioned, at a sale made by the sheriff and collector of the revenue of the county in which the said land was and is situated, for the non-payment of the taxes assessed and due thereon, and that he has held the peaceable, adverse, and uninterrupted possession of the said land under and by virtue of his said purchase for more than five years next before the commencement of this suit. On this fifth plea, also, issue was joined.

Upon the trial in the court below, the plaintiff gave in evidence a patent from the United States, bearing date on the 1st day of February, 1821, to the plaintiff and others, heirs of John Crow, deceased, for the land in contest, which patent was read without objection, the titles of both plaintiff and defendants being deducible from that act of the Government. The plaintiff further proved that she was the only surviving child and the sole heir of John Crow, and was the widow of James Thomas, who died in the year 1840; and that from the year 1839 she had resided in the State of Indiana, and was a citizen of that State. The plaintiff further proved the possession of Lawson, the ancestor of the defendants, of the land at the time of the institution of this suit, and his refusal to surrender possession to the plaintiff. And here the plaintiff rested her case upon the evidence.

The defendants, in support of their title and right of possession, offered in evidence a deed, bearing date on the 2d day of November, 1846, from W. B. Borden, at that date sheriff, and as such ex officio assessor and collector of the taxes for the County of Pulaski, in which county the lands in contest are situated, conveying those lands to the ancestor of the defendants.

In this deed it is recited, that in the year 1824, in conformity with the laws in force in the then Territory of Arkansas, the lands in contest, with several other parts of sections, all situated in the County of Pulaski, were by the sheriff, as ex officio assessor and collector for the county, assessed for the taxes payable thereon for that year. That in conformity with the law, and within the time thereby prescribed, the sheriff, as ex officio assessor and collector, filed in the office of Clerk of the County Court a list of lands and town lots owned and assessed to persons then residents of said county, in which list the lands in the said deed were embraced; that a copy of the list so made and filed was by the said officer put up at the door of the court house of said county, and published in the Arkansas State Gazette, a newspaper printed in the Territory, for four weeks successively before the day of sale, as prescribed by law. That the sheriff, as ex officio assessor and collector, in like conformity with law, on the 1st day of November, 1824, exposed and offered for sale, at the court house of the said county, at public auction, the several parcels or parts of sections of land above mentioned, for the payment of the taxes, and the penalty payable upon the amount of those taxes. That Thomas Newton became the purchaser of the several parcels of land, and transferred his certificate of his purchase of those lands to James Lawson. That the sheriff, as ex officio assessor and collector, made out and delivered to the purchaser a certificate of purchase containing the requisite description of the taxes and penalty on the lands listed for taxation, and that the amount was paid by Newton, the purchaser. That one year having elapsed since the sale by the sheriff, and that Newton, by James Lawson, having presented to Borden, the Sheriff and ex officio Assessor and Collector, the certificate of purchase, and requested a deed to Lawson from the sheriff, the deed from Borden, as Sheriff, &c., was made to Lawson.

The defendants next offered in evidence, under the certificate of the Clerk of the Circuit Court of Pulaski County, a copy from the records of that court of the acknowledgment in open court, on the 13th of July, 1849, by Borden, as late Sheriff and Collector of Pulaski County, of the deed executed by him to Lawson for the several parcels of land therein described, including the land in controversy, as having been sold by the predecessor of said Borden as Sheriff and Collector, under and by virtue of a levy and distress made upon such tracts of land to secure the payment of the state and county taxes, and the penalty and costs and charges due for the years 1824 and 1825.

The defendants also proved that Thomas Newton, by a deed bearing date on the 21st of May, 1846, assigned and conveyed to James Lawson, in his lifetime, all the right, title, interest and claim, in and to the lands purchased by Newton of the Sheriff in the year 1824, and embraced in the deed from Borden, Sheriff, &c., to Lawson.

The defendants then offered the record, duly certified, of the proceedings on the chancery side of the Circuit Court of the County of Pulaski, on the 20th day of February, 1850, upon a petition in the name of James Lawson in his lifetime, setting forth the several facts and transactions recited in the deed from Borden to Lawson, and also the execution and recording of that deed; and further setting forth that he, Lawson, after the time allowed by law for the redemption of said lands, and more than six months before the commencement of the then present term of this court, caused a notice stating the authority under which said sheriff's sales took place, and also containing the same description of the lands purchased as that given in said sheriff's deed, and declaring the price at which said tracts were respectively bargained, the nature of the title by which the same are held, and calling on all persons who could set up any right to any part of said lands, in consequence of any irregularity or illegality connected with said sales, to show cause at the first term of the circuit court of said county, six months after the publication of said notice, being the present term of the court, why the respective sales so made should not be confirmed, pursuant to a petition to be filed in this court for that purpose, to be inserted and published in the Arkansas State Democrat, a newspaper published in Little Rock, for six weeks in succession, the last insertion to be more than six months before the commencement of the present term of this court, as by affidavit of the publisher, setting forth a copy of such notice, with the date of the first publication thereof, and the number of insertions sworn to and subscribed before a justice of the peace of said county, and properly authenticated and filed with said petition, fully appears to the court, and concluding with the decree of that court in the following words:

"Whereupon all and singular the allegations made in said petition being by the production of said deeds and due proofs of the publication of said notice, proven and established to the satisfaction of the court here, and no cause having been shown against the prayer of said petition by any person whomsoever, but the said application being and remaining wholly undefended—

"It is therefore considered and adjudged and decreed by the court here, that said sheriff's sales, and each of them, be, and the same are hereby in all things confirmed, according to the statute in such case made and provided; and further, that this decree shall operate as a complete bar against any and all persons hereafter claiming said lands, or any part thereof, in consequence of any informality or illegality in any of the proceedings aforesaid, and that the title of each of said tracts of land be decreed and considered as hereby confirmed and completed in said James Lawson and his heirs and assigns forever; saving, however, to infants, persons of unsound mind, imprisoned, beyond the seas, or out of the jurisdiction of the United States, the right to appear and contest the title to said lands, within one year after their disabilities may be removed. And it is ordered that the petitioner pay the costs thereof."

To the admission of this record, the plaintiff in the circuit court objected, but the court permitted it to be read in evidence. The deed from Borden, Sheriff, to Lawson, of the 2d of November, 1846, was also objected to by the same party, but was allowed to be given in evidence to the jury.

Several prayers for instructions were presented, both by the plaintiff and the defendants, and decisions thereon were made by the court. We shall consider the following only, as comprising the real merits of this controversy:

The objections urged against the admission of the deed from the sheriff to Lawson were—

1st. That the deed and the certificate of its admission to record bore upon their face unmistakable evidence of fraud. What those clear marks of fraud upon the face of those documents were, is not stated with sufficient particularity, in order to a correct comprehension of their character. The court to whom this objection was presented must have decided upon an inspection of the papers (probably correctly); but whether correctly or otherwise, this court cannot now inquire, in compliance with assertions altogether vague, and pointing to no specific vice in any one of those papers. This first objection, therefore, to the admissibility of the deed is of no force.

But the deed from Borden was further objected to, because, as it was alleged—

2d. That there was no valid proof of the execution of such paper as a deed.

3. There was no proof of the authority of the said William B. Borden to execute such deed, or that he was, at the date of its execution or acknowledgment, collector of taxes in and for said County of Pulaski.

4th. It was not accompanied by proof that the said tract of land in controversy was either assessed, or taxed, or advertised, or legally sold, in the year 1824, for taxes, or that the said Henry Armstrong, as such alleged sheriff, assessor, and collector, in the year 1824, had any authority to assess said tract of land for taxation, or to sell it for the non-payment of such taxes.

5th. That such paper, purporting to be such deed, was not admissible in evidence until it should be first proved that all the material steps required by law, preparatory to and in the assessment and taxation of said tract of land, and in the advertisement and sale thereof in the year 1824, and all previous steps required by law prior to the execution of such deed, had been complied with, either by record evidence or by evidence in pais.

These four objections are met and overcome, first, by the language of the Statutes of Arkansas; and second, by the interpretation given of those Statutes by the Supreme Court of that State. By the law of Arkansas regulating conveyances (vide Digest of the Laws of 1848, by English & Hempstead, p. 268, sec. 26), it is declared that "every deed or instrument of writing conveying or affecting real estate, which shall be acknowledged or proved and certified as prescribed by that Act, may, together with the certificate of acknowledgment, be recorded by the recorder of the county where the land to be conveyed or affected thereby shall be situate; and when so recorded, may be read in evidence in any court in this State without further proof of execution." Again, in the same digest (pp. 888, 889, sec. 112, title Revenue), it is declared, with respect to sales and conveyances made by the sheriff and collector for the non-payment of taxes, that "the deed so made by the Collector shall be acknowledged and recorded as other conveyances of lands, and shall vest in the grantee, his heirs or assigns, a good and valid title, both in law and equity; and shall be received in evidence in all courts of this State as a good and valid title in such grantee, his heirs or assigns, and shall be evidence of the regularity and legality of the sale of such lands." Again (p. 889, sec. 114), it is provided, "that if any collector shall die or be removed from office, or his term of service expire, after selling any land for taxes, and before making and executing a deed for the same, the collector then in office shall make and execute a deed to the purchaser of such lands, in the same manner, and with the like effect, as the officer making such sale would have done."

By another provision of the Statute of Arkansas, a like power to that previously mentioned as vested in the sheriff, with respect to delinquent lands, is conferred upon the Auditor of Public Accounts, and, in the exercise of that power by the latter officer, the provisions of the statute, both as to the acts to be performed, and the consequences to ensue from those acts, are substantially and almost literally indentical with those relating to the proceedings by the sheriff.

Thus (Dig., p. 893, sec. 141), it is enacted that "the Auditor shall execute, under his hand and the seal of his office, and deliver to each person purchasing lands or lots at such sale, a deed or conveyance, in which he shall describe the lands or lots sold, and the consideration for which the same was sold, and shall convey to the purchaser all the right, title, interest, and claim, of the State thereto;" and by sec. 142, "the deed so made shall vest in the grantee, his heirs or assigns, a good and valid title, both in law and equity, and shall be received in all the courts of this State as evidence of a good and valid title in such grantee, his heirs or assigns, and shall be evidence that all things required by law to be done to make a good and valid sale were done, both by the Collector and Auditor."

In the interpretation of this provision in pari materia, the Supreme Court of Arkansas, in the case of Merrick & Fenno v. Hutt, 15 Ark., p. 338, say: "A more comprehensive provision could hardly be found, and it might seem, at first view, to make the tax title derived from the Auditor, valid against all objections. But that was not the design. The evil to be remedied was, that the entire burden of proof was cast on the purchaser, to show that every requisite of the law had been complied with, and the deed of the officer was not even prima facie evidence of the facts therein stated. The general and prevailing principle was, that to divest the owner of land by a sale for taxes, every preliminary step must be shown to be in conformity with the Statute; that it was a naked power, not coupled with an interest, and every prerequisite to the exercise of that power must precede it, and that the deed was not prima facie evidence that these prerequsites had been observed. The intention and scope of the Statute were to change this rule so far as to cast the onus probandi on the assailant of the tax title, by making the deed evidence of the title of the purchaser, subject to be overthrown by proof of non-compliance with the substantial requisites of the law. Proof, then, that any of the substantial requisites of the law had been disregarded, or that the taxes have been paid, no matter by whom, would be sufficient to destroy the tax title, whether emanating from the auditor or the collector. The deed of the auditor is not required to contain recitals. All that is necessary is to describe the property sold, and the consideration, and to convey to the purchaser all the right, title, interest, and estate, of the former owner, as well as all the right, title, interest, and claim, of the State, to the land."

The same exposition of the Statutes of Arkansas, and of the policy and necessity in which those Statutes have had their origin, is given in the case of Pillow v. Roberts in this court, reported in the 13th of How., 472. The deed, then, from the Sheriff and Collector, Borden, to Lawson, was clearly prima facie evidence of the assessment, taxation, and forfeiture of the land; of the regularity of every proceeding previously to the sale of the land forfeited; of the competency of the officer making the sale and conveyance; of the legal validity of the sale; and cast upon the assailant of any of these prerequisites the burden of showing the absence or defectiveness of any of them. And without such a showing, that which was prima facie proof will be taken as conclusive.

But every question with respect to the assessment of the lands in controversy, or the non-payment of the taxes, or the regularity of the proceedings of the sheriff and collector, inclusive of the execution and recording of the deed from that officer, seems to have been concluded by the petition of the purchaser on the chancery side of the Circuit Court of Pulaski County, and the decree of confirmation pronounced upon that petition as herein already mentioned.

The provisions of the law by which this petition by the purchaser from the sheriff or auditor of lands sold for the non-payment of taxes, and by which the proceedings upon such a petition, and the effect of a decree of confirmation pronounced thereupon, are contained in the Digest of the Laws, pp. 966, 967, under the head of Tax Titles, sections from one to six, inclusive. By the section last mentioned (6th) it is declared, that the judgment or decree confirming said sale shall operate as a complete bar against any and all persons who may thereafter claim said land in consequence of informality or illegality in the proceedings, and the title to said land shall be consided as confirmed and complete in the purchaser thereof, his heirs and assigns forever. The decree of the Circuit Court of the County of Pulaski, before referred to, expressly sets forth a compliance with every requisite prescribed in the aforegoing six sections of the Statute, including the notice by publication calling on all persons to show any objection to the purchase from the officer, in consequence of informality, irregularity or illegality connected with the sale of the lands; the failure of any contestant to appear in obedience to such notice, and the expiration of the time limited in the saving reserved in behalf of those of whom exception is made in the Statute.

Upon an inspection of the proceedings in the court of Pulaski, the court below was of the opinion that it constituted a valid title in the defendant against the whole world and charged the jury that "it devested the title of the plaintiff, and that since the rendition of said decree she had no title to the said tract of land, unless she has, since the date of the said decree, obtained title thereto from or under the said James Lawson, or unless such decree was obtained by fraud."

Of the effect of a decree of confirmation like the one in this case, there exists no doubt under the construction of the Statutes of Arkansas by the Supreme court of that State, as declared in the case of Evans & Black v. Percifull, 5th Ark., 425. The court in that case held the decree to be conclusive, although they thought it erroneous; yet, inasmuch as it had not been reversed for error, they ruled that it could not be collaterally impeached; and they say, in express terms, that had there been no deed from the officer, in fact, the decree would have been conclusive of the sufficiency of the evidence to warrant it.

In the case of Parker v. Overman, in 18 How., 140, this court, commenting upon the Statute of Arkansas, has said: "In case no one appears to contest the regularity of the sale, the court is required to confirm it on finding certain facts to exist; but if opposition is made, and it should appear that the sale was made contrary to law, it became the duty of the court to annul it. The judgment or decree in favor of the grantee in the deed operates as a complete bar against any and all persons who may thereafter claim such land in consequence of any informality or illegality in the proceedings. The jurisdiction of the court over the controversy is founded on the presence of the property, and like a proceeding in rem it becomes conclusive against the absent claimant as well as the present contestant."

This interpretation of the Statutes of Arkansas is fully coincident with that propounded by the cases of Merrick & Fenno v. Hutt, and of Evans & Black v. Percifull, already cited; and sustain the correctness of the instructions of the circuit court as to the effect of the decree of confirmation of the Circuit Court of Pulaski County.

A question was raised in the circuit court, as to the effect of the five years' statutory limitation upon the rights of the parties; as, for instance, whether that statute would begin to run from the date of the deed of the sheriff or from the period of the recording of that deed, or whether it could operate at all upon a constructive seisin effected by the sheriff's deed, or required, in order to give it effect, an actual seisin by the purchaser from the sheriff. This question we do not deem it necessary, or even regular, in this case to discuss or determine. In the first place, the rulings of the court below with regard to it were in favor of the plaintiff in error, and therefore can constitute no wrong or gravamen on his part. In the next place, we consider that question embraced and concluded, or rather excluded, by the proceedings in chancery against the property, and the confirmation of the title by the decree.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

FREDERICK L. BARREDA AND PHILIP BARREDA, Plffs. in Er.,

v.

BENJAMIN H. SILSBEE ET AL.

(See S. C., 21 How., 146-170.)

Construction of contract for extra freight—declarations of defendant's agents, when admissible—what is proof of agent's authority—other charters and parol evidence, when admissible to fix price—parol evidence to show fraud.

By charter of a ship for transportation of guano from the Chincha Islands to the U. S., freight was to be paid at the rate of $25 per ton, and the ship was to have the benefit of any advance in freights made by the charterers in the U. S. before she finished loading at the Islands. Held, that the plaintiffs were entitled to an additional compensation under this special clause, equal to the excess paid or contracted to be paid to other parties.

The declarations and statements of agents of defendants, made at the time other charters, relied upon by plaintiffs, were executed, were properly admitted as evidence.

Such charters, after they were executed by the owners, were forwarded to defendants, and received their signatures; these facts present strong presumptive evidence of authority of the agents fully warranting the court in submitting the question to the jury.

Such parol evidence did not conflict in any manner with the written contract.

Plaintiffs' rights being made to depend upon the subsequent transactions of defendants with third parties, it was clearly proper to admit proof to show what those transactions were.

For the purposes of any examination of the case which it is competent for this court to make under the Constitution of the United States and the laws of Congress, it must be assumed that the facts of the case have been correctly found by the jury.

Their finding is conclusive, unless a new trial is awarded by the court in which the case is tried, or in the appellate tribunal, for some error of law.

Parol testimony is always admissible, in matters of contract, to show fraud.

Argued Dec. 24, 1858. Decided Jan. 31, 1859.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Maryland.

This was an action of assumpsit brought in the court below, by the defendants in error, to recover freight earned by the ship Shirley on a charter thereof, made to the plaintiffs in error, who are agents of the Peruvian Government.

The trial in the court below resulted in a verdict and judgment for the plaintiffs, for the sum of $30,944.62, with costs; whereupon the defendants sued out this writ of error.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. John Nelson and S. T. Wallis, for plaintiffs in error:

The clause in the charter-party sued upon, by which the benefit of a possible advance in guano freights within a fixed period, was given to the owners of The Shirley, must be interpreted to refer exclusively to an advance in freight which might be paid by the charterers for voyages similar to that which The Shirley was to perform for them, viz.: homeward voyages from the Chincha Islands to Hampton Roads or further north, and none other.

Gether v. Capper, 80 E. C. L., 696.

2. The charter-parties offered in proof, to show an advance under the stipulation in The Shirley's charter, and which constitute the only evidence in the case upon that point, tending to support the pretensions of the defendants in error, are on their face for voyages of a different character from that of The Shirley, and afforded no evidence to maintain the action.

3. Parol evidence was not admissible to affect the construction of the subsequent charters in question, or to show any intention or views of the plaintiffs in error and the other contracting parties in making them, because it is not pretended, and there is no evidence professing to show, that there was any outside contract of understanding in reference to any one of them varying or qualifying the written stipulations in any way, or that any intentions or views of the plaintiffs in error or of the other parties, were embodied or carried out otherwise than in and through the writings themselves, by which, and which only, all parties agreed to be and held themselves bound.

This point is in conflict with the court's second instruction, and is raised by the sixth prayer of the plaintiffs in error.

Shankland v. The Corporation of Washington, 5 Pet., 394; Sprigg v. Bank of Mt. Pleasant, 14 Pet., 200; Selden v. Meyre, 20 How., 509.

4. Even if parol evidence had been admissible at all under the circumstances stated in the preceding point, the particular parol proof especially objected to by the plaintiffs in error, was not because it consisted exclusively of statements made by agents of the plaintiffs, not only without authority, but in direct opposition to the written instructions, which constituted their special and only authority. It was the naked offer of the unauthorized statements of agents—made while negotiating contracts which they were authorized to and did negotiate—produced in evidence, neither to contradict nor to qualify the written stipulations agreed on, nor to avoid the instruments themselves, but merely to show the existence of fraudulent intentions.

This point is raised by the 1st exception of the plaintiffs in error, and is in conflict with the court's second instruction also.

2. Stark. Ev., 84; Fairlie v. Hastings, 10 Ves., 126, 127; Betham v. Benson, 1 Gow., 45.

5. The imputation of fraud on the part of the plaintiffs in error, was not only gratuitous but unnecessary. The case of the defendants in error could not be bettered by showing that the Boston charters, with the aid of parol testimony, amounted to what was patent in the New York charters without it. Hence the parol proof in controversy was as superfluous as it was in opposition to what was believed to be the established rules of evidence.

6. That even if the specific terms of the charter-parties in question could be overlooked or explained or altered by parol, and it were competent to treat them all as stipulating for a round voyage, out and home, for $30 per ton, which is the broadest construction that could be applied to them, they would still furnish no proof of an advance in freight for a voyage merely homeward, like The Shirley's, with the privilege and benefit to the outward voyage to the owners, instead of the freighters.

Messrs. Reverdy Johnson and Brown & Brune, for defendants in error:

The defendants in error refer to the following authorities:

1. Freight, in the general legal sense of the term, means all rewards, hire or compensation, paid for the use of ships.

Pothier, Traite De Charte-parte, n. 1; Valin, tom., 1, p. 639, cited in Abb. Ship., 5 Am. ed., marg. p. 405; 3 Kent, 219.

Freight is the reward which the law entitles a person to recover, for bringing goods lawfully upon a legal voyage.

Abb., 425; McCulloch, Com. Dig., "Freight"; Bouvier Law Dic., "Freight."

2. Parol testimony of the declarations and statements of Nesmith and Brown, the agents of F. Barreda & Bro., made by them in respect to the charter-parties which they were negotiating prior to and at the time of the execution thereof, is admissible and competent evidence to explain the meaning and purpose of unusual provisions to inform the ship owners whether the plaintiffs in error meant to avail themselves of privileges reserved in the charters, or would waive them, as well as to show the true character of the transaction, that there was in fact a rise in freights to the benefit of which the defendants in error was entitled, and that it was the object of the plaintiffs in error to disguise and conceal such rise by the form of the charter-parties executed by them.

Mr. Justice Clifford delivered the opinion of the court:

This case comes before the court upon a writ of error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Maryland. It is an action of indebitatus assumpsit, and was brought in the court below by the defendants in error, who were the original plaintiffs, to recover the freight earned by the Ship Shirley on a charter of the ship made by the plaintiffs to the original defendants for the transportation of guano from the Chincha Islands to the United States. At the date of the charter-party, the defendants were the agents of the Peruvian Government, and, as such, had been for some time in the habit of chartering vessels to bring guano to the United States for sale. Its exportation from the islands is a Government monopoly, in which none except those employed by the Government are permitted to engage, and the defendants are the sole agents of that Government in the United States. They reside in Baltimore, and have agents in New York and Boston, duly authorized to negotiate for vessels, and after the charters are signed by the owners, to transmit them to the defendants for their approval and signature. Their agents in Boston negotiated the charter of The Shirley, and, after it was executed in behalf of the owners, it was accordingly transmitted and signed by the defendants. It is dated Boston, April 11, 1854, and recites, among other things, that The Shirley was then lying at New York, and that she was to proceed to Callao, from Australia, where she was then bound, and from thence with all convenient dispatch to the Chincha Islands, to take in her cargo of guano. She was to be at Callao ready to load in the course of January and February, 1855, or sooner, and ninety running days were allowed for loading. After completing her loading, she was to proceed direct to Hampton Roads, her place of destination, to receive orders from the defendants or their agents to discharge at any safe port not south of Hampton Roads or north of Cape Ann. Freight was to be paid at the rate of $25 per ton, custom-house weight, and the ship was to have the benefit of any advance in the guano freights made by the charterers in the United States before she finished loading at the Islands.

She sailed from New York the 1st of May, 1854, with a full cargo on owners' account, which she discharged at Australia, and sailed thence, in pursuance of her charter, to Callao and the Chincha Islands. Her cargo of guano was loaded between the first day of January and the 9th day of March, 1855, and on the following day she sailed for Callao, and thence to her place of destination for orders. On her arrival at Hampton Roads, she received orders to go to Baltimore, which she accordingly did, and was there unloaded between the 1st and the 25th day of July, 1855, having brought home fourteen hundred and fifty-nine tons of guano. Some correspondence, however, had taken place between the parties before The Shirley arrived. On the 8th day of June, 1855, the plaintiffs wrote to the defendants, referring to that clause in the charter providing for an advance, and suggesting that they had been induced to make the charter at the solicitation of their agents, upon the assurance that they should receive every advantage from any rise in freight, and expressing their astonishment at learning that they did not intend to pay more than at the rate of $25 per ton, and signifying at the same time their willingness to listen to any fair proposition the defendants had to make. To that letter the defendants replied, under date of the 11th of June, 1855, to the effect that the guano freights had remained at the same rates since The Shirley was chartered; admitting, however, that they had since taken up certain vessels with the privilege of using them outwards, and saying that they had done so in several instances, and that in such cases they had allowed the vessels a compensation for that use, but that such additional compensation had nothing to do with the rates of guano, as would appear by referring to those charters. Other correspondence took place between the parties, or their counsel, which it is not necessary to notice at the present time. After the cargo of The Shirley was discharged, the defendants rendered an account of the voyage to the plaintiffs, showing a balance in their favor of $21,943.89, calculating the freight at $25 per ton, without any allowance for a rise under the advance clause of the charter, which was not satisfactory to the plaintiffs. They claimed a further sum under the advance clause, equal to $5 per ton upon the whole freight brought home. Seven other vessels were chartered by the defendants between the 11th day of April and the 27th day of May, 1854, for the transportation of guano from the Chincha Islands to the United States. All of those charters were introduced by the plaintiffs, subject to objection, and they are substantially the same with that of The Shirley, and contain a similar clause, giving the vessels the benefit of a subsequent rise in the guano freights. On the 1st day of June, 1854, after these charters were executed, the defendants wrote to their agents in New York and Boston, inclosing a pro forma charter party for vessels out and home, and authorized and instructed them to take up as many vessels as they could under such charters, without allowing the least deviation from its terms, and directing them in the same communications to keep former rates, without benefit of advance, for home charters. It recites that the vessel taken up shall proceed to Callao, from a port in the Indian or Pacific oceans, "where she is at present bound," and thence with all convenient dispatch to the Chincha Islands to take in her cargo, and that the vessel shall be ready to load in the course of January, 1855, and shall thence proceed to Hampton Roads for orders and to discharge, as is provided in the charter of The Shirley. Freight was to be paid on charters conforming to those instructions at the rate of $25 per ton, custom-house weight, and the charters were to contain the following stipulation:

"It is further agreed, that within one week from the date thereof, the owners of the vessel may, if they see fit, elect to dispatch her direct to Callao and the Chincha Islands, to load, as hereinbefore provided; and in case the owners shall so elect, the charterers shall be entitled to all her earnings for such outward voyage, and shall further have the privilege of shipping by her such outward cargo, not exceeding two hundred tons, as they may desire, provided they shall do so within ten days after the owners shall have announced their election. The charterers, on the arrival of the vessel at the home port, to pay, in full satisfaction for such earnings and privilege, and of all outward freight, such gross sum as shall be equivalent to $5 per ton on the return cargo delivered."

Twenty-five vessels were subsequently taken up under charter-parties substantially conforming to that stipulation, all bearing date prior to the 30th day of July following that instruction. Sixteen were negotiated by the agents of the defendants residing in New York, five by the defendants themselves, and the remaining four by their agents in Boston. In many of these charters, the clause prescribing the port from which the vessel was to proceed to Callao, as contained in the pro forma charter-party, was omitted, and another substituted in its place, as "from where she was bound," or "from Amsterdam, where bound", or from New York direct to Callao. These deviations, however, from the form of a charter furnished by the defendants must have been approved by them, as all the charters subsequently negotiated by their agents were duly transmitted to Baltimore, and received their signatures, before they went into operation. Some other deviations from the pro forma charter-party, of minor importance, were introduced into one or more of these charters, which it is not important to notice in this investigation, as they all contained the stipulation above mentioned, which is the principal subject of controversy in this suit. Under that stipulation, the owner might elect, within a week from the date of the charter party, to dispatch the vessel direct to Callao and the Chincha Islands; and in that event, the charterers had the privilege to ship the outward cargo for their own benefit, not exceeding two hundred tons, provided they elected so to do within ten days after the owner announced his decision to send the vessel direct; and in case the owner so elected and sent the vessel, no matter whether the charterers freighted her out or not, the owner was entitled in all events to demand $5 per ton on the return cargo of guano, in addition to the $25 agreed to be paid in the general clause of the charter-party already stated.

Whether the vessel carried out much or little freight, or none at all, was entirely immaterial to the owner, so far as respected the earnings of the vessel, as the additional compensation in any event was to be estimated and ascertained, not upon the outward freight, but upon the return cargo; and it made no difference in respect to time, as the owner contracted that the vessel, whether freighted or not, should be at Callao, ready to load in the course of January, under the penalty of $12.000.

That stipulation, whatever might have been its object, resulted in no material pecuniary advantage to the defendants. They did not furnish any outward cargo, except in a single instance, and then only to a small amount, consisting of seven or eight boxes of cigars. In another instance, they offered to ship two iron boilers for Callao, but the owners refused to take them as deck load, alleging that it would be dangerous, and a dispute led to a cancellation of the contract by mutual consent. Except in those two cases, the defendants never attempted to avail themselves of the benefits secured by that provision, either by furnishing the freight directly or by advertising the vessels. Their counsel insist that that the additional compensation was paid for the privilege thus secured; and that it makes no difference whether it was exercised or not, inasmuch as they had the right to avail themselves of it if they saw fit, and found it to be for their advantage. All or nearly all of the vessels proceeded directly from the United States, carrying out no freight for the defendants, and on their return were paid the additional $5 for every ton of guano brought home. How much that additional compensation amounted to does not appear, nor are there any data in the record from which it can be definitely ascertained. According to the charter of The Shirley, she was a ship of nine hundred and ten tons burden, and it appears that she brought home fourteen hundred and fifty-nine tons of guano, reckoned at custom-house weight. Eleven of the charters of other vessels give their tonage, showing that their measurement, on an average is a fraction more than eight hundred tons. Assuming that the average of the eleven, whose tonage is given, is the true average of the whole number chartered containing that provision, and that each brought home cargo in proportion to The Shirley, it would show that the amount of the additional compensation allowed to those vessels under that clause could not have been much less than $150,000. Whatever the sum was, whether more or less than the amount supposed, it must be assumed, on the theory of the defendants, that it was allowed and paid by the charterers, in consideration of the privilege secured to load their own vessels outward for their own benefit, which privilege the case shows they never exercised to an extent to enable them to realize therefrom more than the sum of $50. It was insisted by the plaintiffs in the court below that this stipulation was inserted in those charters, as a device to avoid the effect of the advance clause in the charter of The Shirley and other vessels, which had gone out under similar charters, and that the real contract was one to give $80 per ton for the transportation of the guano to the United States, and consequently showed that the charterers, within the period specified, had made an advance in the guano freights equal to the amount of such additional compensation.

They also offered parol proof in support of their view of these transactions, which was received by the court, subject to objection.

Such brief portions only of the testimony as are necessary to a proper understanding of the legal questions to be decided will here be reproduced.

In respect to the vessels whose charters required that they should proceed from some port in the Indian or Pacific Ocean, the plaintiffs proved that the vessels proceeded direct to Callao, and that the owners, at the time the charters were made, did not and had not contemplated any such indirect voyage, and elected, in the act of executing the charters, to send the vessels direct, and, in some instances, were told immediately, by the agents of the defendants, who negotiated the charters, that they might proceed at once, as there was no outward cargo for them. Those charters from which the above clause had been stricken out still contained the stipulation in question, allowing the election to the owners as to the course of the voyage; and in such cases, the vessels went out in ballast direct to Callao, and on their return from Chincha Islands with a cargo of guano were paid the additional compensation.

Another class of testimony was to the effect that the agents of the defendants in New York and Boston offered $80 per ton for the charter of the vessels to go direct, and, after the offers were accepted by the owners, that the charters were drawn up, containing this stipulation; and that the owners, when the charters were presented for execution, inquired why they were so drawn, and were told that it was because they had made charter-parties at $25 per ton, and consequently did not wish that these charters should show more than that sum; and in one instance, the answer to the inquiry was, that they did not wish these charters to conflict with former charter-parties, which provided for a freight of $25 per ton, with the benefit of a rise. These declarations of the agents of the defendants were proved by the owners of the vessels who made the charters. It was proved by the defendants that their agents never had any authority in respect to such charters, except what was conferred by the letters of instruction of the 1st of June, 1854; and those agents, upon being called as witnesses, denied that they had ever made the declarations ascribed to them by the witnesses called by the plaintiffs.

Further explanatory and rebutting testimony was introduced by the defendants; but, as it does not give rise to any legal question for the consideration of the court, it is omitted.

After the testimony was concluded, the counsel of the defendants requested the court to exclude from the consideration of the jury all the declarations and statements of those agents given in evidence by the plaintiffs, respecting the terms, conditions, or purposes, of the charter-parties negotiated by them, varying from the authority and powers confirmed on them by their written instructions; which the court refused to do, so far as regarded the declarations and statements made at the time the charters were executed, and ruled and determined that all such declarations and statements were admissible and competent evidence. To which refusal and ruling the defendants excepted, and their exception was allowed by the court.

Prayers for instructions were made by both parties—first by the plaintiffs, and then by the defendants. Those presented by the defendants were made the subject of exception. They are eight in number, including the one embraced in the third bill of exceptions; but inasmuch as we have come to the conclusion that the instructions given by the court cover the whole controversy between the parties, they will not be specifically examined; and for the further reason, that their separate consideration would be tedious and unprofitable.

The instructions given by the court are to the effect that, in addition to the balance proved on the account rendered, "the plaintiffs are entitled to recover such further sum, if any, as the jury may find to have been the advance on the freights agreed to be paid by the defendants to any one for bringing guano from the Chincha Islands to the United States in charters executed here between the 11th day of April, 1854, and the day the jury shall find The Shirely finished loading at the Chincha Islands.

2. "That in ascertaining whether any contract for advanced freight was made, the jury are not confined to the consideration alone of the charter-parties executed after the 11th day of April, 1854, but are to consider them in connection with all the evidence in the case; and if they find that the real contract, in some one or more of the charter-parties, was a contract to bring guano here and deliver it at $30 per ton, and that the five-dollar clause was added to avoid any responsibility under the advance clause in the charter of The Shirley, then the $5 advance is an advance freight, within the meaning of the first instruction.

Under these instructions, the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiffs in the sum of $30,944.62; whereupon, the defendants brought a writ of error to this court.

1. They now insist, among other things, to the effect that the advance clause in the charter-party of The Shirley must be interpreted to refer only to homeward voyages from the Chincha Islands to the United States.

2. That the charter-parties introduced by the plaintiffs to show an advance in the guano freights are on their face for voyages of a different character from that of The Shirley, and afforded no evidence to maintain the action.

3. That the parol evidence introduced by the plaintiffs was not admissible, and should have been rejected.

4. That even if the parol evidence were admissible, and it were competent to treat the charters under consideration as stipulations for a round voyage out and home, they would still furnish no evidence of an advance in the guano freights over the charter of The Shirley, unless it were shown that the earnings of The Shirley out, and the $25 per ton home, were less than the $30 per ton stipulated to be paid under that construction of these charters.

I. All of these propositions except one involve, directly or indirectly, the construction of the advance clause in the charter of The Shirley. Under that clause, The Shirley was to have the benefit of any advance in the guano freights made by the charterers in the United States, before she finished loading at the Islands. She was chartered on the 11th day of April, 1854; and finished loading on the 8th day of March, 1855; and consequently her owners were entitled, by the express words of the contract, to claim the benefit of any advance in such freights made by the defendants in the United States between those dates.

Such an advance in guano freights could only be made by the defendants, as they were the only persons in the United States who were authorized by their government to contract for its transportation. They could raise the price of transportation or reduce it, if the owners of vessels would accept their terms; and if not, they could refuse to contract; and if no contracts for an advance were made by them within the period specified in the charter of The Shirley, then her owners would have no claim for additional compensation. Their right to such compensation was not referred to the state of the market, but to the subsequent contracts made by the defendants for the transportation of guano from the Chincha Islands to the United States. Freights in general might rise ever so much, and it would not benefit the plaintiffs unless the defendants yielded to its influence, and made contracts to give higher rates for the transportation of guano. They might engage in any other branch of commerce, and give what rates of freight they pleased, and yet if they did not make any advance in the guano freights in the United States, it would not confer any benefit upon the plaintiffs. Any other advance in freights, however great and by whomsoever made, were not to be taken into account in determining the question whether the plaintiffs were entitled to additional compensation. In order to avail the plaintiffs in that behalf, it must be an advance made by the defendants, and one paid, or agreed to be paid, as the price for the transportation of guano to the United States; and it must appear that the contract for such payment was made within the period specified in that clause of the charter of The Shirley. Looking, therefore, to the plain import of the language of the parties, and applying that language to the subject matter of the contract, as described in the contract itself, it is clear that the word "freight," as qualified by the word "guano," was used in a special sense, and refers solely to the price paid, or agreed to be paid, by the defendants, within the prescribed time for the transportation of guano from the Chincha Islands to the United States. According to the terms of the contract, the parties agreed that the subsequent transactions of the defendants, in the same trade, should furnish and constitute the standard or criterion by which their rights and duties towards each other growing out of that clause in the charter-party should be ascertained and determined. Their agreement was to the effect that the plaintiffs contracted unconditionally to perform the service mentioned, for which they were, in all events, to receive the sum specified in the general clause of the charter-party; and in case the defendants paid or contracted to pay other persons a greater sum for the like service before The Shirley finished loading, then the plaintiffs were entitled to an additional compensation under this special clause, equal to the excess so paid or contracted to be paid to such other parties. They chartered their vessel early in the season, as appears from the date of the charter-party, and it may fairly be inferred from the nature of the transaction and the surrounding circumstances, independently of the correspondence, that some such stipulation was regarded as necessary to protect their interests in the contingency of a rise in freights as the season advanced. Such contingent agreements are of frequent occurrence between merchants and ship owners, and are entitled to receive a liberal interpretation, as they are in furtherance of trade and equal justice between the parties. They are, perhaps, more frequently based upon the future state of the markets, and not, as in this case, upon the transactions of the merchant in the particular trade. Parties, however, have the right to select what criterion they please; and where their contracts are fairly made, they must receive a reasonable construction, so as to carry their intention into effect, and in general that intention must be gathered from the language employed, the surrounding circumstances, and the subject-matter. Our attention has been drawn to the case of Gether v. Capper, 80 Eng. C. L., 696, as asserting a contrary doctrine. On a careful examination of the facts of that case, and the opinions of the judges, we have come to the conclusion that it is not opposed to the views here expressed. It was an action for freight upon a charter-party. Under the general clause, a given rate of freight was to be paid in all events, as in this case; and it contained a special clause, which stipulated that the plaintiff "was to receive the highest freight which he could prove to have been paid for ships on the same voyage, when the vessel passed Elsinore." At the trial, the plaintiff was unable to prove that any other vessel had made the voyage referred to in the charter-party. Failing in that attempt, he then offered proof that a higher rate had been paid for vessels about that time from Lundswall, or an adjacent port, to London, which is a very different voyage. Whereupon a verdict was taken for the plaintiff, reserving leave to the defendant to move to enter a verdict in his favor, or to reduce the damages, as the court should think fit. A rule to show cause was accordingly granted, and after argument it was made absolute. Separate opinions were given on the occasion by the judges, to the effect that the owner could not entitle himself to the additional compensation by proving that other vessels had been chartered at higher rates from Lundswall to London, that being a different voyage, and not within the fair intendment of the charter-party. Every one of the judges present placed the decision expressly upon the words of the charter-party, and the failure of the plaintiff to bring his case within their intendment. His right to additional compensation was made to depend, by the express words of the contract, upon his being able to prove that other vessels at the time specified received or were to receive higher rates of freight for the same voyage. He failed to exhibit the proof, and, of course, was not entitled to recover. His contract prescribed the criterion by which his claim to additional compensation was to be ascertained and determined, and he had no right to go out of the contract and select a new standard, to which the other contracting party had not consented. It is far otherwise with the plaintiffs in the case under consideration. Their case rests upon somewhat different grounds. They have proved the state of facts on which their right to recover depends. According to the verdict of the jury, and the instructions of the court, their case is brought within the legal intendment of the contract, leaving nothing for the consideration of this court, except the legal questions presented in the bills of exception. Their ship was to have the benefit of any advance in the guano freight made by the charterers in the United States before she finished loading. They contracted to bring guano from the Chincha Islands to the United States for a given rate per ton, and the defendants stipulated to pay that rate, and if they paid or contracted to pay other vessels a higher rate before The Shirley finished loading, then they agreed to give the plaintiffs an additional compensation equal to that excess; and for that excess of rate per ton the plaintiffs were entitled to recover, together with the balance of the account rendered, which was admitted to be correct by the defendants. These suggestions lead necessarily to the conclusion that there is no error in the charge of the Circuit Court, so far as respects the construction of the contract, as the instruction in that particular was in strict conformity to the views here expressed. It was to the effect that if the jury found that the defendants had agreed to pay others more than $25 per ton for bringing guano from the Chincha Islands to the United States under charter-parties executed here between the dates before mentioned, then they were authorized to find a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs for that excess. All of the charters relied on by the plaintiffs as tending to show that such was the fact, were substantially of the same character, so that if one had that tendency, then all had, and that was conceded in the argument, and must have been so understood by the jury.

II. In the next place, it is insisted that the declarations and statements of the agents of the defendants, made at the time those charters were executed, were improperly admitted as evidence, and two grounds are assumed in support of the proposition. First, that they were made without authority, and therefore were not admissible to affect the interests of the defendants; and second, that they were admitted in violation of the well-known rule that parol evidence is not admissible to explain, vary or contradict a written instrument. All such declarations and statements made subsequently to the execution of the charters were properly ruled out and excluded from the consideration of the jury.

1. Some brief reference to the facts of the case becomes necessary, in order to test the correctness of the first ground assumed under this last proposition. Full authority had been conferred upon those agents to negotiate for the vessels whose charters were introduced by the plaintiffs. Those declarations and statements were made by their agents in respect to the subject-matter of the negotiation, and at the time the charters were presented to the owners of the vessels for execution. After they were executed by the owners, they were forwarded to the defendants and received their signatures, and every assurance given by the agents to the owners of the vessels was subsequently made good by the defendants. They were told there was no outward cargo for them and that they might proceed immediately; and they were allowed to do so, without objection or remonstrance. The vessels carried out no freight, and, on their return, the owners were paid $30 per ton on the return cargo, without hesitation or complaint. Accompanying those explanations were others to the effect that the stipulation in question had been inserted in the charters, so that they might not conflict with those previously made providing for a rise in freight; and the circumstances fail to disclose any other substantial purpose for which it was done.

Parties do not usually contract heavy pecuniary obligations without some object in view; and as no substantial one is disclosed, except the one assigned by the plaintiffs, it is impossible to say, as matter of law, that the charters in question and the surrounding circumstances had no tendency to maintain the issue for the plaintiffs. Where the fact of agency has been proved, says Mr. Starkie, either expressly or presumptively, the act of the agent, co-extensive with the authority, is the act of the principal, whose mere instrument he is, and then, whatever the agent says, within the scope of his authority, the principal says; and evidence may be given of such acts and declarations, as if they had been actually done and made by the principal himself. That principle was directly sanctioned by this court in United States v. Gooding, 12 Wheat., 470, where the views of the author, as above quoted, were cited and approved. 2 Stark. Ev., 45. Whatever the agent does in the lawful prosecution of the business intrusted to him by the principal, is the act of the principal; and there, says Mr. Greenleaf, his representations, declarations and admissions, respecting the subject-matter, will also bind him, if made at the same time, and constituting a part of the res regestæ, and they are of the nature of original evidence, and not hearsay; and Judge Story, in his valuable treatise on the Law of Agency, maintains the same doctrine. 1 Greenl. Ev., 85; 113 Story on Ag., sec. 134. Acts and declarations of an agent are admissible under such circumstances, upon the ground that, whatever an agent does or says in reference to the business in which he is at the time employed, and within the scope of his authority, is done or said by the principal, and consequently may be proved in like manner as if the evidence applied personally to the principal. American Fur Co. v. The United States, 2 Pet., 364. On the whole case, we are of the opinion that the evidence of original authority in the agents was sufficient to warrant the court in submitting their declarations and statements to the jury.

In the same connection, it was also denied at the argument that there is any sufficient evidence in the case to show that the agents of the defendants had any authority to make deviations from the pro forma charter-party furnished to them on the 1st day of June, 1854. A recurrence to the evidence, however, will show that the suggestions are not well founded. They commenced negotiating for vessels under those instructions shortly after they were received, and continued the business till nearly the close of July. All the charters, after they were executed by the owners, were forwarded to the defendants, and received their signatures. One bears date as early as the 5th day of June, and others as late as the 29th day of July, showing that they were approved as they were forwarded, and at different times. These facts present strong presumptive evidence of authority, fully warranting the court in submitting the question to the jury.

2. The second ground assumed by the defendants, under this proposition, is, that the declarations and statements of their agents ought to have been excluded, for the reason that parol evidence is not admissible to explain, vary, or contradict, a written contract. That principle, as a general rule applicable to parties and privies, and their representatives and those claiming under them, is undeniable, and is not disputed by the counsel of the plaintiffs. They contended, however, in the court below, and still insist, that the right of the plaintiffs to demand additional compensation in this case was made to depend, by the express words of the contract, upon the subsequent transactions of the defendants in the same trade, and that the stipulation in the subsequent charters is so framed that it covers up and conceals the real nature of the contracts between the parties. They went farther in the court below, and still insist that the real contract was one to pay $30 per ton to bring guano from the Chincha Islands to the United States, and that the stipulation was framed in the form in which it appears, graduating $5 on the outward and $25 on the home voyage, for the express purpose of relieving the defendants from the responsibility which they had incurred to the plaintiffs, under the charter of The Shirley, and the jury have found all these alleged facts in favor of the plaintiffs. Whether the jury were warranted in so finding or not, is not a question for an appellate tribunal. That question cannot be re-examined by this court. For the purpose of any examination of the case which it is competent for this court to make under the Constitution of the United States and the laws of Congress, it must be assumed that the facts of the case have been correctly found by the jury. Repeated decisions of this court have affirmed the doctrine, which is but a repetition of the constitutional provision upon the subject, that no fact tried by a jury shall be otherwise re-examinable in any court of the United States than according to the rules of the common law, and it is well known that the only modes known to the common law of re-examining the facts of a case, after they have been found by a jury, are the granting of a new trial by the court where the issue was tried, or to which the record was properly returnable, or by the award of a venire facias de novo by an appellate court, for some error of law which intervened in the proceedings.

Parsons v. Bedford et al., 3 Pet., 447; U. S. v. King et al., 7 How., 845; Penhallow v. Doane, 3 Dall., 102; U. S. v. Eliason, 16 Pet., 301; Phillips v. Preston, 5 How., 289.

Whether the evidence, when offered, is admissible, is a question for the court; but when admitted, the question whether it is sufficient or not is for the jury, and it is their province to draw from it all such inferences and conclusions as it conduces to prove, and which, in their judgment, it does prove; and their finding is conclusive, unless a new trial is awarded by the court in which the case is tried, or in the appellate tribunal, for some error of law. Guided by these principles, it must be assumed, in the further examination of this question, that the facts are as they have been found to be by the jury. It then appears that the real contract in these charters was one to pay $30 per ton for bringing guano from the Chincha Islands to the United States, and that the stipulation in question was inserted in the charters to cover up and conceal the real nature of the contract, in order to enable the defendants to relieve themselves from the responsibility which they had incurred in their previous contract with the plaintiffs; and the question is, whether the parol evidence was properly admitted to prove those facts. When the plaintiffs offered to prove those facts in the court below, the question was then presented to the circuit court precisely as it is here stated. Evidence, when offered at the trial, must be assumed to exist, and to be true, for the purpose of determining the question of its admissibility. Proof, such as was offered and received in this case, could only be rejected upon one of two grounds—first, that the evidence of the facts was not admissible; and second, that if the facts were proved, they would have no tendency to maintain the action. That they would maintain the action if proved, no one can doubt; so that the only question is, whether they were admissible.

One further explanation is necessary, in order to present the question in its true light. It is not pretended that the parol evidence conflicts in any manner with the written contract on which the suit was brought. On the contrary, the objection is directed solely to its effect upon the charter-parties subsequently executed by the defendants with the owners of the other vessels. Those charters were introduced by the plaintiffs as evidence in the cause, to show their right to recover. They also relied on the circumstances attending the transactions, and the declarations and statements of the agents who negotated them, and the subsequent conduct of the defendants in respect to the same subject matter. At the trial, the charters were submitted to the jury as evidence, and the jury were told, in effect, that they were not confined to the charters, alone, but were at liberty to consider them in connection with all the other evidence in the case, in order to ascertain what the real contracts were between those parties.

Where the effect of a written agreement collaterally introduced as evidence, as in this case, depends, not merely on the construction and meaning of the instrument, but upon extrinsic facts and circumstances, the inferences of fact to be drawn from it must be left to the jury. It was so held by this court in Etting v. The Bank of the United States, 11 Wheat., 75, and we think the principle is correct. In that case, the testimony consisted of various communications and reports made to the Bank, of their own transactions, and of the admissions of the parties or their agents, and it was insisted on the part of the Bank, that the jury were not at liberty to draw inferences of fact from the written evidence; to which objection, Marshall, Ch. J., replied, that "were the fact as alleged, and were it true that all the testimony is in writing, the consequence drawn from it cannot be admitted." Other cases have been decided by this court, applying the same doctrine as in Iasigi v. Brown, 17 How., 183. That was an action brought to recover damages against the defendant for a false representation respecting the pecuniary standing of a third party, whereby the plaintiff had been induced to sell goods, and had incurred loss. Letters were introduced, and facts and circumstances connected with them proved; and this court held that it was for the jury to say, after examining the letters in connection with the facts and circumstances, whether they were calculated to inspire, and did inspire, a false confidence in the pecuniary responsibility of the party, to which the defendant knew he was not entitled.

Another view of the question is also very properly invoked by the plaintiffs. Their claim to additional compensation, by the express words of the contract, was made to depend upon their being able to exhibit proof that the defendants had paid other parties a higher rate than $25 per ton for the same service. Oral proof to that effect, if credible, was as good as written. They were at liberty to rely upon the one or the other, or upon both combined, as circumstances might indicate it to be for their interest or convenience. Beyond question they might introduce those charters for that purpose, if they saw fit; or, if they had the means, and preferred to do so, they might prove their case by other evidence: and it cannot be maintained that their right to do so was in any manner impaired after those charters were introduced. They were not parties to those contracts, nor did they in any legal sense claim under them. Their rights being made to depend upon the subsequent transactions of the defendants with third parties, it was clearly proper to admit proof to show what those transactions were.

Several courts and text writers have stated the principle much broader than it is here laid down. The rule excluding parol proof in such cases, says Mr. Greenleaf, cannot affect third persons; who, if it were otherwise, might be prejudiced by things recited in the writings contrary to the truth, through the ignorance, carelessness, or fraud of the parties, and who, therefore, ought not to be precluded from proving the truth, however contradictory to the written instruments of others. In Krider v. Lafferty, 1 Whart., 314, it is held, that the rule is applicable only in suits between parties to the agreement, and their representatives and those claiming under them, and not to strangers. It is also held in England, in several cases, that the rule is not applicable to strangers. King v. Inhabitants of Cheadle, 3 Barn. & Ad., 833; 2 Taylor's Ev., sec. 827, and cases cited; Wilson v. Hart, 7 Taunt., 295; Overseers of Berlin v. Norwich, 10 Johns., 229; Poth. on Obl., by Evans, n. 766; 2 Cow. & H., notes, 354, 368; Reynolds v. Magness, 2 Ired., 26; 1 Greenl. Ev., sec. 279.

Parol testimony is always admissible in matters of contract, to show fraud, notwithstanding its effect may be to contradict what is in writing. That principle is too well established and too generally acknowledged to require any confirmation. Parties have the right to make their own contracts; and, in general, when they are satisfied, that is sufficient, and others have no right to complain. Cases, however, occasionally arise where a contract, though bona fide between those who made it, may operate as a fraud upon third parties; and in this case, assuming the facts to be as they have been found by the jury, and as the evidence tends to prove that the stipulation in question was inserted in those charters for the purpose of enabling the defendants, by that device, to avoid their responsibility to the plaintiffs, whether the owners of the vessels knew the purpose or not, the act so far partakes of the nature of a fraud between the parties to this suit as to authorize the introduction of parol evidence, to show what the truth was in regard to those transactions.

For these reasons, we are of the opinion that the instructions given by the Circuit Court were correct, and that there is no error in the record.

The decree of the Circuit Court, therefore, is affirmed, with costs.

Dissenting, Mr. Justice Grier, Mr. Justice Catron, and Mr. Justice Wayne.

THE INSURANCE COMPANY OF THE VALLEY OF VIRGINIA, Plff. in Er.,

v.

MOSES C. MORDECAI.

Writ of error, when must be returnable—cannot be amended—defect in, cured only by appearance, not by citation.

This writ of error was made returnable on the second Monday in January, in the present term. The writ of error must be returnable on the first day of the term, and a writ of error with a different return day is not authorized by law, nor by the rules and practice of this court.

Neither can the writ of error be amended.

The defect can be cured, only by the voluntary appearance of the party, entered on the record.

Nor can the mistake be corrected by a citation from this court.

The case must, therefore, be dismissed.

Argued Jan. 21, 1859. Decided Jan. 31, 1859.

IN ERROR to the District Court of the United States for the Western District of Virginia.

This was an action of debt brought in the court below, by the defendant in error, on a judgment recovered in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of South Carolina.

The court below having entered judgment for $4,546, with interest and costs, in favor of the plaintiff, the defendant sued out this writ of error.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

On motion to dismiss.

Mr. Conway Robinson, for plaintiff in error.

Grounds relied on in opposition to motion to dismiss:

1. Under section 22 of the Act of Congress establishing the judicial courts of the United States, a writ of error, issued by the Clerk of the Supreme Court, is to be returnable at a certain day and place therein mentioned; but that day need not be the first day of the next term.

The form of a writ of error is given in Curtis' Digest, p. 599. It may be that in most cases it is now made returnable to the first Monday in December, and that formerly, when the term commenced the second Monday in January, it was in most cases made returnable to that day. This, however, is not because of any necessity to make it returnable to the first day of the term, but because that in most cases is a convenient day.

It would be of no avail to make it so returnable, when there is not, between the day on which the writ of error issues and the first day of the next term, time to give the adverse party the twenty or thirty days' notice required by the Act of Congress.

Nor will it do to say that during the twenty or thirty days next preceding the commencement of a term no writ of error is to issue. For that would make it impossible ever to obtain, under section 23, a supersedeas to a judgment rendered within those twenty or thirty days.

2. Under the Act of Congress of May 8, 1792, section 9, it was the duty of the Clerk of the Supreme Court to transmit to the clerks of the inferior courts the form of a writ of error approved by two of the Judges of the Supreme Court, and it was lawful for the clerks of the inferior courts to issue writs of error agreeably to such forms, as nearly as the case may admit.

Brightly, Dig., p. 187, sec. 4, p. 260, sec. 6, p. 896, sec. 5, 11.

It may reasonably be presumed that in discharge of the duty prescribed by this Act, the form of a writ of error was approved by two of the Judges of the Supreme Court, and transmitted to the clerks of the inferior courts, and that the writ of error in this case was issued agreeable to such form. If so, the writ of error must be lawful, unless there be something in the Act which in terms requires the writ to be returnable to the first day of the term. But this is carefully avoided by the Act, which directs merely that the writ of error shall be returnable to the Supreme Court.

8. If there be any irregularity in the writ, it it is merely clerical, like the irregularity in Course v. Stead, 4 Dall., 22, and Blackwell v. Patten, &c., 7 Crauch, 277; Mossman v. Higginson, 4 Dall., 12.

Wood v. Lide, 4 Cranch, 180, modifies or explains Hamilton v. Moore, 3 Dall., 871, and Blair v. Miller, 4 Dall., 21. In those cases the objection was not that the writ was defective in form, but that after the return day, a whole term passed before the record and writ of error was filed in the Supreme Court.

Mr. P. Phillips, for defendant in error, in support of the motion.

Mr. Chief Justice Taney delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant in error, on the 8th of October, 1858, obtained a judgment against the plaintiffs in error in the District Court of the United States for the Western District of Virginia.

On the 18th of the same month, this writ of error was sued out, and made returnable on the second Monday in January then next ensuing—in other words, it was made returnable on the second Monday in January, in the present term of this court; and the defendant in error was cited to appear here on that day.

A motion has been made to dismiss the case, upon the ground that, in order to bring the judgment of the District Court before this court, the writ of error must be returnable on the first day of the term, and that a writ of error with a different return day is not authorized by law, nor by the rules and practice of this court.

By the Act of Congress of May 8, 1792 (1 Stat., 278), it was made the duty of the Clerk of this court to transmit to the clerks of the several Circuit Courts of the United States the form of a writ of error, to be approved by two of the judges of this court; and the clerks of the circuit courts were by that Act authorized to issue writs of error agreeably to such form, as nearly as the case would admit. And it is by virtue of this Act alone that the clerk of a circuit court, or of a district court exercising the jurisdiction of a circuit court, is authorized to issue a writ of error to remove a case to this court.

Immediately after its passage, the form of a writ of error was adopted and transmitted to to the clerks of the circuit courts, pursuant to its provisions; and that form made it returnable on the first day of the term of this court next ensuing the issuing of the writ—that is, on the day appointed by law for the meeting of the court. The form then adopted has never been changed, nor are we aware of any case in which a writ of error with a different return day has been sanctioned by this court.

It is unnecessary, therefore, to inquire what may be the rules of practice in this particular in other courts. The legal return day was fixed under the authority of the Act of 1792; and a writ of error issued by the clerk of a circuit court, or of a district court exercising the powers of a circuit court, with a different return day, or differing in any other material respect from the form transmitted, is without authority of law, and will not bring up the case to this court.

The rules of the court have been framed in conformity with this return day of the writ; and the rule which permits a defendant in error to docket and dismiss a case if the transcript is not filed by the plaintiff within the time therein limited, necessarily presupposes that the writ is returnable on the first day, and that the plaintiff might then file the transcript.

He may, it is true, return the writ with the transcript at any time during the term, unless the case has been docketed and dismissed, when it cannot afterwards be filed without the special order of the court. But this permission to return the writ, and file the transcript at a subsequent day, is upon the principle that, for certain purposes of convenience or justice, the term is considered as but one period of time—as one day, and that day the first of the term. The writ before us was obviously issued by some oversight of the clerk, who followed the form used when this court met on the second Monday in January, without, it would seem, adverting to the circumstance that the day of meeting had been changed by law, and that the first Monday in December, and not the second Monday in January, was the first day of the term.

Neither can the writ of error be amended. The defendant in error was cited and admonished to appear on the second Monday in January; and if the writ were amended, it could not be maintained with this citation, for the defendant must be cited to appear on the same day that the writ is returnable. The citation is the regular and familiar process from a court of justice, notifying and requiring the defendant to appear and make his defense, if he has any, on the return day of the writ. And the common law process of a writ of error made returnable on one day, and a summons to the defendant to appear at another, would be without precedent, and would be as objectionable as the entire absence of a citation. And the want of proof that the defendant was cited has always been held to be a fatal defect in the process prescribed and required by the Act of 1789, whereby a party is authorized to bring the judgment of an inferior court before this court for revision—a defect which can be cured only by the voluntary appearance of the party entered on the record.

Nor can this mistake be corrected by a citation from this court. The Act of Congress requires it to be issued by the judge or justice who allows the writ of error, and it cannot be legally issued by any other judge or court.

The case must, therefore, be dismissed for want of jurisdiction in this court.

ROBERT CAMPBELL ET AL., Plffs. in Er.,

v.

CLEMENT BOYREAU.

(See S. C., 21 How., 223–228.)

In trials at common law, no question can be reviewed, except upon process, pleadings or judgment, unless facts are found by a jury, or are admitted—findings of fact by court, not recognized—no exception, unless jury impaneled—this court do not regard facts found by judge—no question for re-examination—laws of State cannot authorize proceedings in this court.

In trials at common law, no question of the law can be reviewed in an appellate court upon writ of error (except only where it arises upon the process, or pleadings, or judgment, in the cause), unless the facts are found by a jury, by a general or special verdict, or are admitted by the parties, upon a case stated in the nature of a special verdict stating the facts, and referring the questions of law to the court.

The finding of issues of fact by the court upon the evidence is altogether unknown to a common law court, and cannot be recognized as a judicial act.

Nor can any exception be taken to an opinion of the court upon the admission or rejection of testimony, or upon any other question of law which may grow out of the evidence, unless a jury was actually impaneled, and the exception reserved while they were at the bar.

And as this court cannot regard the facts found by the judge as having been judicially determined in the court below, there are no facts before us upon which questions of law may legally and judicially have arisen in the inferior court, and no questions, therefore, open to our revision as an appellate tribunal.

Consequently, as the circuit court had jurisdiction of the subject-matter and the parties, and there is no question of law or fact open to our re-examination, its judgment must be presumed to be right, and, on that ground, only, affirmed.

Neither the laws nor the practice of any State can authorize a proceeding in the courts of the United States different from that which was established by the Acts of 1789 and 1803.

Argued Jan. 21, 1859. Decided Jan. 31, 1859.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of California.

The case is sufficiently stated by the court.

No counsel appeared for the plaintiff in error.

Messrs. R. J. Brent, J. J. Crittenden and J. H. Bradley, for defendant in error:

No exception lies in any case where the law and facts are tried by the court.

Weems v. George, 13 How., 197; Craig v. Missouri, 4 Pet., 427; 9 Pet., 282.

The writ of error in this case brings up only questions of law arising upon the finding of the court, and not questions of fact.

U. S. v. King, 7 How., 844; Penhallow v. Doane, 3 Dall., 54; Hyde v. Booraem, 16 Pet., 169; Minor v. Tillotson, 2 How., 392.

This case, then, coming up on the writ of error, to review the errors of the court in matters of law only, the facts found by the court are to be taken as conclusive whether the court was or was not warranted in finding the facts certified.

Mr. Chief Justice Taney delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action of ejectment (although the pleadings are not in the form prescribed by common law) to recover a tract of land called San Leandro, situated in California. It was brought in the Circuit Court of the United States for that district. The parties agreed to waive a trial of the facts by a jury, and that the facts as well as the law should be decided by the court, upon the evidence adduced by the parties.

In pursuance of this agreement, evidence was offered on both sides; and the court proceeded to decide the facts in dispute, and then proceeded to decide the questions of law arising on the facts so found by the court; and finally gave judgment against the plaintiffs in error, who were defendants in the court below. And this writ of error is brought to revise that judgment.

It appears by the transcript that several exceptions to the opinion of the court were taken at the trial by the plaintiffs in error—some to the admissibility of evidence, and others to the construction and legal effect which the court gave to certain instruments of writing. But it is unnecessary to state them particularly; for it has been repeatedly decided by this court, that, in the mode of proceeding which the parties have seen proper to adopt, none of the questions, whether of fact or of law, decided by the court below, can be re-examined and revised in this court upon a writ of error.

It will be sufficient, in order to show the grounds upon which this doctrine has been maintained, and how firmly it has been settled in this court, to refer to two or three recent cases, without enumerating the various decisions previously made, which maintain the same principles. The point was directly decided in Guild et al. v. Frontin, 18 How., 135; which, like the present, was a case from California, where a court of the United States had adopted the same mode of proceeding with that followed in the present instance. And the decision in that case was again re-affirmed in the case of Suydam v. Williamson et al., 20 How., 432; and again in the case of Kelsey et al. v. Forsyth, 21 How., 85, decided at the present term.

Indeed, under the Acts of Congress establishing and organizing the courts of the United States, it is clear that the decision could not be otherwise; for, so far as questions of law are concerned, they are regulated in their modes of proceeding according to the rules and principles of the common law, with the single exception of the courts in the State of Louisiana, of which we shall presently speak. And by the established and familiar rules and principles which govern common law proceedings, no question of the law can be reviewed and re-examined in an appellate court upon writ of error (except only where it arises upon the process, pleadings, or judgment, in the cause), unless the facts are found by a jury, by a general or special verdict, or are admitted by the parties, upon a case stated in the nature of a special verdict stating the facts, and referring the questions of law to the court.

The finding of issues in fact by the court upon the evidence is altogether unknown to a common law court, and cannot be recognized as a judicial act. Such questions are exclusively within the province of the jury; and if, by agreement of parties, the questions of fact in dispute are submitted for decision to the judge upon the evidence, he does not exercise judicial authority in deciding, but acts rather in the character of an arbitrator. And this court, therefore, cannot regard the facts so found as judicially determined in the court below, nor examine the questions of law, as if those facts had been conclusively determined by a jury or settled by the admission of the parties. Nor can any exception be taken to an opinion of the court upon the admission or rejection of testimony, or upon any other question of law which may grow out of the evidence, unless a jury was actually impaneled, and the exception reserved while they were still at the bar. The statute which gives the exception in a trial at common law gives it only in such cases. And as this court cannot regard the facts found by the judge as having been judicially determined in the court below, there are no facts before us upon which questions of law may legally and judicially have arisen in the inferior court, and no questions, therefore, open to our revision as an appellate tribunal. Consequently, as the circuit court had jurisdiction of the subject-matter and the parties, and there is no question of law or fact open to our re-examination, its judgment must be presumed to be right, and on that ground only affirmed.

The cases referred to in the argument, which were brought up by writs of error to a Circuit Court of Louisiana, do not apply to this case. The Act of Congress of May 26, 1824 (4 Stat., 62), adopted the practice of the state courts in the courts of the United States. And a writ of error to a circuit court of that State, therefore, is governed by different principles from a like writ to the circuit court of any other State. And as, by the laws of Louisiana, the facts, by consent of parties, may be tried and found by the court without the intervention of a jury, this court is bound, upon a writ of error, to regard them as judicially determined, and treat them as if they had been found by the special verdict; and the questions of law which arise on them are consequently open to the revision of this court.

But the practice in relation to the decisions in that State is an exception to the general rules and principles which regulate the proceedings of the courts of the United States; nor can the laws or the practice of any other State authorize a proceeding in the courts of the United States different from that which was established by the Acts of 1789 and 1808, and the subsequent laws carrying out the same principles and modes of proceeding.

Upon the grounds above stated, the judgments in this case must be affirmed. But it must at the same time be understood that this court express no opinion as to the facts of the law as decided by the Circuit Court, and that the whole case is open to re-examination and revision here, if the questions of fact or law should hereafter be brought legally before us, and in a shape that would enable this court to exercise its appellate jurisdiction.

LESSEE OF WILLIAM C. FRENCH AND WIFE, Plff. in Er.,

v.

WILLIAM H. SPENCER, JR., ET AL.

(See S. C., 21 How., 228-241.)

Act of May 6, 1812, and Act of 1816—where the law does not make exception, courts cannot—what description in deed, sufficient—patent dates back to location—patent inures to benefit of prior alienee—estoppel by deed.

The Act of May 6, 1812, the 4th section of which declares that no claim for military land bounties shall be assignable or transferable until after the patent has been granted, and that all sales, mortgages or contracts made prior to the issuing of the patent, shall be void, is not part of the Act of 1816.

Where the Legislature makes a plain provision, without making any exception, the courts can make none.

Where the warrant is recited in the deed, and the quantity of land it calls for; and the grantor grants, bargains and sells, to the grantee, his heirs and assigns, forever, the said three hundred and twenty acres of land: Held that the deed was a valid conveyance of grantor's interest in the land at the time the deed was executed.

The patent relates back to the location of the warrant, and constitutes part of the title.

An intermediate bona fide alienee of the incipient interest may claim that the patent inures to his benefit by an ex post facto operation, and receive the same protection at law that a court of equity could afford him.

Where the grantor sets forth on the face of his conveyance, by averment or recital, that he is seised of a particular estate in the premises, and which estate the deed purports to convey, the grantor, and all persons in privity with him, shall be estopped from ever afterwards denying that he was seised and possessed at the time he made the conveyance.

This was an action of ejectment brought in the court below, by the plaintiff in error, to recover a certain tract of land in Indiana.

The trial below having resulted in a verdict and judgment for the defendants, the plaintiff sued out this writ of error.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Mr. R. W. Thompson, for plaintiffs in error:

The plaintiffs assign the following errors:

1. The Circuit Court erred in admitting, against their objection, the instrument dated June 28, 1816, as evidence for the defendants.

2. The court erred in giving instructions to the jury.

The instrument dated June 28, 1816, is upon its face void, because it is in direct violation of the several Acts of Congress in relation to bounties and land for military services. It was not an instrument assignable at common law. If assignable, it must be because of the several Acts of Congress on the subject.

The counsel referred to the Acts of Dec. 24, 1811, 2 Stat. at L., 667; Jan. 11, 1812, 2 Stat. at L., 671, 672, sec. 12; Feb. 6, 1812, 2 Stat. at L., 676, sec. 2; May 6, 1812, 2 Stat. at L., 729, secs. 2 and 4; March 5, 1816, 3 Stat. at L., 256; April 16, 1816, 3 Stat. at L., 285–287, sec. 5.

These several Acts in force at date June 28, 1816, show conclusively that it was the design of Congress to prevent the alienation of these bounties by the parties to whom they were granted.

In 1819 Mr. Wirt, Atty-Gen., gave an opinion that a Canadian land-warrant was not assignable.

Public Land Laws, part 2, p., 6 sec.; also, Id., pp. 9, 15, 16, 160.

Subsequently, however, Congress passed the Act of March 3, 1821, recognizing and so far as it could be done, legalizing the assignment of Canadian land warrants.

3 Stat. at L., 641.

This Act did not reach this case. Its provisions extend only to cases where the warrant had been assigned and not located at that time. It merely authorized previously assigned warrants to be located. But the paper of June 28, 1816, was not in point of fact an assignment of the warrant by Fosgit to Spencer. There was then no warrant in existence, and consequently nothing to assign. Nor was it a deed of conveyance. Fosgit, under the foregoing Acts, had no more power, before the issue of the patent, to make such a deed than he had to make an assignment; but it does not purport to be a deed of conveyance. At one place it uses the words of bargain and sale; at another, those which create a trust. Where the words of a deed are so uncertain that the intention of the maker cannot be discovered, it will be held to be void for uncertainty.

1 Greenl. Ev., sec. 300; U. S. v. King, 3 How., 773.

Where there are any words in a deed which evidently appear repugnant to the other parts of it and to the general intention of the maker, they will be rejected as senseless.

Ferguson v. Harwood, 7 Cranch, 414; Worthington v. Hylyer, 4 Mass., 196; Jackson v. Clark, 7 Johns., 217; Cutler v. Tufts, 3 Pick., 272; Bott v. Burnell, 11 Mass., 168; Jackson v. Root, 18 Johns, 336.

But if it had been designed as a deed of conveyance, it did not convey the legal estate to Spencer.

Coke, sec. 446; Hilliard, Abr., 809, sec. 25.

The patent was not issued until Oct. 26, 1816, and until then the legal title was in the United States.

Foley v. Harrison, 15 How., 447; Dubois v. Newman, 4 Wash. C. C., 77; Wilcox v. Jackson, 13 Pet., 516; Green v. Liter, 8 Cranch, 229; Irvine v. Marshall, 20 How., 558; Bagnell v. Broderick, 13 Pet., 486.

If, then, this instrument is a conveyance at all, it conveys at most an equity which does not avail the defendants in this action.

Again; if it be conceded to be a deed of conveyance, it is a quitclaim merely, by which Fosgit parted only with the equitable estate that he possessed at its date. A subsequently acquired estate does not pass where there are no covenants of title.

Van Rennselaer v. Kearney, 11 How., 297; Pelletreau v. Jackson, 11 Wend., 116; Jackson v. Waldron, 13 Wend., 212.

It is, however, insisted that it is to be presumed from lapse of time, that the legal estate had been conveyed to Spencer. This abandons the ground that the instrument of June 28, 1816, is a conveyance, and treats it as an executory contract to convey, and yet is the point upon which the case was decided in the Circuit Court. This presumption, that a deed was executed by Fosgit to Spencer, does not arise in the case as it now stands. The case turned in the court below upon the single question of the validity and effect of the paper of June 28, 1816, and both the instruction of the court and the bill of exceptions show this. It would be an easy matter to show that no such presumption can be indulged in this case, if that question should ever arise. There is nothing to base it upon. It is not shown that twenty years have elapsed since Fosgit was in a condition to execute the agreement to convey (3 Phil on Ev., Cow. & Hill's Notes, 505, cases cited); nor that he ever knew that the legal estate had passed to him by the issue of the patent, or that after his death his heirs ever knew it. The disability and ignorance of the party always repel presumptions.

3 Phil. Ev., C. & H.'s Notes, 497; 3 Johns. Ch., 129; Hurst v. McNeil, 1 Wash. C. C., 70; Henderson v. Hamilton, 1 Hall, 314.

Besides all this, there is no period of twenty years' possession claimed under adverse title.

3 Greenl., 120.

Whatever was the character of the paper of June 28, 1816, the Circuit Court erred in telling the jury that it was "a complete defense to this action;" and therefore they "should find for the defendants." It was the duty of the court to construe it, so far as the intentions of the parties can be elicited from it, for the purpose of deciding whether it is relevant to the matter in controversy, and the act of the parties by whom it purports to have been executed. There the authority of the court ends. In this case, it belonged to the jury alone to decide whether or no Fosgit intended by this paper to convey the particular lands in dispute, and whether Spencer so understood it at the time the paper was executed.

Reed v. Proprietors of Locks and Canals, 8 How., 288.

It was not per se a conveyance of the land described in the patent.

The court had no right to decide what was the intention of Fosgit; it was for the jury to decide upon the weight of the evidence.

Mr. H. Bennett, for defendants in error.

Mr. Justice Catron delivered the opinion of the court:

Silas Fosgit obtained a warrant for three hundred and twenty acres of land as a Canadian volunteer in the war of 1812 with Great Britain. This warrant he caused to be located in the Indiana Territory, June 8, 1816, on the land in dispute. On the 28th day of that month he conveyed the land to William H. Spencer, who died in possession of the same; it descended to his children and heirs, who continued in possession, and are sued in this action by one of the two heirs of Fosgit, who died about 1823. A patent was issued by the United States to Fosgit, dated in October, 1816. The deed from Fosgit to Spencer was offered in evidence in the Circuit Court, on behalf of the defendants, and was objected to:

1st. Because it is void on its face, being in violation of the Acts of Congress touching the subject of bounty land for military services, and against the policy of the United States on that subject.

2d. Because said writing, on a fair legal construction of its terms, conveys no legal title (and, indeed, no title at all, of any kind) to the lands in question; and,

3d. Because said writing is irrelevant, and incompetent as evidence in this cause.

The court overruled the objections, and permitted the defendants to give the writing in evidence, and instructed the jury that it was a complete defense to the action; to all of which the plaintiff excepted.

1. Was the writing void because it was in violation of Acts of Congress touching the sale of bounty lands before the patent had issued? This depends on a due construction of the Act of 1816. It gave to each colonel nine hundred and sixty acres; to each major eight hundred acres; to each captain six hundred and forty acres; to each subaltern officer four hundred acres; to each non-commissioned officer, musician and private three hundred and twenty acres; and to the medical and other staff in proportion to their pay, compared with that of commissioned officers. Warrants were ordered to be issued by the Secretary of War, subject to be located by the owner, in quarter sections, on lands within the Indiana Territory, surveyed by the United States at the time of the location. And three months additional pay was awarded to this description of troops.

By the Acts of 1811, ch. 10; 1812, ch. 14, sec. 12, and that of May 6, 1812, ch. 77, sec. 2, it was provided that each private and non-commissioned officer who enlisted in the regular service for five years and was honorably discharged and obtained a certificate from his commanding officer, of his faithful service, should be entitled to a bounty of one hundred and sixty acres of land; and that the heirs of those who died in service should be entitled to the same, to each of whom by name a warrant was to issue. The Act of May 6, 1812, provided for surveying, designating, and granting these bounty lands; the 4th section of which declares that no claim for military land bounties shall be assignable or transferable until after the patent has been granted; and that all sales, mortgages, or contracts, made prior to the issuing of the patent, shall be void; nor shall the lands be subject to execution sale till after the patent issues.

It is insisted that this provision accompanies and is part of the Act of 1816, and several opinions of Mr. Attorney-General Wirt are relied on to sustain the position that the Acts granting bounty lands are in pari materia, and must be construed alike. He gave an opinion in 1819 (2 L. L., and Opinion 6), that a land-warrant issued to a Canadian volunteer was not assignable on its face, or in its nature, and consequently that the patent must issue in the name of the soldier. But he did not decide, nor was he called on to do so, that, after the warrant had been located and merged in the entry, that the equitable title and right of possession to the land could not be transferred by contract.

The Act of 1816 involves considerations, different from the previous provisions, for the protection of the enlisted common soldier. A class of active, efficient, American citizens, who had emigrated to Canada, were compelled to leave there on the war of 1812 breaking out; they returned to their own country, and went into its service; and when the war was ended, both officers and soldiers were compensated in lands and money for this extraordinary service. The Act of Congress orders the warrants to be delivered to the respective owners, to be located by them; whereas the common soldier, provided for in the Acts of 1811 and 1812, did not receive his warrant, but the Government bound itself to locate the land at its own expense. Congress may have thought it not at all necessary to guard the Canadian volunteers against being overreached by speculators, and deprived of their bounty lands. This, however, is mere conjecture. The Act of March 5, 1816, has no reference to, or necessary connection with, any other bounty land Act; it is plain on its face, and single in its purpose. And, then, what is the rule? One that cannot be departed from without assuming on part of the judicial tribunals legislative power. It is, that where the Legislature makes a plain provision, without making any exception, the courts can make none. McIver v. Regan, 2 Wheat., 25; Patton v. McClure, Martin & Yerger's Tenn., 345, and cases cited; Cocke & Jack v. McGinnis, Ib., 365; Troup v. Smith, 20 Johns., 33. We are therefore of the opinion that Fosgit could sell and convey the land to Spencer after the entry was made.

2. The next ground of objection to the deed is, that it conveys no title when fairly construed. It has a double aspect, obviously, for the reason that the parties to it did not know, at the time it was executed, whether or not the land had been located by Fosgit's agent. The issuing of the warrant is recited in the deed, and the quantity of land it calls for; and then the grantor says: "For the consideration of five hundred dollars, I have assigned and set over, and by these presents do grant, bargain, sell, transfer, assign, and set over, to said William H. Spencer, his heirs and assigns, forever, the said three hundred and twenty acres of land; to have and to hold the same in as full and ample a manner as I, the said Silas Fosgit, my heirs and assigns, might or could enjoy the same, by virtue of the said land-warrant or otherwise."

Then follows an irrevocable power from Fosgit to Spencer, his heirs or assigns, to locate the warrant, obtain a patent, &c.

The warrant having been located on land already surveyed, it could easily be identified. The description is to the same effect as if the deed had said, I convey the land covered by my warrant of three hundred and twenty acres.

We are, therefore, of the opinion that the deed was a valid conveyance of Fosgit's interest in the land sued for at the time the deed was executed.

The third exception to the deed is covered by the foregoing answers.

3. The charge of the court to the jury held, as a matter of law, that the deed was a complete defense to the action, and that the patent issued to Fosgit related back to the location of the warrant, and constituted part of Spencer's title.

This consideration involves a question of great practical importance to States and Territories where entries exist on which patents have not issued, as sales of such titles are usual and numerous. The incipient state of such titles has not presented any material inconvenience, as it it is usually provided by state laws that suits in ejectment may be prosecuted or defended by virtue of the title.

In Indiana, it is provided by statute that "every certificate of purchase at a land office of the United States shall be evidence of legal title to the land therein described." That is to say, for the purposes of alienation and transfer, and for the purposes of litigating rights of property and possession, a certificate of purchase shall be treated as a legal title; and to this effect it is competent evidence in an action of ejectment. Smith v. Mosier, 5 Blackf., 51.

After the patent issued, this title was exclusively subject to state regulations, in so far as remedies were provided for its enforcement or protection; and therefore no objection can be made to any state law that does not impugn the title acquired from the United States.

Whether the patent related back in support of Spencer's deed is not a new question in this court. It arose in the case of Landes v. Brant, 10 How., 372, where it was held that a patent issued in 1845 "to Claymorgan and his heirs," by which the heirs took the legal title, related back and inured to the protection of a title founded on a sheriff's sale of Claymorgan's equitable interest, made in 1808. There, as here, the contest was between the grantee's heirs and the purchaser of the incipient title. The court holding, that when the patent issued, it related to the inception of title, and must be taken, as between the parties to the suit, to bear date with the commencement of title.

It is also the settled doctrine of this court, that an entry in a United States Land Office on which a patent issues (no matter how long after the entry is made), shall relate to the entry, and take date with it. Ross v. Barland, 1 Pet., 655. The fiction of relation is, that an intermediate bona fide alienee of the incipient interest may claim that the patent inures to his benefit by an ex post facto operation, and receive the same protection at law that a court of equity could afford him.

4. We hold that, on another ground, the instruction was clearly proper.

Here, the after acquired naked fee is set up to defeat Fosgit's deed, made forty years ago in good faith, for a full consideration, and to oust the possession of Spencer's heirs, holding under that deed. The rule has always been, that where there was a warranty or covenants for title, that would cause circuity of action if the vendee was evicted by the vendor, then the deed worked an estoppel. But the rule has been carried further, and is now established, that where the grantor sets forth on the face of his conveyance, by averment or recital, that he is seised of a particular estate in the premises, and which estate the deed purports to convey, the grantor and all persons in privity with him shall be estopped from ever afterwards denying that he was seised and possessed at the time he made the conveyance, The estoppel works upon the estate and binds an afteracquired title, as between parties and privies. Van Rensselaer v. Kearney, 11 How., 325; Landes v. Brant, 10 How., 374.

It follows that the heir of Fosgit is estopped by her father's deed from disturbing the title or possession of Spencer's heirs.

It is ordered that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

v.

WM. MORRISH, Master and Claimant of the ship "PONS ÆLII," on behalf of ROBERT and EDWARD FORMBY, Owners of said ship.

(See S. C., 21 How., 343-356.)

Allegation insufficient for proof of unseaworthiness—burden of proof is on libelants—libel in agent's name or principal's—right of consignee to sue.

An allegation of negligence of the master will not let in the libelant to prove unseaworthiness of the vessel.

The burden of proof of such an allegation is upon the libelants, and the testimony must be positive, or so violently presumptive as to be sufficient, by the rules of evidence, to supply the want of direct proof.

It is well settled in admiralty proceedings, that the agent of absent owners may libel, either in his own name, as agent, or in the name of his principals, as he thinks best.

From the nature of the contract of a bill of lading, the consignee has a right to sue, in a court of admiralty, for any breach of it.

Argued Jan. 10, 1859. Decided Jan. 31, 1859.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of California.

The libel in this case was filed in the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of California, by the appellant, to recover damages alleged to have been sustained on a shipment of soap made at Liverpool to be carried to San Francisco.

The said court having entered a decree dismissing the libel with costs, the libelants took an appeal to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of California, which court affirmed said decree; whereupon the libelants took an appeal to this court.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Daniel Lord, for appellants.

Messrs. R. J. Brent and Reverdy Johnson, for appellees.

Mr. Justice Wayne delivered the opinion of the court:

This is the case of a foreign vessel having been libeled in a port of the United States when about to leave it, her master having refused to pay for the damage said to have been sustained on a shipment of soap, made at Liverpool, to be carried to San Francisco, California, via Honolulu. The shipment was made by Matthew Steele & Son. It was said in the bill of lading to be in good order and condition, and the undertaking was to deliver it so to Messrs. McKinlay, Garriock & Co., or to their assigns.

The consignees libeled the ship, alleging that, though they were always willing to receive the shipment in good order, the master of the ship had not made it, and that they had refused to receive it, on account of the injury it had sustained from a want of proper care in loading, storing, landing, re-landing, and re-storing the soap, and owing to the careless, negligent and improper manner of storing it under the deck of the ship, which was open and leaky, through which water passed, and damaged it to the amount $9,500.

The respondent meets the charges by a direct denial of them, averring if the soap had been in any way injured, it may have been from causes beyond his control by any care whatever, and should be attributed to causes or perils excepted to, as they were expressed in the bill of lading, viz.: "all and every danger and accident of the seas and navigation of whatsoever nature." The respondent also declares that his ship was, at the time of her sailing from Liverpool, in good, tight and strong condition, well manned, and that her cargo was well dunnaged and stowed; but that, in the course of the passage to Honolulu, she encountered heavy storms and gales, which strained and caused her to leak, and had compelled him to throw overboard a part of the cargo, for the preservation of the rest of it, and of the vessel; and that during the passage he had used every precaution to preserve the cargo that was within his power and that of his officers and crew.

The libel and answer are directly at issue, and no answer can be made more responsively to the charges in a bill than this is.

Accordingly, then, to the rules of pleading in admiralty, there is no necessity for doing so; nor are we permitted to consider much of the testimony in this record. When litigants make their case in express allegations and by express denials of them, and then introduce testimony inapplicable to the issues they have made, it is not a part of the case, unless as it shall inferentially bear upon other evidence properly in it, upon which the parties rely for the determination of their controversy. This case furnishes as apt an illustration of the rule just mentioned as can be given. The libelants put their case upon bad and careless stowage, &c., of the soap, and upon leaks in the deck in the ship, through which water passed and damaged it. The respondent denies both; but he goes on to state that his ship was tight and strong for the voyage when he left Liverpool, and both parties question the witnesses as to that fact; though the libelants had not charged that their goods had been injured from that cause, and had not put in issue at all the soundness and seaworthiness of the ship for the voyage she was about to make. This same point of pleading was before this court in the case of Lawrence v. Minturn, 17 How., 100, 110, 111, which was as learnedly argued, and as deliberately decided as any other case in admiralty has been in our time. This court then said: "We find the conduct of the master in making the jettison to have been lawful; and the remaining inquiry is, whether the necessity for it is to be attributed to any fault on the part of the master or owners. The libel alleges the loss of the goods to have been through the mere carelessness (just as this case does) and misconduct of the master and mariners. We were at first inclined to the opinion that this allegation is not broad enough to put in issue what the libelants have at the hearing so much insisted upon, and what we think is the main question in this part of the case—the sufficiency of the ship to carry the cargo. It is no doubt the general rule, that the owner warrants his ship to be seaworthy for the voyage with the cargo contracted for. But a breach of this implied contract of the owner does not amount to negligence or want of skill of the master and mariners. There would be much difficulty, therefore, in maintaining, as a general proposition, that an allegation of negligence of the master would let in the libelant to prove unseaworthiness of the vessel." And in the next paragraph of that opinion, page 111, it will be seen that the rule of pleading in such cases was not enforced only upon the ground that the inquiry in that case necessarily led to an examination whether the jettison was occasioned by the negligence of the master in overloading the ship.

It was a nice distinction, but a true one, and it will have its influence hereafter upon other cases having the same difficulties as that had. It has been adverted to, to warn the profession that the irregularities of pleading in admiralty, now too frequently occurring, have attracted our attention, and will be treated hereafter according to the rules and practice for pleadings and proofs in admiralty cases. Without doing so the jurisdiction of admiralty may often be practically extended to controversies not belonging to it; and though that may be inadvertently done, it will not be the less mischievous.

With this rule in view, we will not examine much of the testimony in the case before us, though it was made much of the argument of the respective counsel representing the parties. It excludes from the merits of the case all in the record relating to the storm in the Bay of Biscay, the leak which it caused, and the repair of it. Both parties have treated it, by their pleadings, as having in no way caused any damage to the soap; also, the storm which afterwards tried the seaworthiness of the ship to the utmost, when she was weathering Cape Horn, without any diminution of it, except so far as to inquire if it could have been that the seas which she then shipped had damaged the soap, by the water passing through the seams of a deck imperfectly calked. And we exclude, also, all that testimony made up of the opinions of supposed experts in regard to the causes of the alternation in the quality of the soap, excepting such of them as are sustained by facts which have the character of legal proof.

By treating the case in this way, the controversy becomes exclusively one upon the alleged want of proper care in stowing, &c., the soap; and upon the charge made against the captain of the ship, that he had negligently allowed the seams of her deck to be in an open and leaking condition, by which water had passed through them upon the soap.

Our examination of the case has been made accordingly. It will be found to coincide with the admissions made in his argument by the learned counsel of the appellants. Two of his points were, that the injury or change in the quality of the soap was not owing to the effects of the gale occurring in the Bay of Biscay, shortly after the ship left Liverpool, though it had produced a leak; next, that the heavy weather on the passage around Cape Horn did not produce any leak nor do any injury to the tightness of the ship, reserving, however, the charge that the water which she then shipped had passed through the leaks in her deck, and damaged the soap. Then, after stating other propositions of obligation upon the ship, before she could be released from liability, and omissions of the duty by the captain, and the proofs which were necessary to excuse them, which he contended had not been made, the case was put altogether upon bad stowage, and the leaks in the deck, as both had been alleged in the libel.

First, as to the stowage. Two witnesses were examined, both of them professing to know how soap in boxes should be stowed for a long passage. They say that the stowage was improper, on account of the boxes having been placed or piled in tiers in one part of the ship, and that they were stowed up to the main deck, and not chocked. One of them added, that regard should be had, in stowing, to the nature of the goods to be stowed; that soap should not be stowed in so solid a bulk as this was, but should have been distributed more over the ship. Waterman, another witness, who had never seen the ship, and of course knew nothing of the stowage, merely said, that soap stowed twenty-five tiers deep, he should think was badly stowed, and would be apt to be injured. Such is the whole of the testimony to prove bad stowage in this case, unless the opinions of other witnesses, expressed in the course of their examination, without any facts having been given by them to sustain their opinions, are taken as evidence. On the other hand, Nicholson, a man of more than thirty years' experience as a nautical man, who visited the ship by the invitation of the port warden, to examine the soap and who went into the hold for that purpose, says, in answer to the question, "How was the cargo stowed? Some of the boxes appeared to me to be re-stowed. I do not think the upper part was the original stowage. There were a great number of them in sight, and the cargo seemed to me to be very well stowed." Noyes, who was called upon, as port-warden, to survey the ship, and two days afterwards to survey the cargo, says the soap was stowed in the after part of the ship, abaft the after hatch. It was all stowed together, and well stowed. Then Lowry, the stevedore who discharged the cargo of the ship, who saw her hatches opened, says the soap was well stowed.

There are differences between the witnesses as to the stowage of the soap, but not contradictory assertions. As to credit, they stand alike. But there is a distinction in their declarations, which, with us, is conclusive. The three first named speak of the manner of stowage, with reference to the effect which might be produced upon soap in boxes, stowed in a vessel in tiers, as these boxes were. Without a word of proof from themselves, or from anyone else, or from Mr. McCulloch, the chemist, who was called upon by the libelants to analyze the soap as it then was, to show the correctness of the apprehension or opinion of the witnesses, that, from the composition of soap, it was liable to deterioration from being stowed in a mass in the hold of the vessel, and without any evidence that it was customary to stow soap, in boxes, differently, the other three witnesses speak of it as a nautical stowage, and without any qualification, say that the soap was well stowed. Our conclusion is, that the soap was not injured as a consequence from having been stowed as it was.

We proceed to the consideration of the second charge in the libel. It is also an imputation of negligence upon the captain of the ship. It is, that the soap had been injured by the deck having been allowed by him to remain in an open and leaking condition, whereby the water thrown or falling on it passed through upon the soap beneath. It is indefinite as to the time when the leaking of the deck occcurred, and uncertain as to the extent of it, but determinate enough to suggest the kind and quantity of testimony which is necessary to sustain such charge in the circumstances under which it has been made. The seaworthiness of the ship when she began the voyage not having been questioned in the libel, it must be taken that she was tight in her deck when she left Liverpool, and, if she became otherwise afterwards, that it must have occurred when she was at sea. There is no direct proof of it in the record, nor any cause, from tempest or storm, from which such an injury to the ship can be presumed. The burden of proof of such an allegation is upon the libelants, and the testimony to sustain it must be positive, or so violently presumptive as to be sufficient, by the rules of evidence, to supply the want of direct proof. Here there is no proof, positive or presumptive, when, where, or from what cause, the leaking of the deck happened, or had been made. None that it had been, or might have been, occasioned by any straining of the ship from the storms which she had encountered on her passage. Indeed, that is disclaimed. None that the oakum with which her decks were calked had washed out of the seams of it, or that it had shrunk so as to leave them open. And it was only suggested that they were opened by the heat of a long summer passage, and that they could have been recalked after.

The suggestion is in opposition to the proofs in the case. The ship sailed from Liverpool on the 26th of September, stanch and tight, and arrived at Valparaiso on the 26th or the 27th of January following, just four months and a day from the time of her sailing. The slight injuries which she suffered from the storm in the Bay of Biscay, and those encountered off Cape Horn, were repaired at Valparaiso. Thence she went to Honolulu, on the 28th of February, where she was twenty-four days, and calked there her top sides and waterways, and she arrived at San Francisco on the 7th June, having had fine weather all the way from Valparaiso.

But it is proved that the soap could not have been injured from any leaks in her top sides or waterways, as the tiers of boxes next to them on either side were in a better condition than those which had been piled farther off. These dates show that the ship had not a longer passage to Valparaiso than is usual at the time of year when she was making it; also, that it had been made through different latitudes, without encountering any great continuous heats—certainly not such as could have had the effect to displace or shrink the calking of the deck into leaking, which is not denied to have been good and tight when the ship left Liverpool. It is not probable that such an exposure for so short a time had forced her deck seams. Besides, it has not been shown by any reliable testimony that there had been, at any time when the ship was on her way to Valparaiso, any leaking from her deck, or any such afterwards, until her arrival in San Francisco, from which, by any possibility, the soap could have been injured in the way and to the extent it was represented to have been by some of the witnesses, who expressed the opinion that there had been leaks in the deck of the ship, through which salt water had leaked upon the soap. Indeed, it appears to us that all of the witnesses who said so, did it rather by way of inference from the calking which another witness said had been done to the ship, and from the condition in which the soap was, than from an examination of the ship. The witness Goodsell, more relied upon than any other witness to prove the leaks in the deck, does not do so satisfactorily from the usual examination made by shipwrights when they are called upon to ascertain such a fact. He says: "I found the poop deck, lately calked, leaking on larboard side—six on starboard and one seam about half on the starboard side, to main deck. I should think that the waterway seams, plank shear seams, and one or two seams inside to main deck, or main deck, looked as if water had run down into the hold of the ship on both sides." He adds, he went into the hold of the ship and examined the under part of the deck. "I saw indications of the deck having leaked in the wake of the seams I have been speaking of; they looked as if they had leaked all along, but more abaft than forward of the main deck." This is very uncertain testimony; more of opinion than fact in it, even as to the calking of which he speaks, and the result of all that he says concerning the seams below the deck, has more of inspection in it than of examination. The difference between them will readily be recognized from the positive language of two other witnesses, who say they examined the seams of the deck below with their knives, and found them hard; one of them adding, it is impossible for a man to tell, after two or three weeks, whether a vessel is newly calked, without trying her seams. Lowry, the stevedore who discharged the cargo, upon being asked if he had seen any traces of salt water in the top of the boxes of the soap, or on the ceiling of the deck, answers that he had not, but that he saw some places marked with chalk by some persons; that he tried them with his knife, and found them perfectly tight. Such is the testimony in the case, concerning the charge in the libel that the soap had been damaged by leaks in the deck of the ship, which her captain had neglected to have calked. In our opinion, it is altogether insufficient. Noyes, the portwarden, who surveyed the ship, says he could find no leaks over or above where the soap was, that he could discover. He also saw no traces of the deck having been recently calked. Indeed, there is not a witness who has said that there were leaks in the deck. Several express the opinion that there were, from the discoloration of the boxes on them outside, and from that of the soap in them. Goodsell ventures further than any other witness to cause such an impression; but his language is, "I should think," and it "looked" to him as if water had run down into the hold from the waterway seams, the plank shear seams, and one or two seams inside, to deck or main deck. This conjectural way of speaking by a witness must yield to the positive declarations of Nicholson, Lowry, and Noyes.

Having determined that the soap had not been injured by bad stowage or leaking from the deck, we will now briefly state to what causes its altered condition should be attributed. We have concluded that its discoloration and dampness are to be found in the acknowledged facts and proofs in the cause. The shipment was made at Liverpool on the 21st June, and was on board of the ship for a year, less fourteen days. After the shipment and stowage, the ship remained all of the summer at the dock in Liverpool. She sailed on the 26th of September. From that time the ship's hatches were closed until her arrival at Honolulu, in February. They were then opened for the purpose of discharging a part of the cargo which had been shipped for Honolulu. To do that, it was necessary to remove about three hundred boxes of the soap from their stowage, and to land them. They were taken to the ship, re-stowed as they had been at first, and it does not appear by any evidence that it had been perceived at Honolulu by anyone that this upper tier so removed had been injured, or that the boxes had then any appearance of water having leaked upon them. The ship sailed from Honolulu and arrived at San Francisco on the 7th June. From the day of her sailing, the 26th September, she was at no time within such a temperature of heat as would of itself have impaired the quality of the soap. From England, in 10° north of the equator, the average temperature from the time of her sailing is 62°. Ten degrees north and south of the equator the average temperature for the months of September and October is 81°.

The average temperature in November is about 41°, and that of Valparaiso is about 62°. These averages of temperature are taken from the most approved charts, and are decisive that the soap has not been injured by the temperatures through which the ship passed on her passage to Valparaiso. From that port the ship came to Honolulu, a distance not much short of six thousand miles, in the most favorable weather, without encountering heavy seas or head winds. She made that distance in the usual time, forty-five or fifty days. Honolulu is in the latitude of 21° 19′ north, longitude 157° 52′ west. Nor are the temperatures such between Valparaiso and Honolulu as could have produced any change in the condition of the soap. From Honolulu the usual run to San Francisco is from fifteen to twenty days. As a general rule, the course of ships bound from the first to San Francisco would be to the northward of it, to be sure of good winds. In the absence, then, of other probable causes, to account for the change in the quality of the soap, we must resort to the proofs on the record, and from them we have concluded that the soap was injured by the temperature of the ship's hold, or what is called the sweat of the ship, which no mode of ventilation, consistent with safe navigation, has yet been thought sufficient to prevent. In this particular the ship was not more liable from defective construction to this vapor than merchant vessels ordinarily are. Her hatchways were good, the covers for them are not complained of, her hatch bars and tarpaulings were sufficient, or they are not denied to have been so; and it has not been suggested that they were not all applied to cover the hatchways, and to protect the cargo from sea water and rain. Nor is this sweat in ships any mystery to practical seamen. They term it to be vapor emitted from the mixed cargoes of ships by the heat of the hold of a ship, cast off sometimes only in fumes, at other times in steam, which shows itself in the latter case sometimes in drops of water in the same way as rain is produced from vapor. Several of the witnesses—all of them were accustomed to the sea—say, that the sweat of this vessel caused the discoloration of this soap. Besides, it was a second-class article, differing originally in color from a first-rate article of the same kind. It is true that the chemist who analyzed it says that it had been made of good materials, and was well saponified, and he says that sweat is a mere evolution of water in a state of vapor; and that the boxes could not have been stained in that way, and that they were stained by some external means. But the proofs in the case show that there was no leakage in the deck by which the water could have passed upon them; it must yield to the declarations of those witnesses better acquainted than he is, from their professional acquaintance with the effects of the sweat of the soap upon these cases. We unhesitatingly ascribe the discoloration and dampness of the soap to the rocking of the ship, the nature of the compound of soap, and to the long agitation of the soap in the boxes to which it had been subjected in a boisterous passage. The devaporation of water from the vapor of the soap itself, with which it is cleansed in the making, heated by the sweat of the ship, would be concentrated in the boxes, upon the soap, and would discolor it and make it damp, without any sensible diminution of its weight; and we are confirmed in this conclusion by the witnesses who examined and weighed it, having testified that the boxes were of the same weight marked upon them when they were shipped at Liverpool. We feel bound to notice one point made in the argument of the cause by the counsel of the appellees, which is not an open question in this court. It was, that the appellants had no legal title to maintain their libel. In the case of Houseman v. The Schooner "North Carolina," 15 Pet., 49, the same objection was made. This court said: "An objection has been taken to the right of the appellee to sue in his own name, as agent for the consignees, or to sue at all, as his power of attorney from them bears date after the libel was filed; and it is also objected, that J. & C. Lawton, the consignees, had no right to institute proceedings to recover more than their proportion of the cargo shipped on their account. No authority has been produced in support of these objections, and we consider it as well settled in admiralty proceedings, that the agent of absent owners may libel, either in his own name, as agent, or in the name of his principals, as he thinks best; that the power of attorney, subsequent to the libel, is a sufficient ratification of what he had done in their behalf, and that the consignees have such an interest in the whole cargo; that they may proceed in this case, not only for what belonged to them and was shipped on their account, but for that portion also which was shipped by Porter, as his own, and consigned to them." The same conclusion was repeated in 17 Howard (Lawrence v. Minturn), without any qualification, as we understand that case. In the first as well as in the second of these cases, the point was put on the interest which a consignee has in the consignment, as consignee, and not as owner of any part of it; that, from the nature of the contract of a bill of lading, the consignee had a right to sue, in a court of admiralty, for any breach of it. Whatever may be the uncertainty concerning the consignee's right to sue in a court of law, from the conflicting decisions to be found upon that right, there are none that he may sue in a court of admiralty in the United States. When that case, however, occurs in this court, it will be decided; and we now merely remark that, from our examination of most of the cases in the common law reports, upon the facts of those cases, we have been brought to the conclusion that there is no rule of general application as to when the consignor or consignee should bring the suit at common law, but that it will always be important to consider in whom the right of property, and sometimes in whom the right of possession, was vested at the time of the breach of the contract or neglect of duty which is complained of.

We direct the affirmance of the decree from which this appeal was taken.

GEORGE SMITH, Appt.,

v.

JOHN J. ORTON.

(See S. C., 21 How., 241-244.)

Sale of equitable interest in contestation—after mortgage is paid, mortgagee may be compelled to surrender a title.

An equitable interest in contestation may be the subject of a bona fide sale and transfer by deed, in the like manner, that a mortgagor's equity may be sold and conveyed.

After a mortgage debt is discharged, the mortgagor or his assignee may compel the mortgagee or his assignee to surrender the legal title.

Argued Jan. 14, 1859. Decided Jan. 31, 1859.

APPEAL from the District Court of the United States for the District of Wisconsin.

The bill in this case was filed in the court below by the appellant. The defendant demurred. The court sustained the demurrer, and entered a decree dismissing the bill. From this decree the complainant took an appeal to this court.

A further statement appears in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. J. S. Brown and J. R. Doolittle, for appellants.

Messrs. William P. Lynde, E. Mariner and R. H. Gillet, for appellee.

It appears from the bill that the appellant is the assignee of the interests of Knab, Davis and Butler, in the premises pending the suit of Orton v. Knab, 8 Wis., 576, and that a decree has been rendered in that case against Knab and in favor of the respondent, by a court of competent jurisdiction. He is, therefore, bound by that decree.

Story Eq., sec. 405, 406, cases cited; Murray v. Ballou, 1 Johns. Ch., 581; Murray v. Lylburn, 2 Johns. Ch., 441; Orton v. Smith, 18 How., 263.

The appellant has not made a case which entitles him to relief in a court of equity. We lay out of the case everything that pertains to the title acquired directly from Davis. He held the legal title as trustee for Hubbard, and at his request conveyed it. That was a discharge of his interest in the premises, and he does not appear to have acquired any other. We may also lay Hubbard's title or equity out of the case.

1. Because it appears that he had no interest or equity in or to the lands, that this court can recognize or enforce.

2. If Hubbard had an equitable estate, the appellant has no assignment of it. He has only a bare conveyance of the fee, which does not convey an equitable estate where the grantor has not the legal title.

Again; if this is a bill of peace, it does not set forth either a clear legal title or possession in the appellant. If the appellee has any title, it is a legal title; and if the appellant has a legal title, a court of law is the proper forum to litigate it. If this is a bill to have a trust declared, it contains no averment that the appellee is seised of any legal estate of which to declare him a trustee.

Mr. Justice Catron delivered the opinion of the court:

The bill was demurred to, and the demurrer sustained below, and the facts appear only on the face of the bill. Davis held the legal title to the two lots (Nos. 7 and 8) in dispute, lying in or near the City of Milwaukee, in the State of Wisconsin. Davis held the legal title as trustee for Otis Hubbard. In June, 1851, Hubbard, for a good and valuable consideration, conveyed the premises to Joachim Gruenhagin, by a deed in fee, by which the grantee became seised of the entire interest of Hubbard. In December, 1852, Gruenhagin, for a good and valid consideration, conveyed the premises to James S. Brown; and in January, 1853, Brown, for a valuable consideration, conveyed to the complainant, Smith. The complainant afterwards also got deeds from Davis and Knab.

Hubbard had sold two other lots in Milwaukee to one Schram, the title to which was outstanding in the names of persons residing beyond the State of Wisconsin. Schram required security for the title from Hubbard.

Butler, a relation of Hubbard, got Knab to give a bond for title, binding himself jointly with Butler, as security to Schram.

To secure himself against loss for his undertaking to Schram, Knab required of Hubbard security to indemnify him, should Hubbard be unable to make a title to the lots sold to Schram; and Hubbard got Davis, who held the legal title to the lots, to convey them to Knab, as security and for no other consideration.

On the same day (22d of July, 1848) that the title bond to Schram was made, Knab executed to Butler a bond covenanting that if Butler would procure the deed from the trustees of Hubbard, and comply with the bond to Schram, he (Knab) would convey the lots to Butler, for which he held Davis's deed. Butler failed to procure the deed, and Hubbard did so himself.

In March, 1851, Butler assigned Knab's bond to Orton, the respondent.

Hubbard never received any consideration whatever for the lots thus transferred; and it is alleged that the bond from Knab to Butler was a secret and fraudulent contrivance on the part of Butler, to cheat Hubbard and obtain his property, and that he was defrauded thereby.

Smith obtained a deed for the lots from Davis, and also one from Knab; but as Davis had no interest, having long previously conveyed to Knab, nothing passed by his deed, unless, as is assumed by the bill, an equity of redemption resulted to Davis.

And as Orton had filed a bill in a state court against Knab, which was pending when Smith took his deed from Knab, and as Knab was not allowed to disavow his own bond, Orton got a decree against Knab for a conveyance of the legal title (which conveyance was regularly made), and therefore the deed from Knab to Smith was of no value. Having been made whilst the suit was pending, it could only have any useful effect on the contingency of Knab's successful defense.

Orton having succeeded, his decree related to the commencement of the suit, and gave him the elder and better legal title, Smith's deed being "subservient to the rights of the parties in litigation." 1 Story's Com., Eq., sec. 406.

Orton has the legal title, beyond dispute. Smith is asserting Hubbard's equity and Davis' right of redemption; and prays by his bill, among other things, "that Orton be decreed to release to him (Smith) all claim or interest in said lots."

Neither party has, or ever had, actual possession of the premises; nor is this of any consequence, as the contest is for the legal title.

Butler certainly had neither a legal nor equitable interest in the property when he sold to Orton. He held Knab's title bond, with full knowledge that Knab held as trustee for Hubbard. And this bond was assigned to Orton, who, according to the allegations of the bill, took it with Hubbard's equity inhering to it.

What effect Orton's decree against Knab may have to protect Orton under the legal title, on a plea of bona fide purchaser of an equity, we decline to decide; nor will we discuss the question, as this cause may again come before this court, and involve that question.

The remaining question for consideration is whether Smith can be heard in a court of equity, being an assignee of an equitable interest in contestation.

Gruenhagin purchased and took a deed for Hubbard's equity, and was clothed with his interest before any litigation was instituted affecting the title. And as neither Gruenhagin, Brown, nor Smith, were parties to the suit of Orton against Knab, the decree against Knab did not in anywise impair the equity obtained from Hubbard, who, likewise, was no party to that suit and who had conveyed to Gruenhagin before it was commenced.

Hubbard's equitable title being distinct from the legal title in controversy between Orton and Knab, no reason existed why it should not be the subject of a bona fide sale, and transfer by deed, in like manner that a mortgagor's equity may be sold and conveyed. After a mortgage debt is discharged, the mortgagor or his assignee may compel the mortgagee or his assignee to surrender the legal title. And that is substantially the case the bill makes; for after Hubbard satisfied Schram's bond made for title by Knab and Butler, Knab held the naked legal title, with an undoubted right in Hubbard to call for its surrender. And his assignee stands on the same footing. 4 Kent's Com., 157. And so the statutes of Wisconsin, in effect, provide. Revised Statutes of 1849, ch. 59, sec. 7, ch. 77, secs. 6 and 7.

We are of the opinion that the court below erred in sustaining the demurrer to the bill, and order the decree to be reversed, and remand the cause, with directions that the District Court proceed in it according to the 34th rule, of this court, governing chancery proceedings.

THE BRIG "JAS. GRAY," WM. CUSHING ET AL., Owners, Libts. and Appts., v. THE OWNERS OF THE SHIP "JOHN FRASER," AND THE STEAMER "GENERAL CLINCH."

(See S. C., How., 184-195.)

Collision—local harbor regulations—vessel's light—duty to show—duty of steamer having vessel in tow—non-liability of tow, for collision.

Local authorities may prescribe at what wharf a vessel may lie, and for how long; when she may load and unload; where she may anchor in the harbor, and for what time, and what light she may display at night.

When the light of a brig differed in character and place from the one which the regulations and usages of the port required; held, that she committed a fault which justly subjected her to damages for the collision.

When she was at anchor at a place where vessels were continually passing, it was her duty to show at night the usual signal light of a vessel at anchor

It was the duty of the officers to see that the light was securely and properly fastened, so as to present the bright sides to the incoming vessels.

It was especially the duty of the officer in command of the steamboat in a crowded harbor, when his tow was following him at the rate of six or seven miles an hour, to have scanned carefully the surrounding objects before he cast loose the tow-line, and to see that there was nothing in the way of the tow which she could not avoid by means of her own rudder, without the aid of the steamboat, and also to have given reasonable notice of his intention, in order that she might prepare to take care of herself.

The steamer having the tow held answerable, as well as the brig, for the consequences of this disaster.

The tow was the res or thing which struck the brig, and did the damage. But the mere fact that one vessel strikes and damages another, does not of itself make her liable for the injury; the collision must in some degree be occasioned by her fault.

The loss must be equally divided between the brig and the steamer.

Argued Dec. 31, 1858. Decided Feb. 3, 1859.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of South Carolina.

The libel in this case was filed in the District Court of the United States for the District of South Carolina, by the appellants against the ship John Fraser and the steamer General Clinch to recover damages sustained in a collision.

The said court entered a decree dismissing the libel against the steamer, but sustaining it against the ship.

The Circuit Court, on appeal, reversed this decree against the ship, and entered a decree dismissing the libel; whereupon the libelants took an appeal to this court.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

He also argued that the light displayed was not of a proper character, and concluded: In no view of the evidence, it is submitted, can there be a decree against the steamer in these proceedings, which are in rem. There was no collision with the steamer, nor was she the material instrument of any damage or injury to the brig. The relation of principal and agent is exclusively personal, and cannot exist between things. When a vessel is towed by a steam-tug, the latter is in the employment and under the control of the former.

The Christina, 3 Wm. Rob., 27.

Mr. Chief Justice Taney delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a case of collision in the port of Charleston, in South Carolina.

The brig James Gray took on board a valuable cargo at Charleston, destined for Antwerp, and in the prosecution of her voyage hauled off from the wharf into the stream and anchored on the 1st of February, 1856. The place where she anchored was in the harbor, and was the place where vessels bound out usually anchored for a short period, to make their final preparations for sailing on their voyage. It was, however, a thoroughfare for vessels bound in, and through which they were almost continually passing. She remained there until the collision took place, which happened on the night of the 5th of the month above mentioned, about seven o'clock, shortly after daylight had disappeared. On that evening The John Fraser came in from sea, in tow of The General Clinch. The latter was a steamboat, occasionally employed in towing vessels in and out of the harbor, and was properly fitted and manned for that purpose. There was ample room on both sides of The James Gray for the tug and the tow to have passed with safety, if The James Gray had been seen in time. But she was not seen, either from The General Clinch or The John Fraser, until the steamboat was abreast of her, and at the distance of not more than forty or fifty fathoms. She was then, for the first time, seen by those on board The General Clinch, which had just before, and almost at the same moment, cast off the hawser by which she was towing The John Fraser. The towing line was about fifty fathoms in length, according to the testimony of the pilot of The General Clinch, and was attached to the larboard bow of the tow, and it was cast off by The General Clinch without any previous notice of the intention to do so at that particular moment; and it appears to have been altogether unexpected on board The John Fraser. And as soon as she was cast off, and not before, those on board of The John Fraser, for the first time, discovered The James Gray directly ahead, and upon which she was running. She endeavored to avoid her by putting her helm hard to starboard, in order to pass on the same side and in the wake of the tug; her speed, however, from the tide and the impulse she had received from the steamboat, was then about six knots an hour; and she reached the brig before her course could be sufficiently changed to avoid a collision. The rigging of The John Fraser became entangled in the bowsprit of the brig, which it carried away, and caused other damage to the vessel to a serious amount.

So far the facts are undisputed; we come now to the points in controversy.

The libel is filed in rem by the owners of The James Gray against the ships above mentioned, alleging that she was free from fault, and that the damage was occasioned altogether by their negligence and mismanagement, and claiming the right to charge them with the whole amount of the loss sustained.

The owners of The John Fraser and the owners of The General Clinch answer separately, each of them charging the misconduct of The James Gray as the cause of the disaster, but each of them also imputing some degree of blame to each other.

They charge against The James Gray that she was lying in a thoroughfare in the harbor, in violation of the local port regulations, and without the light that these regulations required. And they produce two ordinances of the corporate authorities of the City of Charleston, one of which provides that no vessel shall lie in this thoroughfare for more than twenty-four hours, and inflicts certain penalties for every disobedience of this ordinance; and the other requires all vessels anchored in the harbor to keep a light burning on board from dark until daylight, suspended conspicuously midships, twenty feet high from the deck.

The power of the city authorities to pass and enforce these two ordinances is disputed by the libelants. But regulations of this kind are necessary and indispensable in every commercial port, for the convenience and safety of commerce. And the local authorities have a right to prescribe at what wharf a vessel may lie, and how long she may remain there; where she may unload or take on board particular cargoes; where she may anchor in the harbor, and for what time; and what description of light she shall display at night to warn the passing vessels of her position, and that she is at anchor and not under sail. They are like to the local usages of navigation in different ports, and every vessel, from whatever part of the world she may come, is bound to take notice of them and conform to them. And there is nothing in the regulations referred to in the port of Charleston which is in conflict with any law of Congress regulating commerce, or with the general admiralty jurisdiction conferred on the courts of the United States.

Yet, upon the evidence before the court, we do not think The James Gray ought to be regarded as in fault, by remaining at anchor in the harbor beyond the time limited in the city ordinance. She was seen there by the harbormaster day after day, without being ordered to depart; nor did he seek to inflict the penalty. The object of this regulation was obviously to prevent this thoroughfare from being crowded by vessels at anchor, which would make it inconvenient or hazardous to vessels coming into the port. And from the conduct and testimony of the harbormaster, it may be fairly inferred that this regulation was not strictly enforced when the thoroughfare was not overcrowded, and that single vessels were sometimes permitted to remain beyond the time fixed by the ordinance, without molestation from the city authorities. And this lax execution of the regulation would soon become a usage in the port, and will account for the indifference with which the harbormaster saw her lying there three days beyond the limited time, without even remonstrance or complaint. He appears to have acquiesced. And if this was the interpretation of the ordinance by the local authorities, it ought not to be more rigidly interpreted and enforced by this court.

But the omission of the light, prescribed by the regulation, stands on different grounds. There was certainly no acquiescence of the local authorities in that respect; and, upon the testimony, it is a matter of dispute whether she had any light or not. That question will be considered hereafter. But it is admitted on all hands that she had not a light suspended conspicuously midships, twenty feet above the deck, as the regulation requires; and the light which she alleges she used was not the ordinary globe lamp used by vessels at anchor, but a lantern of triangular form, with one side dark, and the light shining only through the other two, and which, consequently, could not be seen by those who approached on the dark side. The ordinance obviously contemplated the usual signal light of a vessel at anchor, which is bright on every side, and can be seen by those who are approaching from any direction. And as the regulations of the port required a light of this kind, suspended in the manner hereinbefore mentioned, The James Gray could not be justified in disregarding this regulation, and substituting a light of a different description, and placed in a different part of the vessel. Those who were coming into port had a right to presume that a vessel anchored in this thoroughfare would have the light prescribed by the port regulations. They would look for no other, nor expect to find a vessel in their way without one, and might be misled as to the exact position of the vessel, if a light of a different character were shown or hung up in a different place. And as the light of the brig (if she had one) differed in character and place from the one which the regulations and usages of the port required, and which incoming vessels would look for, she committed a fault which justly subjects her to damages for the collision. She had not taken those means to avoid it which the regulations of the port in which she was lying required and prescribed.

But, apart from the regulations of the local authorities, we think The James Gray was in fault upon the established principles of maritime law. She was at anchor at a place where vessels were continually passing. It was her duty, therefore, to show at night the usual signal light of a vessel at anchor—that is, a globe lamp, or one without any dark side to it, which could be seen from any direction, and hung high enough in the rigging to be seen at a distance.

The witnesses who were on board of The General Clinch and The John Fraser say she had no light of any kind immediately before and at the time of the collision; and in this they are supported by the testimony of other witnesses who were observing her about the same time. But those who were on board of The James Gray testify to the contrary, and their testimony is confirmed by others; and we think that, upon the whole evidence, the just conclusion is that she had a light, in a lantern of triangular form, with one dark side, hanging on the fore swift sure, twenty feet and some inches above the deck. The fore swift sure is, we understand, the foremost rope of the foremast shrouds.

Now, a light of this description is not ordinarily used as a signal light for a vessel at anchor; but is used at sea, fastened at the bowsprit, with the opaque side to the ship, so as to throw a strong light ahead. And it is obvious that such a lantern, fastened to a single rope at the top only, and more than twenty feet from the deck, would be liable to waver, from the motion of the vessel as she was riding at anchor, and to turn its dark side sometimes in one direction and sometimes in another; and if such a light was used as a signal light, it was more especially the duty of those in charge of the brig to see that the lamp was securely fastened, so as to present its bright sides in the direction in which vessels were likely to approach.

But this is not proved to have been done. It is true that one of the witnesses for the libelants (Wycoffe) says it was securely fastened at the top and the bottom, with the dark side to the stern. This may have been the way in which it was usually fastened, but none of the witnesses examined by the libelants know how it was fastened that night. Wycoffe does not appear to have even been on deck when it was put up. It was put up by a boy; and when the light appeared dim after the collision, Wycoffe says he started to take it down; but the boy was too quick for him, and took it down and trimmed it.

The second mate, who gave the order to the boy to put it up, went below to his tea immediately afterwards, without waiting to see that his order was properly executed; and the first mate went down with him; and no one but this boy appears to have known how it was fastened to the rope that night. He was not examined as a witness, nor is his name mentioned. They speak of him as "the boy," and we think it was great want of care on the part of the officer in charge of the deck to confide this important duty to the heedlessness of a boy. His age is not stated, nor his previous pursuits, nor how long he had been on board, nor his knowledge or fitness for the duty intrusted to him. The place where the brig was anchored, and the character of the light they were about to display, made it the more imperatively the duty of the officers to see that it was securely and properly fastened, so as to present the bright sides to the incoming vessels, as she was in most danger of being run into by them. But without the testimony of the boy who put it up and took it down, or any proof of his age and character, from which it might be inferred that the duty was well and faithfully performed, the court cannot say that a sufficient light was displayed to warn vessels coming into the harbor that she was at anchor in this thoroughfare.

Indeed, the just inference from the testimony would be otherwise; for if the lantern was carelessly hung, and liable to move to some extent from one to the other, so as at one moment to present its bright side, and a moment after its dark side in the same direction, it would account for the difference in the testimony of different witnesses, who looked at her from the same point of view, some testifying that she had no light and others that she had a very bright one.

Independently, therefore, of the local regulations, The James Gray, upon the general principles of maritime law and usages, cannot be acquitted of negligence, and must share in the loss.

But the conduct of those on board of The General Clinch was equally culpable. For if, as they contend, the brig showed no light, or if the dark side of the lantern was turned towards her when she was approaching, yet it is satisfactorily proved that the night was light enough to have enabled her to see the brig at a distance abundantly sufficient to pass with her tow without danger to either, and that she must or would have been seen with a proper lookout.

The General Clinch was not under the control of the captain of The John Fraser, but under the command and direction of her own pilot, who was substituted for her regular captain, who was not on board. She could select her own course and her own rate of speed, and was bound to keep a vigilant and competent lookout in the thoroughfare in which vessels so frequently anchored. But there is no proof to show that this was done. The three hands who were at the stern of the steamboat, awaiting the order to cast off the hawser, were certainly not lookouts. The pilot who was in command had his attention drawn to other matters, and was preparing to give the order to cast loose the hawser, and in communicating with the ship he had in tow. It is said, indeed, that there were two of the crew in the forward part of the vessel, whose duty it was to keep a lookout; but, being colored persons, they could not, by the laws of South Carolina, be examined as witnesses. But the law requires of a colliding vessel that she shall prove not only that she had a competent lookout stationed at the proper place, but also that the lookout was vigilantly performing his duty. And if she placed there persons who cannot be witnesses, it is her own fault; it was her own voluntary act, and can therefore be no sufficient reason for the absence of that proof which the law requires her to produce.

It was especially the duty of the officer in command of the steamboat, in a crowded harbor like that, when his tow was following him at the rate of six or seven miles an hour, and her course necessarily directed by the steamtug, to have scanned carefully the surrounding objects before he cast loose the tow-line, and to see that there was nothing in the way of the tow which she could not avoid by means of her own rudder, without the aid of the steamboat, and also to have given reasonable notice of his intention, in order that she might prepare to take care of herself. But this was not done. He suddenly let go the towing line, without notice or warning to The John Fraser. And the moment after he had done so, and not before, he finds his own vessel almost aboard of a vessel at anchor, and the head of The John Fraser, under the direction and impulse his ship had given her, directed upon the anchored vessel, and too near to avoid a collision when she had lost the aid of The General Clinch.

This state of things could not have happened without great want of care on the part of the steam tug. Indeed, this negligence is apparent from the testimony of the pilot himself, who was acting as captain. He says his station was on the wheel-house; and that after he let go The John Fraser, he had just time to walk from the bow to the aft part of the steamer, when he saw The Gray. She was not, therefore, first seen from the wheel-house or the bow, but from the stern of his vessel, when he was nearer to her than he was to the ship he was towing. The stern of the vessel is not the first place from which The James Gray would have been seen, if the wheel-house was a proper place, and he had performed there the duty of a lookout. And as regards the two hands which he states were forward as lookouts, they appear never to have seen the brig until after she was discovered by the pilot from the stern, when in the act of passing her bow, for they gave no notice of a vessel ahead, and do not appear to have seen her before her proximity was announced by the pilot. If stationed forward as lookouts, it is very clear that they were not performing that duty, and the collision was the natural consequence of their negligence; for The James Gray was plainly seen from The John Fraser the instant the steam-tug dropped the tow-line and turned out of her way; and as the tow-line was fifty fathoms long, the steamboat could unquestionably also have seen her as she approached her, at least at that distance ahead, as well as from the stern; and if she had been seen even at that distance, and The General Clinch had held on to the hawser, she could have carried The John Fraser safely past, and without danger.

And upon such proofs of negligence and of want of proper caution, the court is of opinion that The General Clinch is justly answerable, as well as The James Gray, for the consequences of this disaster.

So far as the ship John Fraser is concerned, we see nothing in the evidence from which any fault or mismanagement can justly be imputed to her. According to the usage of trade at that port, she engaged a steamboat, well acquainted with the harbor and its usages, to bring her in. When fastened to the hawser, and in tow, she was controlled entirely by the steam-tug, both as to her course and speed. The steamboat was not subject to the orders of the commander of The John Fraser, but was altogether under the control and direction of her own commander for the time. A lookout on board of The John Fraser would be of little or no value, for the view ahead was obstructed by the steam-tug, and she could do nothing more than watch the motions of the steamboat, and use her own rudder, so as to keep her as nearly as might be in the wake of the tug to which she was attached. She had a right to suppose that a proper lookout would be kept by the steamboat, and that she would not be led into dangers from which no effort on her part would enable her to escape. And she was brought into this dangerous proximity to The James Gray, and then cast loose, under circumstances which rendered a collision inevitable; and she was driven against the vessel at anchor altogether by the direction and impulse which she received from the controlling power of the steamboat, and not by any act of negligence or mismanagement on her part.

It is, indeed, said by some of the witnesses, that if she had put her helm to the larboard, instead of the starboard, as soon as she was cast off, she might have passed in safety on the other side of The James Gray. But the weight of the proof is clearly to the contrary; and we are convinced that she adopted the only chance for safety, by putting her helm to starboard, and endeavoring to pass on the same side that the steam-tug had passed.

It is true, that The John Fraser was the res or thing which struck The James Gray and did the damage. But the mere fact that one vessel strikes and damages another does not of itself make her liable for the injury; the collision must in some degree be occasioned by her fault. A ship properly secured may, by the violence of a storm, be driven from her moorings and forced against another vessel, in spite of her efforts to avoid it. Yet she certainly would not be liable for damages which it was not in her power to prevent. So also ships at sea, from storm or darkness of the weather, may come in collision with one another, without fault on either side; and in that case, each must bear its own loss, although one is much more injured than the other. This was decided by this court in the case of Stainback et. al. v. Rae et. al., 14 How., 532; and the decision placed upon the ground that neither of them had committed a fault, and could not, therefore, justly be charged with any portion of the injury which the other had sustained. And as this collision was forced upon The John Fraser by the controlling power and mismanagement of the steam-tug, and not by any fault or negligence on her part, she ought not to be answerable for the consequences.

The result of this opinion is, that the loss must be equally divided between The James Gray and The General Clinch, according to the rule laid down by this court in the case of The Schooner Catharine et al. v. Dickinson et al., 17 How., 170.

The decree of the Circuit Court is, therefore, reversed; and the case remanded, with directions to adjust the loss upon the principles stated in this opinion.

We do not assent to so much of this opinion as makes The James Gray liable for negligence, merely for want of exact conformity to port regulations.

HENRY L. NEWBERRY, claimant of the Steamboat "Fashion," &c.

(See S. C., 21 How., 244-248.)

Admiralty jurisdiction on the lakes—shipment between ports of same State.

The Act of Congress of 26th of February, 1845, prescribing and regulating the jurisdiction of the federal courts in admiralty upon the lakes, confines that jurisdiction to "matters of contract and tort, arising in, upon, or concerning steamboats, and other vessels" employed in business of commerce and navigation between ports and places in different States and Territories upon the lakes.

In suit upon a contract of shipment of goods between ports and places of the same State, the District Court has no jurisdiction in admiralty; such jurisdiction belongs to the courts of the State.

Argued Dec. 7, 1858. Decided Feb. 3, 1859.

APPEAL from the District Court of the United States for the District of Wisconsin.

The libel in this case was filed in the court below, by the appellants, to recover damages resulting from an alleged breach of contract of affreightment.

The court below having dismissed the libel, the libelants took an appeal to this court.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Mr. S. G. Haven, for appellants.

Messrs. R. H. Gillet and Alfred Russell, for appellee.

Mr. Justice Nelson delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal in admiralty from a decree of the District Court for the District of Wisconsin.

The libel states that the goods in question were shipped on board the Fashion at the port of Two Rivers, in the State of Wisconsin, to be delivered at the port of Milwaukee, in the same State, and that the master, by reason of negligence and the unskillful navigation of the vessel, and of her unseaworthiness, lost them in the course of the voyage.

The respondent sets up, in the answer, the seaworthiness of the vessel, and that the goods were jettisoned in a storm upon the lake.

The evidence taken in the court below was directed principally to these two grounds of defense; but, in the view the court has taken of the case, it will not be important to notice it.

The Act of Congress of 26th February, 1845, prescribing and regulating the jurisdiction of the federal courts in admiralty upon the lakes, and which was held by this court in the case of The Genesee Chief v. Fitzhugh, 12 How., 443, to be valid and binding, confines that jurisdiction to "matters of contract and tort, arising in, upon, or concerning steamboats and other vessels" * * * "employed in business of commerce and navigation between ports and places in different States and Territories upon the lakes, and navigable waters connecting said lakes," &c.

This restriction of the jurisdiction, to business carried on between ports and places in different States was doubtless suggested by the limitation in the Constitution of the power in Congress to regulate commerce. The words are: "Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes." In the case of Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat., 194, it was held, that this power did not extend to the purely internal commerce of a State. Chief Justice Marshall, in delivering the opinion of the court in that case, observed: "It is not intended to say that these words comprehend that commerce which is completely internal, which is carried on between man and man in a State, or between parts of the same State, and which does not extend to or affect other States." Again, he observes: "The genius and character of the whole Government seem to be, that its action is to be applied to all the external concerns of the nation, and to those internal concerns which affect the States gen-

To What places the jurisdiction of Admiralty is confined.

It is laid down as a general rule in common law books, that the admiral's jurisdiction is confined to matters arising on the high seas, and that he cannot take conusance of contracts, &c., made or done in any river, haven or creek, within any county; and that all matters arising within these are triable by the common law. 4 Inst., 137-140; 12 Co., 129; Moor., 122, 892; Godb., 261; 2 Sid., 81; Hob., 79, 212; 13 Co., 52; 2 Brownl., 10, 37; 2 Bulst., 322; Roll. erally, but not to those which are completely within a particular State, when they do not affect other States, and with which it is not necessary to interfere for the purpose of executing some of the general powers of the Government. The completely internal commerce of a State, then, he observes, may be considered as reserved for the State itself." Ib., 195.

This distinction in the Act of 1845 is noticed by the present Chief Justice in delivering the opinion in The Genesee Chief. He observed: "The Act of 1845 extends only to such vessels when they are engaged in commerce between the States and Territories. It does not apply to vessels engaged in the domestic commerce of a State."

This restriction of the admiralty jurisdiction was asserted in the case of The New Jersey Steam Navigation Company v. The Merchants' Bank, 6 How., 392, the first case in which the jurisdiction was upheld by this court upon a contract of affreightment.

It was then remarked, that "the exclusive jurisdiction of the court in admiralty cases was conferred on the National Government, as closely connected with the grant of the commercial power. It is a maritime court, instituted for the purpose of administering the law of the seas. There seems to be ground, therefore, for restraining its jurisdiction, in some measure, within the limit of the grant of the commercial power, which would confine it, in cases of contract, to those concerning the navigation and trade of the country upon the high seas, &c., with foreign countries and among the several States.

"Contracts growing out of the purely internal commerce of the State, &c., are generally domestic in their origin and operation, and could scarcely have been intended to be drawn within the cognizance of the federal courts."

The contract of shipment in this case was for the transporation of the goods from the port of Two Rivers to the port of Milwaukee, both in the State of Wisconsin; and upon the principles above stated, the objection to the jurisdiction of the court below would be quite clear, were it not for the circumstance that the vessel at the time of this shipment was engaged in a voyage to Chicago, a port in another State. She was a general ship, with an assorted cargo, engaged in a general carrying business between ports of different States; and there is some ground for saying, upon the words of the Act of 1845, that the contracts over which the jurisdiction is conferred, are contracts of shipment with a vessel engaged in the business of commerce between the ports of different States. But the court is of opinion that this is not the true construction and import of the Act. On the contrary, that the contracts mentioned relate to the goods carried as well as to the vessel, and that the shipment must be made between ports of different States.

This view of the Act harmonizes with the limitation of the jurisdiction as expressed, independently of any Act of Congress, in the case of New Jersey Steam Navigation Company v. The Merchants' Bank, before referred to.

We confine our opinion upon the question of jurisdiction to the case before us, namely: to the suit upon the contract of shipment of goods between ports and places of the same State.

The court is of opinion that the District Court had no jurisdiction over it in admiralty, and that the jurisdiction belonged to the courts of the State.

It may be, that in respect to a vessel like the present, having cargo on board to be carried between ports of the same State, as well as between ports of different States, in cases of sale or bottomry of a cargo for relief of the vessel in distress, of voluntary stranding of the ship, jettison, and the like, where contribution

Mr. Justice Daniel:

I concur in the decree for the dismission of the libel in this case, but not for the reasons assigned by the court. It being my opinion, as repeatedly declared, that the admiralty jurisdiction, under the Constitution of the United States, is limited to the high seas, and does not extend to the internal waters of the United States, whether extending to different States or comprised within single States. If there be any inefficiency in this view of the admiralty powers of the Government, the fault is chargeable on the Constitution, and on the want of foresight in those who framed that instrument, and it can be ligitimately remedied by an amendment of the Constitution only.

HENRY HILL, Plff. in Er.,

v.

CALEB B. SMITH ET. AL.

Guaranty of stock, when valid.

Where plaintiff, on sale of land to a railroad, received from defendants their guaranty that certain stock of the railroad company which plaintiff received for the land should be worth par in three years, or defendants should make it up to par or pay him whatever sum said stock should be worth less than par; held, that this was an independant contract and valid.

The stock at the time specified being worthless, and the railroad company insolvent, held, that the plaintiff is entitled to judgment, on demurrer to his complaint, unless defendants withdraw their demurrer and plead some good plea in bar.

Submitted Jan. 18, 1859. Decided Feb. 3, 1859.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Indiana.

This was an action of assumpsit brought in the court below, by the appellant, to recover damages resulting from tbe breach of a certain guaranty in writing.

The court sustained a demurrer to the declaration and entered judgment for the defendants; whereupon the plaintiff sued out this writ of error.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. O. H. Smith and Jer. Smith, for appellant:

We submit that the first count contains, in fact, two distinct agreements.

1. The stock should be worth par in three years from the date of the contract.

2. The Railroad Company would make up for any deficiency.

The first is, unquestionably, an absolute agreement. If it is, then an action can be maintained upon it alone, although the other guaranty should be adjudged a collateral undertaking, which we submit is not the case.

2 Story, Cont., p. 396, sec. 858: Newman v. Newman, 4 M. & S., 66; Kerrison v. Cole, 8 East., 231; Van Dyck v. Van Buren, 1 Johns., 362; 1 Pars. Cont., 480.

As they are both laid in the count, the breach of both assigned, a general demurrer, even if confined to the court, should have been overruled, even though no action would lie upon the second guaranty.

1 Chit. Pl., 703.

We maintain, however, that the second guaranty is also an independent and original guaranty on the part of the appelles. The conveyance of the land was a sufficient consideration.

Even were there some difference as to the construction, it should be construed, under the circumstances, against the grantor.

The contract, even if made between the railroad company and the appellant, was valid in law; but whether it was or not, it is binding on the grantors.

We submit that the demurrer to the first and second counts, which are substantially alike, should have been overruled. The third count is unquestionably good. It sets up an original and independent contract between the appellant and appellees, founded upon a sufficient consideration, and alleges performance on the part of the appellant and a violation by the appellees; and as the demurrer covered all the counts, if one is good, the demurrer should be overruled.

The following are the distinct points upon which we rely for the reversal of the judgment.

First. That the Circuit Court erred in sustaining the demurrer to the first and second counts, and each of them.

Second. That the court erred in sustaining the demurrer to the whole declaration, if there be one good count, or part good of a divisible count.

1 Chit., p. 665, ed. 1855, notes c. (3) and authorities.

Third. The guaranty set out in the first and second counts, was an original undertaking of the appellees, and is binding in law. 4 M. & S., 66; 8 East, 231; 1 Johns., 362; 1 Pars. Cont., 480; 2 How., 450; 12 East, 227; Cowp., 714; Chit. Cont., 80, 81; 1 Pars. Cont., 495;

Fourth. The whole contract set out in the first and second counts being in writing, and founded upon a sufficient consideration, was obligatory upon the parties.

See 10 Moore, 395; 3 Bing., 107; 8 Cush., 159; 15 Penn. St., 156.

Fifth. Suppose the undertaking of the appellees to be collateral to a contract of the Railroad Company, the undertaking or guaranty is valid in law and binding on the appellants.

Seventh. The third count sets out an original, independent contract between the appellant and the appellees, founded upon a sufficient consideration, and the facts being admitted by the general demurrer, raising no question as to the form, is valid in law, and the demurrer to the whole declaration should have been overruled.

We submit the case with confidence that the law is with us and, therefore, that it must be reversed.

No counsel appeared for the defendants in error.

Mr. Justice Grier delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff's demand is founded on the following contract, dated August 17th, 1853, signed by defendants, and set forth at length in the declaration:

"Whereas Henry Hill, of Delaware County, has proposed to convey to the Cincinnati, Newcastle and Michigan Railroad Company a certain tract of land in Delaware County, containing three hundred and nine acres, for the consideration of six thousand one hundred dollars, to be paid in the capital stock of said Company, at par, on the condition that Caleb Smith and other responsible persons will guaranty that the said stock shall be worth par in three years from the present date, and in default thereof, that the Company shall make it up to par; and whereas the said Cincinnati, Newcastle and Michigan Railroad Company have agreed by a resolution of their Board of Directors to accept said proposition: Now, we, the undersigned, in consideration of the premises, hereby guaranty to the said Henry Hill, that the said stock shall be worth par in three years from the date of this instrument; and if, at the expiration of that date, said stock shall not be worth par, we guaranty the said Henry Hill that the said Cincinnati, Newcastle and Michigan Railroad Company shall make up to him or pay him whatever sum the said stock shall be worth less than par, so as to make the said stock worth par to said Henry Hill at that date."

The declaration is in proper form, and contains all the averments necessary to show a breach of this contract, and the consequent liability of defendants.

There was a general demurrer to the declaration, and judgment for the defendants.

As we have not been furnished with an argument on behalf of defendants, we are at a loss to discover on what grounds it is supposed that this judgment can be supported.

As the contract is in writing, signed by the parties to be charged, it cannot be affected by the Statute of Frauds; and although the term "guaranty" is usually applied to a collateral undertaking to pay the debt of another, yet when taken in connection with the other terms of the instrument, this is clearly an original, independent contract. If it had been under seal, the term "covenant" would have been the technical synonym for the word "guaranty" as here used.

It states that the defendant would not agree to sell his land in exchange for stock, except on condition that defendants should guaranty that the stock in three years would be worth par, or should be made so by the Corporation. For this consideration, defendants agree to make it so, or, in other words, to pay the difference between the cash value of the stock on that day and its nominal value.

On this condition and for this consideration, the plaintiff agreed to convey his land to the Railroad Company; and on the faith of the defendants' undertaking, he has conveyed it, and accepted, not money, but certain stock, which defendants have agreed to make equal to money by a certain day. The declaration avers, that at the time specified, the stock was wholly worthless and of no value, and the Railroad Company utterly insolvent, and unable to pay the difference; and that defendants, having full notice of these facts, refuse to comply with their contract.

There is no reason why this contract should be treated as void because of an illegal or immoral consideration. Its conditions require no previous suit to be instituted against any one as principal debtor. The declaration contains every necessary averment; a valid contract, a large consideration paid, and a breach of the contract by defendants; all set forth in proper and technical language.

The plaintiff is, therefore, entitled to judgment on the demurrer, unless the court below, in their discretion, shall permit the defendants, on payment of costs, to withdraw their demurrer, and plead some good defense in bar.

The judgment of the court below is reversed, and record remitted for further proceedings.

JOHN L. HODGE, Admr. of ANDREW HODGE, deceased, WM. L. HODGE AND JAMES LOVE.

(See S. C., 21 How., 397-408.)

Admissions in pleadings—letter of agent, when no evidence of authority—rights of bona fide holder of bill of exchange—bills originating in fraud or illegality—taken out of the course of trade as overdue—instrument not negotiable, when unauthorized transfer of, does not impair rights of owner—Texas certificates—how transferred—collusion with agent.

The record in another suit, where the parties were different, and the petition and answer are signed by counsel, and not by the parties, cannot be resorted to for admissions of the respective parties.

Where there is no evidence of the existence of a power of attorney, except that contained in a letter of the agent, that statement, if admissible, is insufficient to establish the fact, the letter having been written after the agent had violated his obligation as a faithful agent, and in reply to reproaches of the plaintiffs.

The law merchant accords protection to a holder of a bill of exchange taken in the course of business for value, and without notice.

But this concession is a departure from the fundamental principle of property which does not permit one to transfer a better title than he has.

The party who claims the benefit of the exception to this principle must, in the case of bills of exchange that have originated in fraud or illegality, establish that he is not an accessory to the illegal or fraudulent design, but a holder for value.

If the bill is taken out of the course of trade, as overdue, or with notice, the rights of the holder are subject to the operation of the general rule.

When the instrument is one which by law is not negotiable, or the negotiability has been restricted by the parties, the rule of the law merchant has no application.

In such case the loss of the instrument with the name of the payee upon it, or its transfer by a faithless agent, does not impair the title of the owner.

A purchaser cannot safely draw any conclusion from the existence of an indorsement on such a paper that the holder is entitled to sell or discount it.

Nor can the holder write on such non-negotiable paper an assignment or guarantee not authorized by the indorser.

Certificates, of the public debt of the Republic of Texas which issued to a person or his assigns, were transferable by him or his attorney, only on the books of the commissioner of the State.

When the owner did not direct their sale, and they were not sold on his account, if there had been a power of attorney to the agent selling, containing an authority to sell, the circumstances imposed upon the defendant the necessity of showing there was no collusion with the agent.

Argued Jan. 12, 1859. Decided Feb. 3, 1859.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Columbia.

The bill in this case was filed in the court below, by the appellant, to two certificates for a portion of the public debt of the Republic of Texas.

The court below having dismissed the bill, the complainants took an appeal to this court.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. S. S. Baxter, J. H. Bradley and J. J. Crittenden, for appellant:

I. This is a proceeding in the nature of a bill of interpleader, the Treasury of the United States being the stakeholder. Clark v. Clark, 17 How., 321.

In such a controversy, the parties stand on their respective, legal and equitable rights.

II. The appellant is the creditor of Texas, holding the legal title to this scrip, which can pass only in the manner prescribed by the law of Texas, and apparent on the face of the scrip.

Menard v. Shaw, 5 Tex., 334.

The distinction between stocks passing by delivery or assignment, except in a particular mode, and the effect of their assignment in any other mode, is well established.

L., sec. 383, and notes.

III. The legal title being in Combs, the appellees have shown no equity in themselves.

(a) The authority to Love was special and limited, to collect the money. The bonds themselves were not assignable, and could be transferred in one mode only.

This distinguishes the case from that of Baldwin v. Ely, 9 How., 580.

The purchaser from Love was bound to ascertain the extent of his authority, and if he did not he must abide the consequences.

Story, Agen., secs. 126–8 and notes; secs. 224–6, and notes, sec. 437.

(b) To establish an equity against Combs, in the absence of proof or direct authority, the defendants must show some conduct on the part of Combs by which they were misled. This they failed to do.

(c) The conduct of the purchaser gives rise to distrust as to the fairness of the transaction.

The counsel here reviewed the evidence in this point and claimed:

1. That there was no express authority, upon the bonds themselves, to Love to assign them.

2. That the title to the bond being in Combs, Love could only transfer it under a written authority, and was bound to have inquired after and examined that authority.

Story, Agency, 72, note 2.

IV. Had Love authority to sell?

1. It was argued below, that the power was conferred by the indorsement in blank.

2. That such authority is proved by complainant's Exhibit H, in which Love asserts he had a power of attorney.

As to the power implied from the indorsement:

There is an express limitation on the face of these bonds, upon their transferable character. It is not denied that, as between the original parties, an indorsement in blank, for a fair consideration, followed by delivery, would vest in the purchaser an equitable title, which would, upon satisfactory proof, enable him to compel the indorser, in a court of equity, to do everything necessary to effect a complete transfer of his interest. He could sue in his own name in equity alone. His title would be equitable. And it may be conceded that he had an assignable property in the bonds. But he could assign no more than his equity.

Turton v. Benson, I. P. Wms., 496; S. C., 2 Vern., 764; Davies v. Austen, 1 Ves., Jr., 247, and see the cases collected in the note, Perk. ed., Cator v. Burke, 1 Bro. Ch., 434; Davies v. Austen and notes, 3 Bro. Ch., 179; Scott v. Shreeve, 12 Wheat., 605; and also 17 How., 615.

Undoubtedly these general principles are subject to certain exceptions; but there are none such in this case.

2. The statement contained in the letter of Love is introduced by the complainant, for the purpose of showing the pretenses under which it is supposed the defendant sets up title, and to negative such pretension.

The bill is sworn to, and emphatically states and reiterates, that complainant never gave any authority, in any form, to Love, to dispose of the bonds.

And it is a violent invasion of the rules of evidence to say, that when a complainant introduces, by way of exhibits in his bill, the unsworn statements of his defaulting agent as to transactions alleged to be fraudulent and sought to be set aside, and under oath negatives them, he shall be held bound by the very falsehoods he seeks to overthrow, and they shall be taken as proof that his sworn statements are false. The essence of the bill is, that the agent had fraudulently appropriated the bonds to his own use, under the pretense of an authority to sell; and it is to repudiate and discredit this pretended authority, that he makes him and his imputed assignee parties defendant, and seeks from them a discovery of the facts. The pretense in the letter is contradicted in terms, and charged to have been a fraud. To say, then, that it is evidence to prove the authority, is a solecism and a contradiction in terms of the plainest rules of chancery pleading. If this is out of the case, there is no scintilla of proof to give countenance to the pretense of an authority.

Finally, Combs having the legal title, the whole burden is on the appellees, to establish by satisfactory proof an equity which will draw to it the legal title.

Judson v. Corcoran, 17 How., 612.

Messrs. Reverdy Johnson and Reverdy Johnson, Jr., for appellees.

Mr. Justice Campbell delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff filed his bill to establish his claim to two certificates for a portion of the public debt of the Republic of Texas, which had been issued to him in the year 1839, and which were transferable by him, or his attorney, or his representative, only, on the books of the stock commissioner of that State. He avers that these certificates with others were indorsed in blank by him and sent to the defendant (Love), in Texas, during the year 1840, with authority to receive an anticipated partial payment, and to obtain other certificates of the same description for the residue. That he did not give to his agent any authority to sell them, or to dispose of them for his own use, and has done no act to defeat his own legal title to them. That Love did not collect any part of the debt, and has failed to return the two certificates in question. That for fifteen years he has been unable to discover who was in possession of them, and has but recently ascertained that they were held by one of the defendants under a claim of title from Love.

He attached to his bill a number of letters of Love, containing admissions of his receipt of the certificates, and of his agency for the plaintiff; and subsequently to the conversion by him of these, he wrote to the plaintiff in extenuation of his conduct, affirming that he had a power of attorney and letters from the plaintiff authorizing him to sell. That he would endeavor to replace the stock, or would give other stock of the same description, and insisted that the liberty he had taken was excusable.

The defendant (Hodge) answered to the bill that these certificates were claimed as the property of the decedent, Andrew Hodge. That he purchased them from Love, fairly and for their full value, and with a firm conviction that he was authorized by a power of attorney and the blank indorsement of the plaintiff, to dispose of them. The cause was heard upon the pleadings and a decree pro confesso against Love.

The record in the District Court at New Orleans in the suit between Love and Hodge, appended to the bill, does not contain evidence applicable to this cause. The parties to that suit were different, and the petition and answer are signed by counsel, and not by the parties, and cannot be resorted to for admissions of the respective parties. Boileau v. Rutlin, 2 Ex., 665. There is no evidence of the existence of a power of attorney from the plaintiff to Love, except that contained in the letter of Love before referred to. If that statement is at all admissible, it is insufficient to establish the fact. The letter was written in 1844, after Love had violated his obligation as a faithful agent, and in reply to reproaches of the plaintiff. In that letter he promises to restore to the plaintiff these or other certificates. There is no evidence of any fulfillment of this promise. He has failed to produce a power of attorney, or any letters which authorize his sale to his co-defendant. The witnesses of the contract between him and the decedent (Andrew Hodge) have not been examined. These circumstances raise a strong presumption against the verity of his statement, and deprive his letter of any probative force. The title of the defendant, therefore, depends upon the effect to be given to the indorsement of the certificates in blank by the plaintiff, and their deposit with Love. The question is, was he invested with such a title that a bona fide purchaser, having no notice of its infirmity, will be protected against a latent defect? The law merchant accords such protection to a holder of a bill of exchange taken in the course of business for value, and without notice; and legislation in Great Britain and some of the States of the Union has extended to the same class of persons a similar protection in other contracts.

But this concession is made for the security and convenience, if not to the necessities and wants, of commerce, and is not to be extended beyond them. It is a departure from the fundamental principle of property, which secures the title of the original owner against a wrongful disposition by another person, and which does not permit one to transfer a better title than he has. The party who claims the benefit of the exception to this principle must come within all the conditions on which it depends. In the case of bills of exchange that have originated in fraud or illegality, the holder is bound to establish that he is not an accessory to the illegal or fraudulent design, but a holder for value. If the bill is taken out of the course of trade as overdue, or with notice, the rights of the holder are subjected to the operation of the general rule. In Ashurst v. The Official Manager of the Bk. of Australia, 37 Eng. L. & Eq., 195, Justice Erle says: "It seems to me extremely important to draw the line clearly between negotiable instruments, properly so called, and ordinary chattels, which are transferable by delivery, though the transferrer can only pass such title as he had. As to negotiable instruments, during their currency, delivery to a bona fide holder for value gives a title, even though the transferrer should have acquired the instrument by theft; but after maturity the instrument becomes in effect a chattel only in the sense I have mentioned." When the instrument is one which by law is not negotiable, or when the negotiability has been restricted by the parties, the rule of the law merchant has no application. The loss of the instrument with the name of the payee upon it, or its transfer by a faithless agent, does not impair the title of the owner. Nor can a purchaser safely draw any conclusion from the existence of an indorsement on such a paper that the holder is entitled to sell or to discount it. Bircleback v. Wilkins, 10 Harris, 26; Ames v. Drew, 11 Foster, 475; Symonds v. Atkinson, 37 Eng. L. & Eq., 585; Charnley v. Grundy, 25 Eng. L. & Eq., 318. Nor can the holder write an assignment or guaranty not authorized by the indorser. 4 Duer, 45; 25 Eng. L. & Eq., 19; 6 Harris, 434. This doctrine has been applied to determine conflicting claims to public securities which were not negotiable on their face, though the subject of frequent transfers.

The suit of Tonkin v. Fuller, 3 Doug., 300, was for four victualing bills drawn by commissioners of the victualing office on their treasurer, in favor of their creditor. These were sent to an agent with a power of attorney, "to receive money and give receipts and discharges," and who pledged them for an advance of money. Lord Mansfield said the only question is, who has the right of property in this bill? It must be the plaintiff's, unless he has done something to entitle another. It is deposited with the defendant by one who had it under a limited power of attorney. If the plaintiff had ever consented to the disposal of the bill, he would not be allowed to object, nor would he if the money had ever come to his use. But here there is no such pretense.

Glyn v. Baker, 13 East, 509, was a suit for bonds of the East India Company, payable to their treasurer, and sold with his indorsement. Le Blanc, Justice, said:

"Here are persons intrusted with the securities of A and B, who part with the securities of A, and, when called on for them, give the securities of B. That difficulty can only be met by assimilating such securities to cash, which, whether it has an earmark set upon it or not, if passed by the person intrusted with it to a bona fide holder for valuable consideration, without notice, cannot be recovered by the rightful owner; but how does the similitude hold?"

And Lord Ellenborough said, "any individual might as well make his bond negotiable."

The case of Dunn v. Commercial Bank of Buffalo, 11 Barb., 580, originated in the refusal of that bank to allow a transfer of stock on the books of the bank, which was transferable by the holder of the certificate or his representative.

The plaintiff had the certificate and a blank assignment, and a blank power of attorney, and claimed to make the transfer. The court denied that certificates of stock in reference to negotiability are placed on the same ground as bills of exchange, and declare that it is incumbent on a party claiming under such a transfer to prove the contract or consideration. In Menard v. Shaw, Comptroller, 5 Tex., 334, the Supreme Court of that State decide that the agency of the payee named in certificates like the present is indispensable to a legal transfer on the books of the State, and that a forced sale was, therefore, inoperative. The decision of Baldwin v. Ely, 9 How., 580, does not sanction the claim of the defendants.

The certificates which were the subject of controversy were issued, under an Act of Congress, to a person or his assigns.

The ordinary form of assigment was a blank indorsement, and this had been recognized as sufficient at the Treasury of the United States, and in the ordinary traffic in the community.

The defendant proved that he had paid value for them. In the cases cited from Douglas & East, the judges stated that the existence of similar facts might give another aspect to the claim of the defendants in these cases. In the case before us, the certificates were transferable, in terms only, in a single mode.

There was no evidence that a transfer in any other form than that prescribed had ever been recognized.

We have considered this cause upon the assumption that the defendant was a holder for value.

There is no statement in the answer of the consideration paid to Love for these certificates, nor of the time, place and circumstances of the contract between him and the defendant's testator. It appears that the plaintiff did not direct their sale or transfer, and that they were not disposed of on his account; and if there had been a power of attorney containing an authority to sell, the circumstances would have imposed upon the defendant the necessity of showing there was no collusion with Love. Upon the case as presented, the court is constrained to reverse the decree of the Circuit Court, dismissing the plaintiff's bill. But the case is presented in an unsatisfactory manner.

The transaction between Love and the decedent (Hodge) has not been exhibited to the court, although parties fully cognizant of it are before the court.

We have concluded to remand the cause to the Circuit Court, with directions to allow the parties to amend the pleadings, and to take testimony, if they should be so advised.

v.

STEPHEN CARD, Libt.

(See S. C., 21 How., 248-251.)

Admiralty jurisdiction—supplies for domestic vessel.

A proceeding in rem, to recover for coal furnished a steamer engaged in the business of navigation and trade exclusively within the State of California, is not the subject of admiralty jurisdiction.

It concerned the purely internal trade of a State. That commerce is necessarily left to regulation by state authority.

The 12th rule of the admiralty amended, so as to take from the district courts the right of proceeding in rem against a domestic vessel for supplies and repairs, on the authority of a lien given by state laws.

Argued May 11, 1858. Held under advisement May 18, 1858. Decided Feb. 7, 1859.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the district of California.

The libel in this case was filed in the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of California by the appellee, to recover the balance of an account for coal furnished the steamer Goliah.

The said court entered a decree in favor of the libelant for $2,830, with costs.

The Circuit Court of the United States for the district of California having affirmed this decree, the claimant of said steamer took an appeal to this court.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Mr. M. Blair, for appellant.

Mr. J. T. Doyle, for appellee.

Mr. Justice Nelson delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of California, in admiralty.

The suit was a proceeding in rem against The Goliah, to recover the balance of an account for coal furnished the steamer while lying at the port of the City of Sacramento, in the months of October and November, 1855. The vessel, according to the averments in the libel and which are not denied in the record, was engaged in the business of navigation and trade on the Sacremento River, exclusively within the State of California, and, of course, between ports and places of the same State. She was therefore engaged, at the time of the contract in question, in the purely internal commerce of the State, the contract relating exclusively to that commerce, and which does not in any way affect trade or commerce with other States.

The court has held, in the case of Rufus Allen et. al. v. H. L. Newberry (ante, 110), at this term, that a contract of affreightment between ports and places within the same State was not the subject of admiralty jurisdiction, as it concerned the purely internal trade of a State, and that the jurisdiction belonged to the courts of the State. That case occurred upon Lake Michigan, within waters upon which the jurisdiction of the court was regulated by the Act of Congress of the 26th February, 1845; but the restriction of the jurisdiction by that Act was regarded by the court as but declaratory of the law, and that it existed independently of that Statute.

The contract in that case, as we have said, was one of affreightment between ports of the same State; but we perceive no well-founded distinction between that and a contract for supplies furnished the vessel engaged in such a trade. They both concern exclusively the internal commerce of the State, and must be governed by the same principles.

There certainly can be no good reason given for extending the jurisdiction of the admiralty over this commerce. From the case of Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat., 194, down to the present time, it has been conceded by this court that, according to the true interpretation of the grant of the commercial power in the Constitution to Congress, it does not extend to or embrace the purely internal commerce of a State; and hence that commerce is necessarily left to the regulation under state authority. To subject it, therefore, to the jurisdiction in admiralty, would be exercising this jurisdiction simply in the enforcement of the municipal laws of the State, as these laws, under the conceded limitation of the commercial power, regulate the subject as completely as Congress does commerce "with foreign nations, and among the several States." We are speaking of that commerce which is completely internal, and which does not extend to or affect other States, or foreign nations.

We have at this term amended the 12th rule of the admiralty, so as to take from the district courts the right of proceeding in rem against a domestic vessel for supplies and repairs which had been assumed upon the authority of a lien given by state laws, it being conceded that no such lien existed according to the admiralty law, thereby correcting an error which had its origin in this court in the case of The Gen. Smith, 4 Wheat., 439, applied and enforced in the case of Peyroux et al. v. Howard & Varion, 7 Pet., 324, and afterwards partially corrected in the case of The Steamboat New Orleans v. Phebus, 11 Pet., 175, 184. In this last case, the court refused to enforce a lien for the master's wages, though it had been given by the local laws of the State of Louisiana, the same as in the case of supplies and repairs of the vessel. We have determined to leave all these liens depending upon state laws, and not arising out of the maritime contract, to be enforced by the state courts.

So in respect to the completely internal commerce of the States, which is the subject of regulation by their municipal laws; contracts growing out of it should be left to be dealt with by its own tribunals.

For these reasons, we think the decree of the court below should be reversed, and the cause remitted, with directions to dismiss the libel.

THE UNITED STATES, Appt.,

v.

JOHN A. SUTTER.

S. C., 21 How., 170–184.

Sutter's claim—exemplification of record, evidence—surplus—Mexican law—forfeiture—claim of persons interested, may be in name of original claimant.

A claim for eleven leagues of land granted to Sutter by Alvarado, Governor of California, 18th of June, 1841, sustained.

An exemplification of a record is admissible, as evidence of the same dignity as the grant itself.

The non-production of the original given to the party cannot furnish much cause for suspicion.

The petition for the surplus, or sobrante, implies there was an existing and operative grant, which the authorities recognized and respected.

The Mexican law of 1828, authorizes the political chief to grant lands to an empresario who may wish to colonize.

But the grant shall not be definitely valid without the previous approbation of the Supreme Government, to which the espediente, with such report as the Departmental Assembly may think fit to make, shall be communicated.

No law of the U. S. authorizes this court to pronounce forfeiture for any act or omission since the date of the Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo.

The evidence fails to establish the grant purporting to be issued by Micheltorena at Santa Barbara, the 5th February, 1845, and submitted to the Board of Commissioners in March, 1853.

Requisites of a Mexican grant, considered.

It is competent to persons interested in the claim, to employ the name of the original claimant in proceedings to establish the grant.

Argued Jan. 7, 1859. Decided Feb. 14, 1859.

APPEAL from the District Court of the United States for the District of California.

This case arose upon a petition filed before the Board of Land Commissioners, in California, by the appellee, for the confirmation of a claim to 33 square leagues of land in the valley of the Sacramento River.

The said Board of Land Commissioners entered a decree confirming the claim of the petitioner.

This decree, on appeal, having been affirmed by the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of California, the United States took an appeal to this court.

A further statement of the case appears in opinion of the court.

Messrs. Black, Atty-Gen., and Hull for appellants.

Messrs. Howard, Crittenden, Butler and Walker, for appellee.

Mr. Justice Campbell delivered the opinion of the court:

This cause comes to this court by appeal from a decree of the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of California, which affirms a sentence of the Board of Commissioners to settle private land claims in that State, in favor of the appellee, upon a claim to thirty-three square leagues of land in the valley of the Sacramento River. The record shows that the claimant, a native of Switzerland, immigrated to the Department of California about the year 1839, was naturalized as a citizen of Mexico, and with the leave of the government formed a settlement near the junction of the Sacramento and American rivers, which he designated New Helvetia. The country at the time was uninhabited, except by bands of warlike Indians, who made frequent depredatory incursions upon the undefended settlements to the south and east of this place. In two or three years after his arrival, the claimant was commissioned by the Governor of California to guard the northern frontier and to represent the government in affording security and protection to its inhabitants against the invasion of the Indians and marauding bands of hunters and trappers, who occasionally visited the valley for plunder. In the year 1841 he commenced the erection of a fort at New Helvetia, at his own expense. It was surrounded by a high wall, and was defended by cannon. Within this fort there were dwelling-houses for his servants and workmen, and workshops for the manufacture of various articles of necessity. There was a gristmill, tannery, and distillery, attached to the establishment. A number of Indians were domesticated by him, and contributed to cultivate his fields of grain, and to defend the settle- from more savage tribes. He was possessed of several thousands of horses and neat cattle, which were under the care of his servants. There were collected at different times from twenty to fifty families, and there were in the course of years some hundreds of persons connected with this settlement. He is described as having been hospitable and generous to strangers, and the governors of California bear testimony to the vigor with which he performed the duties of his civil and military commission.

In March, 1852, he placed before the Board of Commissioners a claim for eleven leagues of land, to include his place at New Helvetia, and extending thence north, which were granted to him by Juan B. Alvarado, Governor of California, 18th of June, 1841.

In March, 1853, he amended his petition and claimed an additional quantity of twenty-two leagues, which were granted to him and his son, John A. Sutter, the 5th of February, 1845, by Micheltorena, the Governor of California; this being the surplus (sobrante) contained within the limits from which his first grant was to be fulfilled. The espediente submitted to the Board, with the grant of Alvarado, and as a part of it, represents that he is in possession of New Helvetia, and that his enterprise there had the sanction of the government, and had been prosperous; that he had associated with him industrious families; and that, besides the advantage to himself, he had awakened industry in others, and had also, by the strength of his company, formed a strong barrier against the savage Indians. He asks to enlarge his establishment, by introducing twelve families, and for this purpose solicits a grant of eleven leagues at his establishment of New Helvetia, from the governor, together with his powerful influence before the Supreme Government of the nation, that its approbation might be given. The governor recognizes the truth of the statements in the espediente, and declares that he has been sufficiently informed that the land is vacant and suitable for the purpose of the grantee. He grants to the applicant, "for him and his settlers, the said land, called New Helvetia, subject to the approbation of the Supreme Government and of the Departmental Assembly," and subject to four conditions. The third and fourth relate to the boundaries of the land and the consummation of the title, and are as follows: "3d. The land of which donation is made to him is of the extent of eleven sitios de ganado mayor, as exhibited in the sketch annexed to the proceedings, without including the lands overflown by the swelling and current of the rivers. It is bounded on the north by los Tres Picas (three summits) and the 39° 41′ 45″ north latitude; on the east by the borders of the Rio de las Plumas; on the south by the parallel 38° 49′ 32″ of north latitude; and on the west by the River Sacramento. 4th. When this property shall be confirmed unto him, he shall petition the proper judge to give him possession of the land, in order that it may be measured, agreeably to ordinance, the surplus thereof remaining for the benefit of the nation, for convenient purposes. Therefore I order that this title being held as firm and valid, that the same be entered in the proper book, and that these proceedings be transmitted to the excellent Departmental Assembly."

The first inquiry in cases like this is, has the authenticity of the grant been established. This was not questioned in the District Court, but in this court the appellants have denounced, with much force, the evidence as insufficient to support it. The original, issued to the donee, was not produced either to the Board of Commissioners or the District Court. To account for its non-production, two witnesses were examined, who say that a paper, purporting to be an original, and which had the appearance of authenticity, was in the possession of one of them, as the agent and attorney in fact of the claimant; that this paper was destroyed by fire, with the office in which both lived, in the fall of 1851. An affidavit of the claimant in another case is in the record, in which he says that the original is lost. Some months before this fire, this paper was recorded in the county registry of deeds, and the recording clerk affords some evidence to the genuineness of the paper. It is shown that it had been exhibited in controversies before courts of justice, and had been examined by adverse claimants and their counsel, and at other times by interested and inquiring parties.

A grant of the same date, for the same quantity of land, in the same locality, and issued by the same officer, was reported to the United States by William Carey Jones, Esq., their agent, as existing in the archives of California in 1850. In his intercourse with the officers of the California Government, the claimant asserted his title to New Helvetia, and his assertion was admitted; and accurate accounts of his location and settlement, and the terms on which they were made, are to be found in historical and descriptive works published under the authority of foreign States, upon the testimony of their agents, who visited California prior to 1845. Frémont, 246; 1 Duflot de Moufras Explor. de l'Oregon and des Callas, 457. Besides this consistent testimony, there is produced from the archives a draught of a grant corresponding to that produced from the county records, except in respect to the signatures.

The Governor, Alvarado, testifies that this draught was prepared by him, and from it the original that issued to Sutter was prepared by the secretary, and that the draught was deposited by his directions, and is now there. The fact that his name is not attached to this draught does not impair its authority under the circumstances of this case. Spencer v. Lapsley, 20 How., 264.

We agree that the rule of law which requires the best evidence within the power or control of the party to be produced should not be relaxed, and that the court should be satisfied that the better evidence has not been willfully destroyed nor voluntarily withheld. But the rule on the subject does not exact that the loss or destruction of the document of evidence should be proved beyond all possibility of a mistake. It only demands that a moral certainty should exist that the court has had every opportunity for examining and deciding the cause upon the best evidence within the power or ability of the litigant. In every well regulated government, the deeds of its officers, conveying parts of the public domain, are registered or enrolled, to furnish permanent evidence to its grantees of the origin of their title. An exemplification of such a record is admissible, as evidence of the same dignity as the grant itself. Patterson v. Wynn, 5 Pet., 233; U. S. v. Davenport, 15 How., 1. This rule exists in States which have adopted the civil law. In those States, the deed is preserved in the archives, and copies are given as authentic acts—that is, acts which have a certain and accredited author, and merit confidence. The acts thus preserved are public instruments, and all doubts that arise upon the copies that may be delivered are resolved by a reference to the protocol from which the copies are taken, and without which they have no authority. 1 White Recop., 297; Owings v. Hull, 9 Pet., 607.

When, therefore, a protocol is found in the archives, the non-production of the original given to the party cannot furnish much cause for suspicion or alarm. The map to which the grant refers, and which properly forms a part of it, is not produced from the archives. The testimony of the witnesses is, that there was a map accompanying the original, and was burned with it. An engineer or surveyor (Vioget), who prepared maps for the claimant, testifies that, in January, 1841, he made duplicate maps for the claimant of the establishment at New Helvetia, and surveyed eleven leagues at that place; and that, in 1843, he traced a copy from one of these, and that copy is produced and filed with the petition. It is a fair conclusion, from all the evidence, that these maps of Vioget were presented to the governor, and form the basis of the grant, and make a part of it.

The Secretary, Jimeno, who was examined in reference to an application of the appellee for an enlargement of his establishment, by the donation of the sobrante, says that a map accompanied the petition, and exhibited the land desired; that he made a favorable report upon the petition. The petition for the surplus, or sobrante, implies there was an existing and operative grant, which the authorities recognized and respected. With this map, we have no difficulty in locating the grant so as to include New Helvetia. Without it, the question would be, whether the general description of New Helvetia should overrule the particular description by metes and bounds, contained in the third condition; for it is ascertained that the exact position of the line of latitude which determines the southern boundary lies twenty miles north of the principal establishment. But the map shows that the line of the southern boundary is south of New Helvetia, and is so related to natural objects represented on it as to be easily determined. Vioget accounts for the error in the designation of the line by the imperfection of the instruments, and proves that a starting corner was fixed, and the line traced on the ground. This is better evidence of the true location of the southern line, and conforms to the probabilities of the case. Upon the whole evidence, we find that the grant and map filed with the petition in 1852, before the Board of Commissioners, have been proved. The authenticity of the grant being ascertained, the question of its validity, as a colonization grant, under the laws of 1824 and 1828, remains to be considered. To these laws, the authorities of California habitually refer as the source of their authority.

The law of 1828 authorizes the political chief to grant lands to an empresario who may wish to colonize; but that the grant shall not be definitely valid without the previous approbation of the Supreme Government, to which the espediente, with such report as the Departmental Assembly may think fit to make, shall be communicated. Before conceding lands, the chief was directed to make inquiries that the candidate was embraced by the laws, and that the land was suitable for colonization, and was not subject to any existing right.

The grant to the claimant recites that the governor had obtained the information necessary, and that the requirements of the law had been fulfilled.

No condition was imposed upon the claimant in respect to the distribution of the lands among the families to be introduced. The object of the grant, on the part of the authorities, seems to have been to secure the services of an efficient and competent officer, in a distant and exposed portion of the Province, who would undertake to give repose and security to the settlements in that region; and this distribution of lands was confided to him as a trust, and a compensation for the performance of that duty.

The quantity of land was not greater than the Colonization Laws authorized an individual to hold, and the only care of the authorities was, that the consideration of the grant should be secured from the donee. The evidence is satisfactory that the expectations of the donors were entirely fulfilled. During the early administration of Alvarado and Micheltorena, the grantee seems to have had the favor of the political authorities, and in 1844 there was no objection opposed by them to the enlargement of his enterprise. He was referred to for information in business of the department, and, in the civil commotions that preceded the overturn of the power of Micheltorena, he was the principal stay of his administration; and when called in question, subsequently, by the enemies of his chief, he said: "My establishment is situated between the San Joaquin and Sacramento Rivers. It is the point which forms the frontier of the Mosebulos Indians, who are those who attack the ranchos and seize the horses. It is the road of transit from the interior. These reasons, not less than the great distance from my place to the other settlements, suggested to me the propriety of building my fort; and in order to do so, I obtained a license from the government of the country."

Subsequently to February, 1845, he seems not to have been molested by the Government of Mexico, but remained the only representative of its power and authority in the valley of the Sacramento. There was no inconvenience felt by the failure to complete the grant, and there was no denunciation, by any one, of the land, for a breach of any condition. When the Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo was ratified, he was a citizen of Mexico, in possession of the property comprehended in the grant, and is entitled to all the guarantees provided by that Treaty for the Mexican population of California. He has submitted his claims to the tribunals appointed by the United States, within the term prescribed, and is ready to abide their action in reference to them. We know of no law of the United States which authorizes us to pronounce a sentence of forfeiture for any act or omission since the date of the Treaty. Our opinion is, that this grant is a valid claim under that Treaty.

The grant purporting to be issued by Micheltorena at Santa Barbara, the 5th February, 1845, and submitted to the Board of Commissioners in March, 1853, remains to be considered.

The original of this grant was not produced. It is not in the list of grants reported to the government by Mr. Jones, nor is it found in the archives of California. It has not been placed upon the County Records of Sacramento County, nor is there any evidence that it was ever produced in any of the controversies for the land included in it. There is no petition, or reference to the Secretary, or compliance with any other formality prescribed by the law of 1828, preliminary to the issue of grants for lands. The record shows, that in 1843, or 1844, the claimant applied for the sobrante or surplus, and that his petition was referred to the secretary for further information, and that he reported there was no objection; that the governor reserved the subject for consideration until he could visit the Sacramento valley, and that the papers were returned to the claimant.

In February, 1845, there existed a revolt against the government of Micheltorena, in which the principal inhabitants of California participated. Micheltorena abandoned his capital, and, on his way to Los Angeles, reached Santa Barbara, where the claimant joined him with a body of "foreign volunteers." The deposition of Castanada, the aid-de-camp of Micheltorena, has been taken. He says that the claimant presented a petition for a grant to himself and his son; that he (Castanada) drew the deed, and that it was executed by the governor, in his presence, at Santa Barbara; and that he believes that the paper presented is a true copy. One of the volunteers testifies that the governor made a speech to the volunteers, in which he said he had granted to Sutter all the lands he had claimed (or asked for), and that he had issued grants to all the applicants for lands who had been licensed to settle in the valley of the Sacramento. He says, about two months after he saw a grant in the hands of Sutter, which Sutter informed him had been delivered at that time, and that he thinks the present copy corresponds with the one he then saw.

The two witnesses, who proved the loss of the other grant, testify that the original of this was destroyed at the same time with the other, and that the paper produced is a copy of the one destroyed.

This evidence is not entirely satisfactory to establish the execution of the grant. The two witnesses first named speak of a paper they had not seen since 1845, and one of them was not familiar with the language in which it is written. One of the other witnesses is largely interested as a grantee of the claimant in the issue of this suit, and the fourth immigrated to California after the Treaty, was not conversant with the Spanish language, and derived much of his impressions from the parties who claimed title under Sutter, and of whom he was the attorney.

But we are not disposed to place the decision of the cause upon the deficiency of the evidence of the execution of the paper, and therefore do not pronounce absolutely upon it.

The decisions of the court show that they have been disposed to interpret liberally the measures of the Mexican authorities in California, and to view with indulgence the acts and modes of dealing of the inhabitants, having reference to the laws of distribution and settlement of the public domain. The circumstances in which the governor was placed required that his power and discretion should not be circumscribed by narrow limits. In a remote province of the Mexican Republic, he was almost the only representative of the general and common will of the nation, and he was habitually in collision, sometimes in violent collision, with provincial feelings, sentiments and interests. At the time this grant purports to have been made, he was engaged in a civil war, which, after having been smothered for a time, had burst forth with increased violence. Within two or three weeks from the date of the grant, the war was terminated by the agreement of Micheltorena to abandon the country. He never returned to the capital, except to prepare for his departure. The laws of Mexico for the colonization and settlement of the public domain, embody a comprehensive and liberal policy, and the arrangements for their execution denote care and circumspection on the part of their authors in securing their faithful administration. They authorize the governor (politicos gefes) to grant lands to those who may ask for them, for the purpose of cultivating and inhabiting them. They require that every person soliciting for lands shall address the governor a petition, expressing his name, country, and profession, the number, description, religion, and other circumstances of his condition, and describing as distinctly as possible, by means of a map, the land asked for; that the governor shall obtain the necessary information whether the petition embraces the requisite conditions required by the law as to the person and land, and, if necessary, that the municipal authorities might be consulted whether there be an objection to making the grant or not; that the grants made to private families or persons shall not be held to be definitely valid without the previous consent of the Departmental Assembly, and, in case of their dissent, that it should be referred to the Supreme Government. The definitive grant being made, a document signed by the governor shall be given, wherein it must be stated that said grant is made in conformity with the provisions of the laws in virtue whereof possession shall be given, and that the necessary record shall be kept, in a book destined for the purpose, of all the petitions presented and grants made, with the maps of the lands granted, and the circumstantial report shall be forwarded quarterly to the Supreme Government.

The office of political chief of a State or Province has long existed in Spain (whence it was derived by Mexico), and his duties are defined with precision in the works on the administrative law of that monarchy. The authoritative acts of this officer assume the form of ordinances and regulations, or of decrees and judgments. The former relate to the concerns of the Department, and may issue spontaneously, while the latter always proceed upon a petition. There are scarcely any formulas prescribed for these acts. But there exist certain rules, consecrated by usage, sanctioned by reason, and required by justice, some of which have received the assent of the legislator, and others are official regulations.

The administration has need of information, and hence the political chief may consult with subordinate authorities and corporations in all business in which exact information is required of local facts and circumstances, and he is bound to hear the suggestions of the deputations and provincial assemblies when the law requires it—a rigorous condition, a compliance with which should appear in the recitals of the disposing part, and the inserting of the customary formulas, that the act may not be contested for excess of power. Finally, all the acts of the political chief shall be authenticated by his signature, and it concerns the good order of the administration that they should be inserted in a special record. Colmeiro derecho Admin., secs. 285, 286.

Assuming the statements of the witnesses Castanada and Ford to be accurate, it can hardly be contended that the issue of this grant was an act of civil administration, or had any reference to the law of colonization and settlement. At a distance from the capital, in the prosecution of an intestine war against a band of insurgents, surrounded by a body of foreign volunteers, in whose fidelity his safety depends, the governor promises to dispose of the public domain as a compensation for service, or as an inducement to loyalty. In a few days this governor is defeated, vacates his post, and his troops are disbanded.

The hostile government that succeeded to that of Micheltorena have not recognized the legality of the deeds of the deposed chief, nor did the claimant (so far as we are informed) attempt to obtain any sanction to his claim, or to introduce the evidence in his possession among the archives of the department, without which a perfect title could never have been obtained. On the contrary, the record shows that he was a captive in the hands of the enemies of Micheltorena, and was released, after humble apologies, for his adherence to the unfortunate chief, and protestations that in future he would be loyal to the existing authorities. He kept his grant concealed apparently as a dangerous secret, until an entire change in the political constitution of the country took place. In our opinion, this was not a valid claim at the date of the Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, and is not entitled to recognition from the United States.

It appears from the deeds in the record that the claimant has conveyed nearly all of his estate in the land included in the two grants, and objection is taken to the form of the suit. It is contended that the claim should have been preferred by the grantees of the claimant. We admit the force of the argument in favor of the objection, and that the dormant interests of persons not parties on the record may frequently disturb the course of justice.

But the contrary practice was sanctioned in Percheman's case, 7 Pet., and has been followed since. It is competent to persons interested in the claim to employ the name of the original claimant. U. S. v. Percheman, 7 Pet., 51; U. S. v. Patterson, 15 How., 10.

The decree of the District Court is affirmed, in so far as it relates to the grant bearing date the 18th of June, 1841, and executed by Juan B. Alvarado; and is reversed in so far as it relates to the grant purporting to have been executed by Micheltorena, at Santa Barbara, the 5th of February, 1845; and the cause is remitted to the District Court for further proceedings in respect to the location of the grant of Alvarado, within the limits set forth in the grant and the accompanying map on file in the case.

Mr. Justice Clifford, dissenting:

I respectfully dissent from so much of the opinion of the court as affirms that a proper legal foundation was laid at the trial for the introduction of parol evidence to establish the existence and authenticity of the Alvarado grant. When a concession of land is made by the government to an individual under Mexican laws, as in this case, a duplicate copy of the title paper is required in all cases to be filed in the proper tribunal for registry; and unless that is done, it is difficult to see how a legal registry can be made. That duplicate copy is in the nature of an original paper, and, after registry, becomes the foundation of all the subsequent proceedings of the government to perfect the grant in the donee. It was the duty of the purchaser in this case, in the absence of any original grant, to produce that duplicate copy, if in existence; and if not, then to account for its loss. According to the draught presented as a copy, proved by parol evidence, the grant was made subject to the approval of the Supreme Government and of the Departmental Assembly. It has never been decided that a grant issued by a subordinate officer, subject to the approval of the Supreme Government, was valid without such approval; and, in my judgment, the doctrine cannot be maintained without subverting the essential principles on which every well regulated government rests. This grant was never approved, either by the Supreme Government or the Departmental Assembly. Under the circumstances disclosed in the record, I cannot concur that it is the duty of the United States, under the Treaty, to disturb the possession of the settlers, while it appears that there is better evidence to establish the right of the donee, if any be had, to the land described in his concession. On the proofs exhibited, I am of the opinion that the decree of the District Court should be wholly reversed.

I fully concur in the above opinion.

CHAS. BELCHER & CO., Plffs. in Er.,

v.

GEORGE C. LAWRASON, Collector of the Port of NEW ORLEANS.

(See S. C., 21 How., 251-257.)

Duty on goods imported by manufacturer—goods purchased, or procured otherwise than by purchase—construction of Acts—undervaluation.

The 17th section of the Act of August 30, 1842, applies in the appraisal of merchandise imported by the manufacturer.

The regulations of the Acts of 1823 and 1832, as to goods procured otherwise than by purchase, were left untouched by the 16th section of the Act of 1842.

The 17th section applies to every class of importations—goods purchased, or procured otherwise than by purchase.

While the Act of 1842 remained in force, it subjected all importations to the penalty of fifty per centum in case of undervaluation.

The Act of 3d March, 1857, obliterates the distinction between goods purchased or procured otherwise than by purchase, and imposes upon the latter the twenty per centum upon the appraised value, for undervaluation, the same as in case of goods purchased.

Argued Jan. 26, 1859. Decided Feb. 14, 1859.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Louisiana.

This suit was brought in the court below, by the plaintiffs in error, to recover from the Collector of the Port of New Orleans the sum of $6,159.20, with interest, amount of penal and additional duties levied and paid under protest on various invoices of sugar and molasses, imported from Cuba, having been there manufactured by themselves.

The court below decided that the importers were not liable for the twenty per cent. exacted, but were liable, under the 17th section of the Act of 1842, to a penalty of fifty per cent. on the duty, which reduced the amount by $1,539.80, whereupon the plaintiffs sued out this writ of error.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. J. P. Benjamin and Reverdy Johnson, for plaintiffs in error:

It is contended, on behalf of the plaintiff, that the court below erred—

1. In determining that the merchandise in question was liable to penal duty under the Act of August, 1842.

2. In enforcing the penalty in the present suit, by deducting it from the amount of plaintiff's demand, even if it were true that the Act of August, 1842, did apply to his merchandise.

Before entering, however, into an argument on these points, it may be proper to make the preliminary remark that the exaction of the penal duty of twenty per cent. on the invoice value of the importation, under the 8th section of the Tariff Act of 1846, was clearly illegal.

Greely v. Thompson, 10 How., 226; Christ v. Maxwell, 3 Blatchf., 129; Thompson v. Maxwell, 2 Blatchf., 385; Durand v. Lawrence, 2 Blatchf., 396; Barnard v. Morton, 1 Curt. C. C., 404.

The counsel then quoted the Tariff Act of August, 1842 (5 Stat. at L., 563), and argued that the provisions in sections 16 and 17 were not applicable to importations by manufacturers.

Counsel also argued that there was evident error in protecting the penalty prescribed in the Act of 1842.

The collector never claimed from us any penalty under that law. The penalty exacted was a penalty of twenty per cent. on the appraised value of the merchandise. None other was asked. That penalty was paid under protest, and under the Act of February, 1845, we have the right to recover it back.

Mr. J. S. Black, Atty-Gen., for the defendant in error.

This is a writ of error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Louisiana.

The suit was brought in the court below to recover back from the Collector of the Port of New Orleans an excess of duties paid by the plaintiffs. The goods upon which the duties were imposed were certain invoices of molasses and sugars, imported from Matanzas, in the Island of Cuba, in the year 1852. They were imported by the manufacturer, and, on an appraisal of the value at the customs in New Orleans, the appraised value exceeded the invoice value upwards of ten per centum; whereupon the Collector imposed an additional duty of twenty per centum upon the appraised value, under the 8th section of the Act of 1846, which was paid under protest.

The court below held that this additional duty was improperly imposed, under the Act of 30th July, 1846, as the 8th section of that Act applied only to merchandise purchased in the foreign market, and did not embrace goods imported by the manufacturer. The court further held, that the several shipments were subject to the increased duty imposed under the 17th section of the Act of August 30, 1842; and allowed the plaintiff to recover the excess over and beyond the amount chargeable under this last section.

The principal question in the case is, whether or not the 17th section of the Act of 1842 applies in the appraisal of merchandise imported by the manufacturer.

The Act of Congress of March 1, 1823, recognized a distinction between goods imported which were purchased by the owner in the foreign market, and goods imported by the manufacturer himself, and prescribed separate and distinct oaths to be taken before the Collector (sec. 4). That Act also prescribed, as a rule for the appraisal of the goods, that to the actual cost if the same have been actually purchased, or the actual if the same shall have been procured otherwise than by purchase, at the time and place when and where purchased, or otherwise procured, &c., shall be added all charges, &c. (sec. 5).

The Act of Congress of July 14, 1832, preserved the same distinction as in the Act of 1823, in respect to goods imported which had been purchased, and goods procured otherwise than by purchase (sec. 15, secs. 7 and 8).

The 16th section of the Act of 1842, like the 7th section of the Act of 1832, prescribed the rule for the appraisal of goods imported which had been purchased in the foreign market, but omitted any provision in respect to goods imported which had been procured otherwise than by purchase, leaving this class of importations to the rule as prescribed in the Acts of 1823, section 5, and 1832, section 15, which was not repealed, as no provision in that Act was inconsistent with this rule. The repealing clause of that Act is as follows: "And that all provisions of any former law inconsistent with this Act shall be, and the same are hereby repealed." The regulations, therefore, of the Acts of 1823 and 1832, in respect to the time and place when and where goods, procured others wise than by purchase, were left untouched by the 16th section of the Act of 1842.

Then, as it regards the 17th section. That is general, and applies to every class of importations—goods purchased, or procured otherwise than by purchase. It regulates the mode and manner of the appraisement. The appraisers may call before them, and examine upon oath, the owner, importer, consignee, or any other person, touching any matter deemed material in ascertaining the true market value or wholesale price of any merchandise imported; may call for letters, accounts, or invoices, relating to the valuation. It imposes a forfeiture of one hundred dollars for any neglect or refusal to attend before the appraisers and give evidence; makes false swearing before them perjury; and if the person be the owner, importer, or consignee, forfeits also the merchandise; requires that the evidence thus taken shall be filed in the Collector's office, for future use; provides for an appeal, on the part of the owner, importer, or consignee, to merchant appraisers, in case of dissatisfaction at the appraisal by the permanent appraisers; makes the appraisal by the permanent or merchant appraisers, as the case may be, final and conclusive; and then closes with a priviso, that, in all cases where the actual value thus appraised and ascertained shall exceed, by ten per centum, the invoice value, then, in addition to the duty imposed by law, there shall be levied and collected on the goods fifty per centum of the duty upon the appraised value. See, also, Act of Congress, March 3, 1851.

As we have said, this section applies to all classes of importations, and regulates the mode and manner by which the appraisals shall be conducted by the appraisers, giving to the owner, importer, &c., the right of re-appraisal by merchant apraisers, in case of dissatisfaction. It embraces not only importations of goods purchased, referred to in the 16th section of the Act, but importations procured otherwise than by purchase, as provided for in the Acts of 1823 and 1832; and while this Act of 1842 remained in full force, it subjected all importations to the penalty of fifty per centum in case of undervaluation.

Then came the Act of 30th July, 1846, the 8th section of which changed this penalty or increased duty, in case of undervaluation, to twenty per centum on the appraised value, as it respected goods imported which had been purchased, leaving the regulations in respect to goods imported by the manufacturers as they existed under the former laws.

This Act, like the Act of 1842, repealed only such enactments of former laws as were repugnant to its provisions (sec. 11). The 8th section, not including the manufacturer, left the importation subject to the 17th section of the Act of 1842.

The Act of 3d March, 1857, obliterates this distinction between goods purchased or procured otherwise than by purchase, and imposes upon the latter the twenty per centum upon the appraised value, for undervaluation, the same as in case of goods purchased. Sess. Laws 1857, p. 199, Lit. & Bro. ed.

It has been argued that, admitting the goods were properly subject to the fifty per centum increased duty, under the 17th section of the Act of 1842, inasmuch as this was not imposed by the collector, but the higher increased duty, under the 8th section of the Act of 1846, the court below erred in charging the shipments in question with the former duty.

But the answer to this objection is, that the law imposes the increased duty in case of undervaluation, and not the collector. It is true he is the agent of the Government to collect it, as he is in collecting the ordinary rate of duties, but in no other sense or character. The law declares, in the case contemplated by the Act, and which existed upon the proofs before the court, that, in addition to the ordinary duty, there shall be lieved and collected, &c., fifty per centum, &c. No demand of the Collector was necessary to create the liability. That arose, as matter of law, upon the facts disclosed in the record, and it was the duty of the court to enforce it; and hence the excess over this increased duty, arising under the 17th section, constituted the just amount which the plaintiffs were entitled to recover.

Judgment of the court below affirmed.

JACOB B. BROWN, JACOB NISSWANER, FONTAINE BECKHAM, JOHN C. UNSELD AND GEORGE W. MOLER, Plffs. in Er.,

v.

BENJAMIN HUGER.

(See S. C., 21 How., 305-322.)

Patent, how interpreted—construction of, is for the court—proof of its subjects, proper—natural or permanent objects control course and distance—where boundary is a river.

A patent for land must itself be taken as evidence of its meaning; it must be interpreted as a whole; its various provisions in connection with each other, and the legal deductions drawn therefrom must be conformable with the scope and purpose of the entire document.

This construction and these deductions are within the exclusive province of the court.

Proof of the existence and character of the objects or subjects to which it is applicable, is proper.

In ascertaining the boundaries of surveys or patents, the universal rule is, that wherever natural or permanent objects are embraced in the calls of either, these have absolute control; and both course and distance must yield to their influence.

Where a line is described as running in a certain direction to a river, and thence up or down with the river, those words imply that the line is to follow the river according to its meanderings and turnings, and in water-courses not navigable must be "ad medium filum aquæ."

Argued Jan. 20, 1859. Decided Feb. 14, 1859.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Virginia.

The history of the case, and a very full statement of the facts, appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Reverdy Johnson and Henry Winter Davis, for plaintiffs in error:

The court withdrew from the jury all questions touching the proof of the patent and the particular boundaries thereof, though the defendant's case consisted in showing the boundaries, in the only copy of the patent produced, to be erroneous; and the patent itself appeared to have issued irregularly and without a precedent survey for the patentee.

Barclay v. Howell, 6 Pet., 498, 508, 511.

The court withdrew from the jury the question, whether the 4th point of the defendant's patent being in fact near and not on the river, was, under all the circumstances of the locality and survey, on or near the river.

Barclay v. Howell, 6 Pet., 498, 508, 511.

It must be for the jury to say, whether near means on the river, or is only a general description of the locality of the point, which is itself the real point contemplated by the patent.

Messrs. Hull & Mason, for defendant in error.

Mr. J. S. Black, Atty-Gen., for the United States:

The claim set up by the plaintiff in this case is null, for three reasons, each of which is conclusive.

1. It is contended, on the part of defendant, that by the calls of this patent, in construction of law, the two rivers, Potomac and Shenandoah, are to be taken as the boundaries in question.

2. The Brown patent is void under the Re-

NOTE.—Natural objects or needle; which govern, in the survey of lands. See note to Newsom v. Pryors 20 U. S. (7 Wheat.), 7.

vised Code of Virginia (tit. 32, sec. 86, p. 484 of Code published in 1849), by which it is enacted that "no entry on any lands which have been settled for 20 years prior to the date of such entry, and upon which taxes have been paid at any time within the said 20 years, shall be valid, and any title which the Commonwealth may have thereto, is hereby relinquished."

See, also, Tichanal v. Roe, 2 Rob. Va., 288.

3. The Brown patent is void under the 87th section of title 32, same book, page 485, which is as follows:

The Register of the Land Office shall not receive into his office any plat and copy of survey, which evidently comprehends the rights of any other than him for whom such survey is made, notwithstanding any deductions or reservations. Every such survey shall be void. Counsel said that the present case was distinguished from that of Mitchell v. Harmony, 13 How., 115; Meigs v. McClung, 9 Cranch, 11; Hill v. *The U. Mr. Justice Daniel delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action of ejectment instituted by the plaintiffs in error against the defendant, in the Circuit Court of the County of Jefferson, in the State of Virginia.

The locus in quo being held and occupied by the defendant as an officer of the United States, and in virtue of their right and authority, the suit was, under the Act of Congress of 1789, removed, upon petition, to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Virginia, within which district the property in dispute is situated. The claim of the plaintiffs is founded on a patent from the Lieutenant Governor of Virginia, granted to Jacob Brown and Jacob Nisswaner, dated July 29, 1851, and granted in virtue of a Land-Office Treasury warrant for the location of waste and unappropriated lands. This patent, according to the various courses and distances therein set forth, purports to grant the quantity of thirty-nine acres and two roods. Beckham, Unseld, and Moler, three of the plaintiffs, derived their title directly from the patentees above named, as was shown by conveyances from the latter, which were read in evidence. The plaintiffs also introduced a survey plot and report, made by A. Trotter, surveyor, in pursuance of an order of court in this cause; and relied upon the same, with other evidence, to show that the land granted by the patent of 1851 was correctly laid down and described in the survey, and that the defendant was in the possession of the land claimed at the commencement of the plaintiff's action.

The defendant, holding the premises as the agent and under the authority of the United States, defended the right to the possession as held by him, upon the following proofs, being certified copies from the records of the Land Office of the State of Virginia, by S. A. Parker, the Register of that office. 1st. An entry in the Office of the Lord Proprietor of the Northern Neck of the State of Virginia (within which portion of the State the land in contest is situated), in the following words, viz.: "1750, April 4. Surveyed. James Nickols, of Frederick County, Virginia, entered about two hundred acres of waste and ungranted land at the mouth of the Shenandoah River." And an order from Lord Fairfax to Guy Broadwater, in the words and figures following, viz.:

"TO MR. GUY BROADWATER:

Whereas James Nickols hath informed that there are about two hundred acres of waste and ungranted land where he now lives, and desiring a warrant to survey ye same, in order to obtain a deed, being ready to pay ye composition and office charges: These are therefore to empower you, ye said ———, to survey ye said waste land, provided this be ye first warrant that hath issued for ye land; and you are to make a just and accurate survey thereof, describing the course and distance per pole; also ye cuttings and boundings of the several persons' lands adjoining; and where you cannot join to any known lines, you are to make ye breadth of ye tract to bear at least ye proportion of one third of ye length, as ye law of Virginia directs; you are also to insert ye name of ye pilote and chain carryers made use of and employed; a plat of which said survey, with this warrant, you are to give into this office any time before ——— day of ———, next ensuing. Given under my hand and seal of ye proprietor's office, this ——— day of ———, in ye twenty ——— year of his majesty King George ye second reign.

FAIRFAX."

2d. And a plat and certificate of survey by said Broadwater, in the words and figures following viz.:

"By virtue of a warrant from ye proprietor's office, dated the 4th of April, 1750, granted to James Nickols one certain parcel or tract of land situated and lying in Frederick County: Beginning at A, a *sick*amore standing upon ye edge of Shenandoah, extending down ye said river S 55 E. 44 poles to B; thence N. 66 E. 72 poles to C, a *sick*amore standing upon ye pitch of ye point of Shenandoah; thence up Potomac N. 48 W. 200 poles to D, a chestnu*tt* tree standing near Potomac River, side opposi*tt* to a small isle*l*and; thence west 105 poles to E, a white oak; thence S. 140 poles to F, a red oak; thence east 150 poles to ye beginning, containing 125 acres, surveyed by me.

GUY BROADWATER.

JOSEPH CANTNELL, } Chain carriers.
JOSEPH NICKOLS, }

Indorsed: Deed issued 25th April, 1751."

An official certificate from S. H. Parker, Register of the Virginia Land Office, dated Richmond, June 27th, 1854, in the following words:

"I, S. H. Parker, Register of the Land Office of Virginia, do hereby certify, that it does not appear that any grant has been issued on the survey made by James Nickols for 125 acres of land in Frederick County to any person except Robert Harper, to whom a grant issued on the 25th day of April, 1751, which date agrees with the date on Nickols' survey. And I further certify that I can find no survey of Robert Harper for 125 acres on file in this office."

3d. A grant from the Lord Proprietor of the Northern Neck, in the following words:

"The Right Honorable Thomas Lord Fairfax, Baron of Cameron, in that part of Great Britain called Scotland, proprietor of the Northern Neck of Virginia:

To all to whom this present writing shall come, sends greeting:

Know ye, that for good causes, for and in consideration of the composition to me paid, and for the annual rent hereafter received, I have given, granted and confirmed, and by these presents, for me, my heirs and assigns, do give, grant and confirm unto Robert Harper, of the County of Frederick, a certain tract of waste and ungranted lands in the said county, at the mouth of Shenandoah River, and is bounded as by a survey thereof made by Guy Broadwater, as followeth: Beginning at a sycamore standing on the edge of Shenandoah River, and extending thence down the said river N. 48° W., 200 N. 66 E., seventy-two poles to a sycamore standing at the point, and thence up Potomac River N. 48° W., two hundred poles to a chestnut tree standing near Potomac, opposite to a small island; thence W. one hundred and five poles to a white oak; thence south one hundred and forty poles to a red oak; thence east one hundred and fifty poles to the beginning, containing one hundred and twenty-five acres, together with all rights, members and appurtenances thereunto belonging, royal mines excepted, and a full third part of all lead, copper, tin, coals, iron mines, and iron ore, that shall be found thereon:

To have and to hold the said one hundred and twenty-five acres of land, together with all rights, profits and benefits to the same belonging, or in anywise appertaining, except before excepted to him, the said Robert Harper, his heirs and assigns, forever.

Given at my office in the County of Fairfax, within my said proprietary, under my hand and seal, dated this 25th day of April, in the 24th year of our sovereign lord, George the Second by the Grace of God, of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, king, defender of the faith, &c., A. D. 1751.

(Signed) FAIRFAX."

4th. The defendant offered in evidence the last will of Robert Harper, deceased, the grantee of the Lord Proprietor, with proof of the probate and recording of that last will in the court of Berkley County, on the 13th of October, 1782. By the 1st clause of the will disposing of his property, the testator devised to his nephew, Robert Griffith, "one moiety or half of his ferry survey, to form a straight direct line to run along the two fences on the east side, or that side next to the ferry, the one fence lying on the north, and the other on the south side of the road leading from the ferry to Winchester; the sides of the above-mentioned fences to be a director, or to show where each end of the division line shall terminate. The end of the line leading to the Potomac to terminate as soon as it strikes that river; the end leading to Shenandoah to keep a straight line till it likewise strikes said river, and to contain and include the island opposite where the said line strikes; then to run in my (said Harper's) line, adjoining Sample's line, to continue with said line and to include ninety acres of a new survey; thence to continue its course till where the dividing line shall strike the Potomac River, including therewith the saw-mill and grist-mill of the testator." By the survey and report of Trotter, this line, denominated Sample's line, is one of the courses delineated upon the survey as a boundary to a tract of land conveyed by one Gershom Keys to John Sample, on the 9th of June, 1763, and this line is its southern termination, runs to the margin of the Shenandoah River, and near to Harper's house, as delineated on the plat, and to the grist and saw-mill situated upon that river.

By the next disposition in his will, the testator devised to his niece, Sarah Harper, his ferry and ferry house on Potomac River, and all the remainder of his ferry survey, not before devised to Robert Griffith, and all his estate in and right and title to the Maryland shore of the said ferry, and to ten acres of land upon what is called the Big Island in the Potomac River adjoining the ferry aforesaid.

The defendant also gave in evidence the plat and report of survey made as aforesaid in this case by Trotter, and evidence tending to prove that the beginning corner of Harper's patent was actually on the bank of the Shenandoah River, as at A on the map; and that the third corner of said patent was at or near the junction of the Shenandoah and Potomac Rivers; and that the next corner of the patent, at the distance of two hundred poles up the Potomac River, was near the bank of said river at the point G or 18 on the plat; and that the general course of the said two rivers was as laid down in the said plat in relation to the four said first lines of Harper's patent. Upon a comparison of the survey made by Broadwater by order of the Lord Proprietor with the copy of the patent from the Land Office, there will be perceived this disagreement between these two documents with regard to the first call in the location of the land. In the survey as well as in the patent, the beginning is stated to be at a sycamore tree standing on the edge of Shenandoah River, and extending thence down the river to a sycamore standing, says the patent, at the point, and according to the survey, at the pitch of the point of Shenandoah, thence up the Potomac, &c. But whilst the first course in the survey in approaching the point or the junction of the two rivers is S. E., the same course is represented in the grant as running N. W. This is a manifest error on the face of the grant, as the geographical knowledge of every one compels him to know, that the Rivers Potomac and Shenandoah in approaching each other run in a south and east direction; and therefore, if this course in the grant ran northwest from the point of beginning, it would diverge more and more at every step from the Potomac, and could never reach the latter river. To correct this manifest error, if, indeed, proof be necessary in aid of the geography of the country, or of the sensible meaning of the patent itself, the defendant offered evidence to show that the original parchment patent had been lost; and further proof to show that this original parchment patent was in the years 1825 and 1827 in possession of Mrs. Catharine Wager, widow of John Wager, Jr., deceased, who was son of John Wager, Sr., who was the husband of Sarah Harper, the devisee of Robert Harper, the original patentee. He further offered proof that the courses and distances had been copied from said original in the years 1825 and 1827, respectively, by the Deputy-Surveyor of Jefferson County, where the lands lie, for the purpose of survey, and were used by him in a survey of the tract patented as aforesaid to Robert Harper, between the Wagers, who claimed under the said Robert Harper and the United States; and offered further proof that the said courses and distances had in 1816 or 1818 been copied from the same original patent by John Peacher, a witness in this cause, then the owner of land binding on the lines of Harper's patent, a copy of which courses and distances is as follows: "Beginning at a sycamore standing on the edge of the Shenandoah River, and extending thence down the said river S. 55 E. 44 poles, N. 66 E. 72 poles to a sycamore standing on the point; and thence up Potomac River N. 48 W. 200 poles to a chestnut tree standing near the Potomac, opposite a small island; thence W. 105 poles to a white oak, S. 140 poles to a red oak; thence E. 150 poles to the beginning."

The defendant then deduced title through conveyances from the devisees of Robert Harper to George Washington, President of the United States, and his successors, on behalf of the United States. One of those conveyances, bearing date on the 15th of June, 1796, from John Wager the elder, the husband, and John Wager, Margaret Wager and Mary Wager, children of Sarah Harper, describing the land conveyed as "all that piece of land situated in the County of Berkley commonly known as the Harper's Ferry land, which was devised by the will of Robert Harper, bearing date on or about the 26th day of September, 1782, to his niece, Sarah Harper, and is bounded by the River Potomac on the outside, by the River Shenandoah on the other side, and by the line dividing it from the tract or parcel of land devised by the said Robert Harper to Robert Griffith on the other side." And in the conveyance from Robert Griffith, to devisee of Harper, dated on the 9th day of January, 1797, to Thomas Rutherford and others, the grantors of another portion of this land to George Washington for the United States, it is recited, "that whereas Robert Harper, late of the County of Berkley, and Commonwealth of Virginia, was in his lifetime seised in fee of and in one certain tract of land situate, lying and being at the confluence of the Potomac and Shenandoah Rivers, in the County of Berkley, containing one hundred and twenty-five acres, for which he obtained a deed from the proprietor, &c.; and, being so seised, did by his last will devise unto his nephew, Robert Griffith the elder, one equal moiety or half of the above-described one hundred and twenty-five acres of land, comprehending a saw-mill thereon, and an island in the Shenandoah opposite thereto." The defendant further proved that the United States had, between the years 1796 and 1800, erected and established on the land in controversy the necessary buildings for an armory and arsenal for the manufacture and repair of arms, and had held and occupied and used, for the purposes aforesaid, the land and buildings, from the years above mentioned to the present time. That the defendant is an officer in the military service of the United States, attached to the Ordnance Department, and as such was in charge and in possession of the land in controversy, with the buildings thereon, and the armory of the United States at Harper's Ferry, under an order from the Ordnance Department; and that the lands aforesaid had been in the like charge of his predecessors, under orders and appointments from the Ordnance Office or War Department of the United States, from May, 1829, to the period when the defendant took possession; and that, prior to the year 1829, as far back as the year 1800, the said lands and buildings were in like charge of other persons in the service of the United States at said armory.

Such being the state of the evidence, the defendant moved the court to give the jury the following instructions, viz.: "That the patent to Robert Harper, having its beginning corner on the Shenandoah River, and calling to extend thence down the river, by course and distance, to the point where it appears, from the survey made in this cause, the River Shenandoah unites with the Potomac; and from that point up the River Potomac, by course and distance, to a corner near the last named river, opposite to a small island. In construction of law, the two rivers are thereby made the boundaries of said patent, from said beginning on the Shenandoah to the last named corner on the Potomac; and if the jury believe, from the evidence, that the lands claimed by the plaintiffs lay along the Rivers Shenandoah and Potomac, within the lines of the patent to Robert Harper, extended as aforesaid to the two rivers, they must find for the defendant—the patent under which the plaintiff claims being junior to that of Harper's, under which the defendant claims—unless the plaintiffs should establish a title to the lands in controversy other than through their said patent."

On the same state of the evidence, the plaintiffs also moved the court to instruct the jury as follows: "That the question as to how the survey, on which this patent of Robert Harper was issued, was actually run, is in this case a question of fact for the jury; and if the jury believe that the line from the sycamore, at the point of confluence of the Shenandoah and Potomac Rivers, to the chestnut tree, was actually run a straight line, then that straight line is the boundary of Robert Harper's patent. But the court gave the instruction asked for by the defendant, and refused to give the instruction asked for by the plaintiffs; to which opinions and action of the court—giving the defendant's instruction, and refusing the plaintiffs' instruction—the plaintiffs by counsel except, and their exceptions are here sealed by the court.

JOHN W. BROCKENBROUGH. [SEAL.]"

The correctness or incorrectness of the decision of the circuit court, in granting the prayer of the defendant, and in refusing that presented by the plaintiff, is the subject of inquiry in this case.

A striking peculiarity distinguishing this case is perceived in the fact that it discloses an effort, by means obtained at a cost comparatively nominal, to disturb and to destroy a possession of more than half a century in duration; a possession connected with public interests of primary magnitude; a possession acquired in return for a full and fair equivalent given, and of a notoriety as extensive as the limits of the nation.

Although the immunity created by lapse of time may not have been directly interposed for its protection, yet such an immunity as necessarily disclosed by the evidence adduced on both sides of this controversy, certainly does not commend the pretensions of the plaintiffs upon considerations of either justice or policy. But beyond such general considerations, though in strict accordance with them, let us inquire whether, upon principles established and mandatory, and inseparable from the maintenance of social order and quiet, and of private right, this attempt of the plaintiffs should not be repelled.

The exceptions taken by the plaintiffs in error to the instructions of the circuit court, and alleged as causes of error here, are stated as follows:

1st. That the court withdrew from the jury all questions touching the proof of the patent and the particular boundaries thereof, though the defendant's case consisted in showing the boundaries, in the only copy of the patent produced, to be erroneous, and the patent to have issued irregularly, and without a precedent survey for the patentee.

2d. That the court withdrew from the jury the question whether the 4th point of the survey of the defendant's patent, being in fact near and not on the river, was, under all the circumstances of the survey, on or near the river; or whether the river or the right lines mentioned in the patent was the true boundary.

In examining this first objection, and the foundation on which it is made, it appears that the original entry for the land in controversy was in the name of James Nickols; that the order of survey from the Lord Proprietor to the Surveyor, Broadwater, was for a survey upon that entry; and that the survey made and returned by Broadwater was upon that entry; but it equally appears that the patent issued by the Lord Proprietor refers to and adopts the survey of Broadwater with respect to its own date, the date of the warrant and the quantity of the land surveyed, and grants the land so surveyed to Robert Harper. From the records of the Land Office of Virginia, comprising the records of the proprietary, it is shown that on the survey made in the name of James Nickols for one hundred and twenty-five acres of land in Frederick County, a patent was granted by the Lord Proprietor to Robert Harper on the 25th day of April, 1751, which date corresponds with that indorsed upon Nickols' survey. It is not, therefore, perceived upon what ground the regularity of the proceedings anterior to the patent to Harper, or the authority to issue it, can be assailed. It does not appear that any exception to either was taken in the court below, and therefore, if at any time available, it is not allowable here.

With regard to the second part of this objection, that which claims for the jury the construction of the patent, we remark that the patent itself must be taken as evidence of its meaning; that, like other written instruments, it must be interpreted as a whole, its various provisions be taken as far as practicable in connection with each other, and the legal deductions drawn therefrom must be conformable with the scope and purpose of the entire document. This construction and these deductions we hold to be within the exclusive province of the court. The patent itself could not be altered by evidence aliunde; but proof, as to the existence and character of the objects or subjects to which it was applicable, was regular and even necessary to give it effect.

In ascertaining the boundaries of surveys or patent, the universal rule is this: that wherever natural or permanent objects are embraced in the calls of either, these have absolute control, and both course and distance must yield to their influence.

Upon recurrence to the survey by Broadwater, from the beginning at A, a sycamore standing on the edge of Shenandoah (a point admitted by all the parties to be the beginning in Harper's Ferry tract), the survey calls for a course extending down the said river S. 55 E. 44 poles to B; thence N. 66 E. 72 poles to C, a sycamore standing on the pitch of the point of Shenandoah; thence up Potomac N. 48 W. 200 poles to D, a chestnut tree standing near the Potomac River side, opposite a small island; thence W. 195 poles to E, a white oak; thence S. 140 poles to F, a red oak; thence E. 150 poles to the beginning. The patent from the Lord Proprietor, granting the land to Harper at the mouth of the Shenandoah River, professes to make the grant, and to give the boundaries of the land and the quantity thereof according to the survey by Broadwater, and commences the description, as taken from that survey, as follows: beginning at a sycamore standing on the edge of Shenandoah River, and extending thence down the said river. At this point in the description are interposed the letters and figures (N. 48° W. 200 N.) It is evident that these letters and figures have been interpolated in this place by an error; perhaps in recording the patent. This seems to follow from the fact that these letters and figures, as thus placed, have no sensible meaning. N. 48° W. 200 N. mean nothing; they point to no object, and neither are they connected with any distance. Immediately following these letters and figures are the several descriptive calls of the patent, corresponding with the courses and distances and objects contained in the survey which it had referred to and adopted. The fact of this interpolation is also shown by the circumstance that farther on in the description, both in the survey and patent, of the courses and distances bordering on the Potomac, there is given, commencing at the point or confluence of the two rivers, the course of N. 48° W. 200 poles to a chestnut tree standing on the Potomac opposite a small island, which part of the description was doubtless wrested from its proper position, and transferred to another in which it could convey no intelligible meaning, and from which it should be expunged as absurd and of no effect. It is proper here to observe that neither in the survey nor the patent for the Harper's Ferry tract is there a course, or a distance, or a station, which is inconsistent with or in opposition to a river boundary; but on either side of that tract facing the river, a riparian or river boundary is obviously intended. Thus, at the Shenandoah, the commencing point is at a tree on the edge of the river; thence down the river to a point of the Shenandoah (meaning the river, of course, as there was no other object bearing that name); at this point is the confluence of the two rivers. Thence the course is up the Potomac N. 200 poles to a chestnut tree standing, in the language of the survey, "near Potomac River side," and in that of the patent, "near Potomac."

The question then propounded by the prayers to the court below was a question of law arising upon the construction of the two patents —the one from the State of Virginia in 1851, the other from Lord Fairfax in 1750.

If, as is contended by the defendant, the calls in the patent to Robert Harper, and in the survey on which it purports to be founded, extended to the Rivers Shenandoah and Potomac, such a construction must be conclusive of this controversy; it leaves no question to be determined by the jury as to the running of an artificial line; it fully sustains the decision of the circuit court upon the prayers respectively offered by the parties.

The citation from the treatise by Angell on water-courses fully declares the rule to be, that where a line is described as running in a certain direction to a river, and thence up or down with the river, those words imply that the line is to follow the river according to its meanderings and turnings, and in water-courses not navigable must be "ad medium filum aquæ." Upon a question of boundary in the case of Jackson v. Low, in the 12th of Johnson's Reports, 255, in ejectment, the court, in construing a provision in a deed in these words: "leading to the creek, and thence up the same to the southwest corner of a lot," &c., say, "there can be no doubt but this lot must follow the creek upon one of its banks or through the middle. This description can never be satisfied by a straight line. The terms 'up the same' necessarily imply that it is to follow the creek according to its windings and turnings, and that must be the middle or center of it."

In the case of Mayhew v. Norton, 17 Pick., 357, a grantor had conveyed land to be bounded by the harbor of Edgartown. The Supreme Court of Massachusetts decided that the flats in front of the lots conveyed passed by the deeds, because they were in the harbor, although the quantity of land conveyed and the length of the lines would have been satisfied by applying them to the upland alone. In the case of Cockerell v. McQuinn, 4th T. B., Mon., 62, the circuit court, in ejectment, had instructed the jury upon a question of boundary that the following calls in the patent: "thence from the fourth course down the river these several courses should be construed by the jury as a call to run down the river bounding thereon, with its meanders," &c. The Supreme Court, to whom this cause was carried by writ of error, say: "In cases of boundary which depend upon the swearing of witnesses, it would no doubt be incompetent for the court, by any sort of instructions that might be given, to withdraw from the jury a decision upon the weight of the testimony and the facts which the testimony conduces to establish." But the case under consideration is not one of that sort. The question for our consideration involves no inquiry into the testimony of witnesses; but, on the contrary, in the absence of all parol evidence as to marked lines, presents for the determination of the court the construction of the calls for boundary mentioned in the patent, and surely none will pretend that the legal construction of a patent is not a matter proper for the decision of a court. If, in the first branch of the instructions, the court was correct in supposing that the call in the patent to run down the river these several courses, &c., should be construed as a call to run with the river, it was unquestionably correct to instruct the jury that the north fork between the fourth corner of the patent and the beginning formed part of the boundary; and that in the first branch of the instruction the court gave a correct construction of the calls of the patent, we apprehend there can be no ground for reasonable doubt.

In the case of Newsom v. Pryor, 7 Wheat., 10, it is laid down by this court as a rule for the construction of surveys and grants, that the most material and certain calls must control those that are less material and certain. A call for a natural object, as a river, a known stream, or a spring, or even a marked tree, shall control both course and distance.

The recent decision of French v. Bankhead, in the 11th of Gratt., 136, decided by the Supreme Court of Virginia, within which State are the lands embraced in this controversy, has an important bearing upon the cause, as it shows the interpretation, by the highest tribunal of that State, of grants made by her with reference to lines running to water-courses, and of the effect of water-courses upon such boundaries. In the case just mentioned it was ruled that the water boundary, though run by course and distance, would be controlled by the actual course of the shore, and would pass the right to the property of low water mark.

Upon the reasoning hereinbefore declared, and upon the authorities cited, to which others might be added, we are of the opinion that the patent from the State of Virginia, of the date of July 29, 1851, was unwarranted and illegal, as having embraced within it lands which were not waste and unappropriated, but which had been previously granted by competent authority, and long in the possession of the patentee and those claiming title under him. We are further of the opinion that the construction of the circuit court in relation to the character and effect of the elder and junior grants of the land in controversy was correct, and that its decision should therefore be, as it is hereby affirmed, with costs.

THE CITY BANK OF COLUMBUS.

Cashier of bank, when cannot create agency for bank—authority of.

A letter written by the cashier of a Bank, that the bearer was authorized to contract, on behalf of the Bank, for the transfer of money from the East to the South or West for the government does not come within his duties or authority as cashier, and does not bind the Bank.

The ordinary duties of cashiers of banks do not comprehend a contract which involves the payment of money, made by a cashier, without an express delegation of power from a board of directors to do so, unless it has been loaned in the usual way.

Nor can a cashier create an agency for a bank which he had not been authorized to make by those to whom has been confided the power to manage its business, both ordinary and extraordinary.

Argued Jan. 27, 1859. Decided Feb. 14, 1859.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Ohio.

This action was brought in the court below by the plaintiffs in error, to recover the sum of $100,000. The trial of the cause in the said court having resulted in a verdict and judgment in favor of the defendant, the plaintiffs sued out this writ of error.

The facts of the case are more fully stated by the court.

Mr. J. S. Black, Atty-Gen., and Mr. Hull, for the plaintiffs in error.

Mr. Henry Stanberry, for defendant in error:

The first inquiry is as to the power of the Cashier, in virtue of his office, to make such a contract as the one in question, or rather to authorize another to make it.

The powers and duties of a bank cashier have been more than once considered and defined by this court.

In Fleckner v. Bank of the U. S., 8 Wheat., 360, the powers of a cashier are very fully stated, and it is said that he is intrusted with the funds and securities; that he is authorized to receive and pay debts; to draw checks on other banks, and indorse the negotiable securities. In Bank of U. S. v. Dunn, 6 Pet., 59, the court say: The agreement was not made with those persons who have power to bind the bank in such cases. It is not the duty of the president or cashier to make such contracts, nor have they power to bind the bank except in the discharge of their ordinary duties. All discounts are made under the authority of the directors, and it is for them to fix any conditions which may be proper in loaning money."

See, also, Kirk v. Bell, 12 Eng. L. & Eq., 389; Hoyt v. Thompson, 5 N. Y., 332.

It is stated in the record that the City Bank is a Corporation formed under the Bank Act of Ohio of 1845.

Ohio Stats., Vol. XLIII., p. 24.

The 49th section of the Act provides that "the affairs of every company formed and organized to carry on the business of banking under the provisions of this Act, shall be managed by not less than five nor by more than nine, directors."

See, also, the 56th and 67th sections of the same Act, and the case of Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 13 Pet., 587.

Upon these authorities and this carefully guarded charter, it is impossible to maintain that such a contract as we have here was within the power of the cashier.

In the first place, it would be a matter of grave consideration and very proper for the deliberate judgment of the Board of Directors, to enter into any pecuniary liability to the United States, subjecting the Bank, it might be to the serious consequences which attach, on the footing of priority of warrants from the Treasury Department, for delinquency in meeting an engagement touching the public money. So, too, the magnitude of the sum, the distant point of payment, the uncertainties and fluctuations in the rates of exchange, the place of making the contract, the place of its performance both without the State in which the Bank was situated, the danger of violating the charter, and the amount of debt incurred, all these considerations demand the supervision of a managing element of the Corporation.

2. The provisions of the charter do not enlarge the usual powers incidental to the office. As to the by-law, it specifically limits the powers of the Cashier to the transaction of "the ordinary business of the bank," and carefully excludes "any discount negotiation or contract."

3. The only effect of the letter of the Cashier being copied into the letter book would be, to raise a presumption of knowledge on the part of the directors; but as it was proved that it was not the usage of bank directors to inspect the letter book no such presumption is raised.

4. The knowledge of Miner, one of the directors, does not bind the Bank in a matter which requires the knowledge and sanction of the Board.

5. It may be argued that the letter of Moodie purports to be a certificate that Minor was duly authorized by the Bank; and as the Cashier is the certifying officer of the acts of the Board, the Bank is estopped from denying the truth of this certificate.

But this letter contains no certificate of an authority given by the Board; but if it did, the Bank would not be bound. The principal is not liable, where the agent clothes his unauthorized act with a false representation of authority.

This subject is well discussed in The Mechanic's Bank v. The N. Y. & N. H. R. R. Co., 3 N. Y., 636.

There was no error in the charge of the court whether we consider the authority of the Cashier as depending on the nature of his office, or the provisions of the charter.

This Cashier had no power to constitute the agency of Minor, or to bind the Bank in the premises.

Mr. Justice Wayne delivered the opinion of the court:

The only question arising on this record is, whether the court erred in so much of the charge to the jury as is set out in the bill of exceptions. Objections were taken in the course of the trial to testimony, but no exceptions were taken to the rulings of the court upon them. The declaration in the case contained two counts—one of them alleging that a contract had been made between the City Bank of Columbus and the United States, by which the Bank agreed, on the 1st November, 1856, to transfer $100,000 of the public money from New York to New Orleans by the 1st of January, 1851, free of charge; and the other account for money had and received by the Bank for the use of the United States.

The charge given by the court was confined to the first count. The bill of exceptions sets out the following evidence, which was introduced by the United States to show a contract with the Bank.

The following letter was written by the Cashier of the Bank:

CITY BANK OF COLUMBUS,
COLUMBUS, OHIO, 26th October, 1850.

SIR: The bearer, Colonel William Miner, a director of this Bank, is authorized, on behalf of this institution, to make proposals for the purchase of United States stocks to the amount of one hundred thousand dollars. He is also authorized, if consistent with the rules of the Treasury Department, to contract, on behalf of this institution, for the transfer of money from the East to the South or West, for the Government.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant, THOMAS MOODIE, Cashier.

HON. THOMAS CORWIN,
Secretary of the Treasury, Washington City.

This letter was presented by Mr. Miner to Mr. Corwin on the 1st of November, 1850. On the same day, Mr. Corwin wrote to Mr. Miner the following letter:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, November 1, 1850.

SIR: Your proposition of this vate, to transfer $100,000 from New York or Philadelphia to New Orleans, by the first January next, free of charge to the Department, is accepted. You will receive herewith a transfer draft on the Assistant Treasurer at New York, in favor of the Assistant Treasurer at New Orleans, for $100,000, with the authority indorsed to make the payment at New York to you.

I am, very respectfully,
THOMAS CORWIN, Secretary.

This was followed by an undertaking for the transfer of $100,000 for the Government from New York to New Orleans:

WASHINGTON CITY, November 1, 1850.

This will certify that I have contracted with the United States Treasury, as the agent of the City Bank of Columbus, to transfer $100,000 from New York to New Orleans, to be deposited in the Treasury at the latter named city by the first day of January, 1851, free of charge. I have, in pursuance of said contract, this day received a draft in my own hand for one hundred thousand dollars on the United States Treasury at New York City, which is to be accounted for in said contract.

WILLIAM MINER.

Miner received the draft, and cashed it in person on the 2d November, 1850; but what he did with it no one knows, or this record does not show. It is certain that it was not repaid in New Orleans according to the contract; and there are no proofs on this record which can raise a presumption that the Bank of Columbus ever received a dollar of it. There is proof that Miner was all that time a director of the Bank, and that Moodie, who gave him the letter to the Secretary of the Treasury, was the cashier, and that he signed his name to the letter as cashier, and that the letter had been copied into the letter book of the Bank. A by-law of the Bank was also put in proof, to show that it might be inferred from it that he had authority, as cashier, to empower Mr. Miner, as a director of the Bank, to enter into such a contract as he had made with the Secretary of the Treasury. The by-law is: "A committee of two shall be appointed every six months to advise with the president and cashier. In their absence, all the ordinary business of the bank may be done by the president and cashier; and if either of them be not present, then by the other alone; but any discount, negotiation or contract, whether made by the board or committee, is to be done by the consent of all present."

It was also shown that there had not been a meeting of the directors in either July or August, 1850. That there had been a meeting on the 21st September, 1850, and another November 4th, 1850, nine days before the cashier gave his letter to Miner, and three days after the date of Miner's contract, to transfer the money from New York to New Orleans. The minutes of the Bank, as kept by the cashier, of the meetings of the directors, do not show any intention upon the part of the directors to enter into a contract for the purpose of buying stock of the United States, or for the transmission of the money of the United States from the East to the South or West, as Moodie expresses it in his letter; or that after the negotiation of Miner, and his receiving the money from the Assistant Treasurer in New York, that the directors or president of the Bank had any knowledge of the transaction until after Miner's default to pay the amount at New Orleans. Moodie testifies that he wrote the letter of the 26th of October, 1850, for Miner to negotiate with the Secretary of the Treasury, without the knowledge of the president or any of the directors of the Bank, except Miner himself; and that the fact that such a letter had been written was not communicated by him to any of the directors until January after, though he had caused a copy of it to be put in the letter book. All of the directors, at the time of the transaction, have sworn that Moodie had not been authorized by the board or by any of themselves to constitute Miner such agent; that they had no knowledge of Moodie's letter, and that they never sanctioned the same. And there is other testimony in the case, that Moodie, as cashier, had not the power to depute Miner for any such purpose, and that it would not have been done but by a resolution of the board of directors. Upon this evidence, and some other which it is not material to notice, the court charged the jury. After they had retired, and consulted for some time, they came into court and asked for further instructions, and the court gave them the following charge in reference to the contract set out in the first count of the declaration: "That if they should find that the letter written by Moodie was his own act, and had been given without the knowledge or authority of the board of directors, or any of them individually, except Miner, and that the agency of Miner was not constituted by or known to the board of directors, or the directors individually, or any of them except Miner, but was the act of the cashier alone; and if they should find that Moodie had no power as cashier, except such as belonged to the office of cashier generally, or such as are given by the charter or by the by-law or other law or usage of the said Bank, that the defendant was not concluded by that letter, and is not bound by the contract made by Miner, without some subsequent ratification of the same, though the Secretary had, in contracting with Miner, relied upon it as the act of the Bank."

To this charge the plaintiff excepted, and, on account of that exception alone, the case has been brought to this court by writ of error. In our opinion, no charge could have been more comprehensive of the merits of the case, more precise in its application to the particulars of the testimony introduced by the plaintiff and the defendant, or more expressive of what the law is upon such a state of facts. It is all that the litigants could have expected, and is liberal to both. It is also in coincidence with the views generally entertained of the powers and duties of the cashiers of banks, by those most familiar with the management and business of banks, and perfectly so with such as have been expressed by this court in previous reported cases. In Fleckner v. The Bank of the United States, 8 Wheat., 338, 356, 357, this court said, the charter authorizes the president and directors to appoint a cashier and other officers of the Bank, and gives the president and directors, or a majority of them, full power and authority to make all such rules and regulations for the government of the affairs and conducting the business of said Bank, as shall not be contrary to the Act of Incorporation. It contains no regulations as to the duties of cashiers; with the directors it would rest to fix the duties of cashier or other officers. Whether they have made any regulation upon this subject, does not appear; but the acts of the cashier, done in the ordinary course of the business actually confided to such an officer, may well be deemed prima facie evidence that they fell within the scope of his duty. In the case of Bank of the United States v. Dunn, 6 Pet., 51, the court would not permit the president and cashier of the Bank to bind it by their agreement with the indorser of a promissory note, that he should not be liable on his indorsement. It said it is not the duty of the cashier and president to make such contracts, nor have they power to bind the Bank, except in the discharge of their ordinary duties. All discounts are made under the authority of the directors, and it is for them to fix any conditions which they may think proper in loaning money. The court defines the cashier of the Bank to be an executive officer, by whom its debts are received and paid, and its securities taken and transferred, and that his acts, to be binding upon a bank, must be done within the ordinary course of his duties. His ordinary duties are to keep all the funds of the Bank, its notes, bills, and other choses in action, to be used from time to time for the ordinary and extraordinary exigencies of the Bank. He usually receives directly, or through the subordinate officers of the Bank, all moneys and notes of the Bank, delivers up all discounted notes and other securities when they have been paid, draws checks to withdraw the funds of the Bank where they have been deposited, and, as the executive officer of the Bank, transacts most of its business.

The term "ordinary business," with direct reference to the duties of cashiers of banks, occurs frequently in English cases, and in the reports of the decisions of our state courts, and in no one of them has it been judicially allowed to comprehend a contract made by a cashier, without an express delegation of power from a board of directors to do so, which involves the payment of money, unless it be such as has been loaned in the usual and customary way. Nor has it ever been decided that a cashier could purchase or sell the property, or create an agency of any kind for a bank which he had not been authorized to make by those to whom has been confided the power to manage its business, both ordinary and extraordinary. The case of Kirk v. Bell, 71 Eng. C. L. Rep., 389, and that of Hoyt v. Thompson, 5 N. Y., 320, were very appropriately cited by the counsel of the appellee, in this connection; and we think the safe rule in all instances of acts done by the officers of corporate companies, or by those who have the management of their business, from which contracts are alleged to have been made, is, to test that fact by an inquiry into the corporate ability which has been given them and to their subordinate officers, or which the directors of the company can confer upon the latter to act for them. Such was the view of this court when it decided, in the case of The Bank of the United States v. Dunn, 6 Pet., 51, that a release given by its president and cashier to the indorser of a promissory note of his liability upon it, did not bind the Bank, neither nor both having any authority to make contracts of that kind. The case before us is one in which a cashier acts alone, and in which he testifies that he did so without any consultation with the president or directors of the Company, and of which they had no information from him of the transaction until after the failure of Miner to pay the money in New Orleans. The Act under which the City Bank of Columbus became a Corporation does not, in any part of it, give any power to a cashier to act independently of the directors. No specific power is given to the directors to appoint a cashier. In the general power given to the directors to appoint officers to do the ordinary business of the Bank, they have an authority to appoint a cashier, and such an appointment is a limitation of that officer's executive function in doing the business of the Bank. It cannot be pretended that the directors, as a whole, or any one of them, except Miner, consented to the Cashier's designation of Miner for any such purpose as was concluded between them, to induce the Secretary to believe that Miner was the agent of the Bank, either to buy stock of the United States or enter into contracts for the transmission of money, free of charge, to those posts where the United States should designate it to be put. Such a power in the Secretary of the Treasury is a necessary one for the transaction of the business of the Government, pervading, as it does, every part of the country. The exercise of it, however, requires great care and caution in the selection of agents for such a purpose, and no authority short of the most certain should be taken to establish the representative character of any one for a private company or corporation to enter into such a contract with the Secretary.

The United States, as plaintiff in this action, has failed to establish the contract which it alleges in its declaration had been made with the City Bank of Columbus, for the transmission of money; and we direct the judgment, given in the court below, to be affirmed.

FRANCIS MARTIN, Administrator of DENNIS T. DONOVAN, Deceased, Plff. in Er.,

v.

CHRISTIAN IHMSEN.

(See S. C., 21 How., 394-397.)

In Louisiana, assignee of account, may sue in his own name—novelty in practice—proceedings in state court, when interruption to prescription.

In Louisiana, by the rule of the civil law, the equitable owner of an account can sustain suit in his own name; and assignments to prove his title may be received in evidence.

Where the District Judge refused to sign and seal a bill of exceptions six months after trial, but signed a bill of exceptions taken to his decision refusing to sign one: this is a novelty in practice which requires no notice.

The proceedings in the Fourth District Court were an interruption of the prescription pleaded within the 3484th and 3485th sections of the Civil Code of Louisiana.

Argued Jan. 25, 1859. Decided Feb. 14, 1859.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Louisiana.

This case arose on a petition filed in the court below, by the defendant in error, to recover the balance of accounts alleged to be due from the defendant below to the firm of Owen & Ihmsen.

The case was tried without a jury, and resulted in a judgment in favor of the petitioner for $20,148.50, with interest and costs; whereupon the defendant brought the case here on a writ of error.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Mr. R. H. Gillet, for plaintiff in error:

1. The evidence of Richards concerning plaintiff's accounts was illegal, and ought to be rejected.

Church v. Hubbart, 2 Cranch, 187; Smith v. Carrington, 4 Cranch, 62; McLanahan v. Universal Ins. Co., 1 Pet., 170; Arthurs v. Hart, 17 How., 6.

2. The papers purporting to be an assignment of the demand in question from C. and F. R. Lorenz and J. J. Gray to the plaintiff were improperly admitted in evidence.

(a) No such transfer was alleged in the petition.

(b) The laws of Pennsylvania did not authorize the administrators of Frederick Lorenz to sell and convey a demand contracted in Louisiana against a resident there, so as to authorize the purchaser to sue in the latter State.

Dixon v. Ramsay, 3 Cranch, 319; Kerr v. Moon, 9 Wheat., 565; Vaughan v. Northrup, 15 Pet., 1; Fenwick v. Sears, 1 Cranch, 259.

3. There is no sufficient evidence that Owen and Ihmsen ever assigned the demand in question to Frederick Lorenz.

La. Code, arts. 2418, 2414, 1758, 1759, 1792.

4. The court erred in refusing to prepare and report a statement of the facts proved in this cause.

U. S. v. King, 7 How., 833, 844; La. Code Pr., 602, 603; Weems v. George, 13 How., 190.

5. The demand in question was barred by the Statute of Limitations.

La. Sess. Laws, pp. 90, 91, 5th March, 1853; the Act of March 14, 1848; Bank of Alabama v. Dalton, 9 How., 522.

Mr. J. P. Benjamin, for defendant in error:

The allegation in the petition, that the plaintiff below was "transferee of Frederick Lorenz, who was transferee of Owen and Ihmsen," was sufficient under the practice of Louisiana.

McGrew v. Browder, 2 Mart. N. S., 17; Ory v. Winter, 4 Mart. N. S., 280; Childress v. Davis, 15 La., 492.

The objection that "it did not appear that by the laws of Pennsylvania the administrator had the right to make such transfer," is evidently an objection not to the admissibility, but to the effect of the instrument.

The next objection was, that the transfer from Owen and Ihmsen to Lorenz "was not signed by Lorenz, nor was there any proof that he had accepted the transfer."

We know of no rule of law which requires the assignment of a debt to be signed by the assignee. The refusal of the district judge to prepare a statement of facts after judgment cannot constitute error in the judgment so as to justify its reversal.

As to the plea of prescription:

1. The court below was satisfied, upon the proof, that plaintiff in error owed the whole amount, which he was condemned to pay.

2. The defendant in error had furnished satisfactory proof of his title to the debt.

3. The prescription was interrupted by a litigation, which was pending between the parties shortly before the present suit was instituted.

Mr. Justice Grier delivered the opinion of the court:

Donovan was defendant below in an action for a balance of accounts, claimed as due by him to the firm of Owen & Ihmsen. This claim had been transferred by that firm to one Frederick Lorenz, and, after his death, transferred to Ihmsen, the plaintiff below.

The cause was tried, by consent of parties, without the intervention of a jury; consequently, the exceptions to the admission of testimony are irregular, and need not be particularly noticed. Besides, we can see no good ground of objection to the evidence of confessions and admissions of a party, consisting of accounts rendered in a former controversy on the same subject, before arbitrators. The award itself was not received by the court as evidence of the amount of debt due, because it had been set aside for some irregularity.

The objections to the admission of the paper showing the transfers of the account were equally without foundation. By the law of Pennsylvania, where these transfers were made, Ihmsen would have an equitable interest in the account; but in that State the mere equitable assignee of an account would not sue in his own name, such chose in action not being assignable at common law. There the suit would have been brought in the name of Owen & Ihmsen, the original creditors, for the use of Lorenz, Ihmsen, or any person holding the equitable right to the account. But in Louisiana, where, by the rule of the civil law, there is no such distinction between the legal and equitable title, Ihmsen, as equitable owner, could sustain the suit in his own name, and the assignments admitted to prove his title were properly received.

This case was tried at April Term, 1856. The president judge has reported his finding of the facts, and his judgment thereon. Some six months afterward, the defendants below made up a statement of facts (to which the plaintiff refused his assent) and presented it to the district judge, and demanded that he should seal a bill of exceptions. This the Judge properly refused to do, but signed a bill of exceptions taken to his decision refusing to sign one. This novelty in practice requires no further notice.

The only question of law arising on the facts of this case as reported by the court was on the plea of prescription. On this point, the court gave their opinion as follows:

"Without considering the questions whether the account in this case is an open account, within the meaning of the Statute of Louisiana, or whether the statute operates upon demands that were subsisting at its date, our conclusion is, that the proceedings in the fourth district court, relative to the award, were an interruption of that prescription. There was a suit pending between the parties, the present defendant being the plaintiff, which embraced a portion of the matter of this controversy. It was competent to the defendants, by instituting a demand in reconvention, to bring up the whole of the controversy for a settlement in that suit; and if that had been done, a legal interruption would have resulted within the 3484th, 3485th sections of the Civil Code. Driggs v. Morgan, 10 Rob., 120. This was not formally done on the record, but the parties did, by consent, that which we are bound to consider as having an equivalent value.

"They came to an agreement that arbitrators selected by them should have the power to decide who was the creditor of the contesting parties, to settle finally ('without appeal') the amount due on either part, and that the attorney of either party might move for judgment on this award. It is clear, that had the arbitrators proceeded regularly, and a judgment been rendered upon it, that no exception could have been taken to the condition of the pleadings in the pending suit, or that there had not been a demand in reconvention. The consent in the submission agreement implied a waiver of all pleadings of that nature, and was a release of all errors in the preliminary stages of the suit. Donovan appeared in the district court, and successfully resisted a motion for judgment upon the award rendered. But the Code does not require that a suit should be successfully prosecuted to operate as an interruption of prescription. Trop. de Pres., sec. 561; Dunn v. Kinney, 11 Rob., 249; Badon v. Bahan, 4 La. Ann., 468."

We see no error in this statement of the law, and consequently affirm the judgment with costs.

MICHAEL C. NYE.

Sutter's "general title"—not valid—abrogated—copy given after abdication of Micheltorena, conferred no title.

Micheltorena, Governor of California, while confined to his capital by forces of insurgents, who were determined to drive him from the country, issued a decree by which he conferred upon citizens who had solicited lands, the property of the lands designated in their respective applications, and who had obtained the favorable informe of said Sutter, authorizing Sutter to give them hereafter a copy thereof, to serve them for a formal title, to present to the Government in order to extend the title in due form. Such decree was sent to Sutter to enable him to raise a military force to assist the Governor, and was known as Sutter's "general title."

Held, that the decree had no signification except as an appeal to Sutter and the persons under his influence, to come to the Governor's relief, and a promise to them that he would give them the land in case of their assistance so that he was successful;

Also held, that the power given Sutter was abrogated when Micheltorena was compelled to abdicate and leave the country.

And that a copy of such decree given by Sutter to claimant more than a year after the abdication of Micheltorena conferred no title to land.

Argued, Jan. 17, 1859. Decided Feb. 14, 1859.

APPEAL from the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of California.

This case arose upon a petition filed before the Board of Land Commissioners in California, by the appellee, for the confirmation of a claim for four leagues of land.

The said Commissioners entered a decree of confirming said claim. The District Court of the United States for the Northern District of California, having affirmed this decree, on appeal, the United States took an appeal to this court.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Mr. J. S. Black, Atty.-Gen., and Mr. Hull, for the appellants.

Messrs. C. Benham, H. H. Hawes and A. Felch, for appellee.

Mr. Justice Campbell delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellee claimed, before the Board of Commissioners for the settlement of land claims in California, four leagues of land, called "Wylly," situate on the Sacramento River and the Arroyo de los Venados. His evidence consists of a petition addressed to Micheltorena, Mexican Governor of the Department of Californias, in December, 1843, at Monterey, representing that he was a native of the United States; that he had resided in Mexico two years; that he had some horses and cattle, and desired to possess a suitable place for them. The Governor referred this petition to the Secretary, Jimeno, to obtain the proper information on the subject. The Secretary referred the petition to Senor Sutter, Comisionier (encargado) of the frontier of the Sacramento. Sutter certifies on this reference, that the land is now unoccupied. His certificate is dated 29th January, 1844. There is no evidence to show that these papers were returned to Micheltorena, or that he ever saw the certificate. They are produced by the claimant.

The remainder of his evidence consist of what is termed in the opinion of the Board, "Sutter's general title," which bears date the 22d December, 1844, and is as follows:

"Manuel Micheltorena, Brigadier-General of the Mexican Army, Adjutant-General of The Plana Mayor, Governor, Commandant General, and Inspector of the Department of the Californias.

The Supreme Departmental Government being unable, in consequence of its incessant occupations, to draw up, one by one, the respective title papers (titulos) for those citizens who have solicited lands, with informe in their favor of Mr. Augustus Sutter, captain and judge charged with the jurisdiction of New Helvetia and Sacramento:

In the name of the Mexican nation, I do by these letters confer upon them and their families the property of the lands designated in their respective applications (instancias) and maps (disenos), upon all and each one who have solicited (the same) and obtained the favorable informe of the aforesaid Mr. Sutter, up to the day of this date—so that nobody shall have power to question their right of property, a copy hereof, which Mr. Sutter shall hereafter give them, serving them for a formal title, with which they will present themselves to this Government, in order to extend the same title in due form and on stamped paper.

And that it may remain firm and stable in all time, I give this document, which shall be recognized and respected by all the authorities, civil and military, of the Mexican Nation, in this and the other departments, authenticated with the military and governmental seals in Monterey, this twenty-second day of December, one thousand eight hundred and forty-four. MICHELTORENA.

I certify this is a copy.

New Helvetia, June 8th, 1846.

J. A. SUTTER."

The circumstances under which this order was executed appear from a deposition of Sutter to be found in the record. He says: "That this document was delivered to him at his request. That the Governor was blockaded at Monterey, and would not deliver titles to the American and other immigrants who were desirous of obtaining lands, and he (Sutter) advised him to give them titles at once; and that the Governor had not time to do it in any other way. He never knew that the Governor was blockaded until the courier came with the paper above referred to." He further testifies that the mode he had adopted in giving titles to individual settlers was, to deliver certified copies of this decree of Micheltorena to those who had rendered meritorious services to the country, and who applied to him. That Governor Micheltorena, at his request, made a speech to the soldiers, and promised lands to all those whom he (Sutter) should recommend as worthy to receive them. The general title was issued before the men marched from New Helvetia. He testfies that the lands were never measured, and there was no formal delivery of possession. There were no surveyors or means of measurement. We have examined with particularity the Mexican laws of colonization in the case of The United States v. John A. Sutter, at this term, and it is not necessary to do so in this case. It is evident that this "general title" had no reference to those laws, as none of their requirements were considered when it was made. It is questionable whether the previous application of the claimant was before the governor, or under the control of his subordinates, at its date. The general title was sent to Sutter, to enable him to raise a military force to assist the governor, who was confined to his capital by the forces of the insurgent chiefs, who had determined to expel him from the country. His ability to comply with the expectations it encouraged depended upon the success of his efforts to maintain his authority in the department, and to secure the sanction of the Supreme Government to the extraordinary measures he had adopted for that purpose. The decree has no signification except as an appeal to Sutter, and the persons under his influence, to come to his relief, and as a promise to them that he would make a liberal distribution of land among them, in case they should faithfully and successfully assist him in his extremity. But the issue of the war was fatal to Micheltorena, who was compelled to leave the country; and Sutter, his lieutenant and partisan, was made prisoner, and was required to abandon his chief, and to promise fidelity to his enemies. Whatever power was conferred upon Sutter was abrogated then, if not before. The execution of the power conferred, if any, in favor of this claimant, did not take place for more than a year after the abdication of Micheltorena.

The opinion of the court is, that the claim of the appellee is invalid, and the decree of the District Court is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to that court to dismiss the petition.

THE UNITED STATES, Appt.,

v.

NATHANIEL BASSETT.

(See S. C., 21 How., 412-414.)

Sutter's "general title," invalid—copy of, conferred no title.

The decision of United States v. Nye, ante, p. 135, affirmed.

The decree or promise of Micheltorena to Sutter and through Sutter to the foreign volunteers, did not confer a title to any part of the public domain, nor perfect any incipient possession into a vested interest. A copy of such "general title" given by Sutter nearly fifteen months after the defeat and abdication of Micheltorena, had no validity and conferred no title to land.

Argued Jan. 18, 1859. Decided Feb. 14, 1859.

APPEAL from the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of California.

This case arose upon a petition filed before the Board of Land Commissioners, in California, by the appellee, for the confirmation of a claim to four square leagues of land.

The Board entered a decree confirming the claim. The District Court of the United States for the Northern District of California having affirmed this decree, on appeal, the United States took an appeal to this court.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Mr. J. S. Black, Atty. Gen., and Mr. Hull, for appellants.

Messrs. M. Blair and V. E. Howard, for appellee.

Mr. Justice Campbell delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellee submitted to the Board of Commissioners appointed under the Act of Congress of the 3d of March, 1851 (9 Stat. at L., 632, ch. 41), to settle private land claims in California, a claim for four squares leagues of land in the valley of the Sacramento River, called "Las Colussas," as the assignee of John Danbenbiss. His evidence consists of a petition of Danbenbiss to Micheltorena, Governor of California, dated in July, 1844, in which he describes himself as a native of Germany, but naturalized in Mexico, where he had resided two years, and that he desired a grant of this land to devote himself to agriculture. The Secretary, Jimeno, reported that the consideration of many petitions of the same nature had been postponed until after the governor had visited the country of the Sacramento and San Joaquin; and as he had no general map of the country to guide him in making grants, he suggested that this petition should be laid over with the others. The governor thereupon made an order that the petitioner might take possession, and deferred further action until he should visit the country; and returned the papers to the petitioner.

During the fall of 1844, a formidable insurrection against Micheltorena was maintained by some of the leading men in California, and in the month of December of that year he was beleaguered at Monterey. One of the principal grounds of complaint against him was an imputed disposition to strengthen the settlement of Sutter on the Sacramento by improvident grants to foreign emigrants.

While the governor was blockaded at Monterey, a courier was sent to Sutter, conveying the document known as Sutter's "general title," which is set out in the opinion of the court in the case of The United States v. Michael C. Nye, and by which Sutter was enabled to collect a body of "foreign volunteers," who went to the aid of the Governor. Danbenbiss was one of those who accompanied Sutter.

The forces of the rival chiefs met at Coahuanga the latter part of February, 1845, and, after a bloodless battle, Micheltorena consented to abdicate his office in a short time, and to leave the country. In June, 1846, Sutter gave to the petitioner (Danbenbiss) a certified copy of the "general grant," which was produced to the Board of Commissioners as the complement to the other evidence of title in favor of Danbenbiss. None of these documents are to found in the public archives. No trace of the evidence on which these titles depend is exhibited in any of the records of that State. The consideration on which they were made have no reference to the Colonization Laws of Mexico. The promises of Micheltorena to Sutter, and through Sutter to the foreign volunteers, did not confer a title to any part of the public domain, nor perfect any incipient pretension into a vested interest. The parties looked to the contingency of a suppression of the revolt and the maintenance of the power of the governor for the fulfillment of these promises. In this they were disappointed. The paper remained in the possession of Sutter for nearly fifteen months after the defeat and abdication of Micheltorena, before he gave a copy to Danbenbiss.

For these reasons, and others contained in the opinion of the court in the case of The United States v. Nye, it is the judgment of the court that the claim presented by the appellee is invalid.

The decree of the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of California is reversed, and the cause remanded to that court, with directions to that court to dismiss the petition.

JOHN PEMBERTON, Liquidator of the MERCHANTS' INSURANCE COMPANY, Appt.,

v.

EDWARD LOCKETT, JAMES G. BERRET AND HENRY D. JOHNSON.

(See S. C., 21 How., 257-266.)

Construction of contract with attorneys to prosecute government claim.

An agreement by defendant to pay plaintiffs, his attorneys' one half of all moneys recovered for the value of slaves freed at Nassau, for their services in prosecuting such claim; held, to have reference to the solicitation of the claims before allowance by the Government at Washington.

And held that the transfer of this claim to the commission appointed between Great Britain and the United States put an end to the agreement.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Columbia.

This suit was brought in the court below by the appellees, to recover as for a specific lien, certain compensation claimed for prosecuting an international reclamation.

The court below decreed that Pemberton should pay $14,230, less 5 per cent. of the money awarded to him, together with interest thereon from June 20, 1855, and costs, to the complainant, one third part to each or to their solicitor, &c.

The facts of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. H. May, R. J. Brent and Reverdy Johnson, for the appellant:

The appellant maintains that the decree of the court below should be reversed for the following reasons:

1. That the said Pemberton had no power as liquidator to make said agreement to pay any part of said claim, or the fruits thereof, to the defendants in error.

La. Code, 2966, 2967.

An agent under general power cannot sell. Steer v. Ward, 10 Mart., 679; Adams v. Gainard, 7 Mart. N. S., 246; Hill v. Barlow, 6

Rob. La., 142; Cuny v. Robert, 16 La., 175; Smith v. McMicken, 12 Rob. La., 653

The decree of the court below binds the fund, as if a specific lien upon it was created by the contract. No equitable lien is shown.

2. The agreement was to compensate for services to be rendered in Washington City, and limited to that place. All the services claimed for, are said to have been rendered in London. The contract may be explained by "the circumstances of the transaction, so as to apply it to its proper subject-matter."

Bradley v. Steamboat Co., 13 Pet., 99.

3. It was a personal contract for the joint services of the appellees, and was expressly abandoned by two of them. It was, however, to be performed by all or none; the obligation was not several.

Pars. Cont., 11, 12; 4 Mart., 78; 2 Barn. & Ad., 307; Sample v. Lamb, 2 La., 275.

4. The agreement is void for maintenance.

5. It was a contract against public policy. The Executive Departments of the Government or the legislation of Congress ought not to be exposed to the influences of paid friends or agents. All that could be done at Washington to advance the appellant's claim, was to be done by the executive officers of the Government.

Marshall v. B. & O. R. R. Co., 16 How., 314; 2 Story, Eq., secs. 293, 294; Wildey v. Collier, 7 Md., 279.

Nor could the services of defendant be performed at London.

10 Stat. at L., p. 99, art. 2.

6. The contract was not performed.

Two of them say they committed the management of it to the third, Johnson, and there is an utter failure of evidence to show that any or all of them together rendered any services whatever at Washington, "in the prosecution of said claim."

The counsel further reviewed the evidence on this point and said: The consideration for this contract was partly executed and partly executory, as shown on its face. In such case the failure to perform the executory part of the consideration, is a default which prevents any recovery on the contract, because it is but one entire consideration.

7. If there was a performance of the contract, it was done only by said Johnson, and if the contract be apportioned, he only is entitled to compensation, and therefore the joint bill should be dismissed.

8. The decree is erroneous in requiring Pemberton to pay interest on the amount decreed, when he has not enjoyed the use of the money.

Messrs. Jos. H. Bradley and John L. Hayes, for appellees:

In the instrument in question, there is no limitation of time during which the services of complainants were to be rendered—no limitation of places where the services should be performed—no condition as to the mode in which the claim should be prosecuted. The sole condition of compensation was, that the complainants should "use their best exertions in the prosecution of said claim."

2. The appellant was authorized to execute the instrument in question. In his contract and elsewhere, he styles himself as liquidator, &c. As such, he has defended and appealed this suit. If he was not authorized, his acts have been fraudulent and wrongful, and he cannot take advantage of his own wrong.

Fletcher v. Peck, 6 Cranch, 88.

3. This contract has not been rescinded, either by the acts of the parties, the operation of law, or a change of circumstances rendering it impossible to be carried into effect.

1st. It has not been rescinded by the acts of the parties. The rights of the appellees growing out of this contract could not be annulled, except by a mutual contract as final and definite as the one by which they acquired their rights. The two letters received from the appellant, one from Lockett and one from Johnson, have no effect in varying the original contract. They were never replied to by the appellant. There is nothing in Lockett's letter showing a disposition to relinquish his interest in the claim. There is no intimation from Mr. Berret of a disposition to decline or assign his interest. It is evident that Johnson had no such purpose, from the facts in evidence.

2d. The contract was not rescinded or annulled by any change of circumstances rendering it impossible to be carried into effect.

The appellees deny the allegation in the answer, that compensation was agreed upon in the event of a recovery of the claim against the United States. No such condition is expressed or implied in the contract. The appellees also deny the allegations in the answer, that the contract was entered into for services to be performed in Washington City, and that the provision in the convention allowing each government to name one person to attend the Commissioners as agent on its behalf, "put an end to the contract, so that complainants had no longer any right to recover thereon." No such conditions are found in the agreement.

The most important work, the preparation of evidence, could only be done in the United States. The appellees were employed several weeks in obtaining testimony from the departments in Washington. The Convention provided that the claim should be heard upon such evidence or information as shall be furnished by or on behalf of their respective governments.

Decisions of Commission of Claims, p. 9.

The appointment of an agent on behalf of the United States, did not dispense with the necessity for employing associate counsel. Such counsel were frequently associated with the agent of the United States.

Decisions of the Commission, pp. 16, 18, 29, 41, &c.

There was no necessity for employing English counsel, as is alleged, as the case was not before an English court, but a joint commission.

4. The contract and agreement is not contrary to law.

1st. It is not void for champerty or maintenance.

Bayard v McLean, 8 Del., 189, 217; 8 Cow., 646; 4 D. & E., 341.

Champerty and maintenance exist only in proceedings in suits at law.

4 Bl. Com., 135.

Moreover, there were no agreements here on the part of the alleged champertor, to carry on the parties' suit at his own expense.

2d. The agreement is not void as a contract to do an act inconsistent with public policy.

In the case of Marshall v. The B. & O. R. R. Co., 16 How., 314, cited on the other side, there was an understanding that the agent should use corrupt means and influence. Contracts, precisely analogous to the present one, have been sanctioned by this court.

Wylie v. Coxe, 15 How., 417.

5. The appellees rendered the services implied in the contract.

Mr. Justice Nelson delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Columbia.

The bill was filed in the court below, by the respondents, against the appellant, Pemberton, liquidator of the Merchants' Insurance Company, in the City of New Orleans, representing the interest of that Company, which was insolvent, for the purpose of establishing a title to certain moneys in the possession of the government, which had been received under the Convention between the United States and Great Britain, of the 8th of February, 1853. The money had been awarded by the umpire, under that Convention, to the Company, which had been subrogated to the rights of one of the claimants for compensation against Great Britain, in the case of The Brig Creole. The umpire allowed to the Company $28,460. The complainants below set up, in their bill, a title to one half of this fund, as the agents and attorneys of Pemberton in the prosecution of the claim.

The right rests upon the following agreement, entered into between them and the defendant (Pemberton) at New Orleans, dated the 23d of December, 1851:

"For and in consideration of services rendered, and to be rendered, by James G. Berret, Henry D. Johnson and E. Lockett, of Washington City, D. C., in the prosecution of our claims for the value of slaves freed at Nassau, N. P., which we had to pay for, we do hereby agree to allow to said Berret, Johnson and Lockett, their heirs or assigns, one half of any or all such sums of money, principal and interest, as may be recovered on account of our said losses, it being understood that the said Berret, Johnson and Lockett are to use their best exertions in the prosecution of said claim, and that no allowance whatever, as expenses or compensation for their services, is to be made by us to the said Berret, Johnson and Lockett, unless our said claim shall be allowed, in whole or in part. Witness our hand and seal, at New Orleans, this 23d day of December, in the year of our Lord 185 ."

The claims referred to in this agreement originated as far back as the year 1841, in consequence of the unwarrantable interference of the public authorities at Nassau, in the Island of New Providence, one of the Bahama Islands, belonging to Great Britain, and liberating a cargo of slaves, who were on a voyage from Virginia to New Orleans, and who had mutinied, overcome the officer, and carried the vessel into that port.

The persons interested in the slaves, of which they were deprived by this interference, immediately appealed to their own Government for redress. A correspondence was opened between this Government and Great Britain on the subject, which continued down to the time of the Convention already mentioned, of the 8th of February, 1853.

This Convention provided for the appointment of a Board of Commissioners, one to be named by each Government, and the two to appoint an umpire, to decide upon all claims in which a difference of opinion should occur.

The Board sat in the City of London, and were bound, according to the terms of the Convention, to receive and peruse all written documents or statements which might be presented to them, by or on behalf of their respective Governments, in support of or in answer to any claim; and to hear, if required, one person on each side, in behalf of each Government, as counsel or agent for such Government, on each separate claim. Each Government appointed an agent to represent it before the Board; and, as we have said, the umpire allowed to the Insurance Company $28,460.

It is insisted, on behalf of the defendant (Pemberton), that this contract, entered into with complainants in 1851, had reference to the solicitation of claims before, and allowance by, the Government at the City of Washington; that they were employed as gentlemen residing at that place, engaged in business of this character; and that the Convention between the two Governments, the appointment of a Board of Commissioners, and prosecution of the claims against Great Britain before it, under the authority of the United States, put an end to the contract. Although its terms are general, and open to some difficulty as to the real meaning and intent of the parties, we are inclined to concur in this view of it. We think it could hardly have been within the contemplation of either of the parties, that the prosecution spoken of in the argument was a prosecution or solicitation of claims against the foreign Government, or in a tribunal sitting there, and before which this Government had taken upon itself the duty of the prosecution. We are satisfied these agents were under no obligation, according to the true intent of the agreement, to follow these claims to London, and prosecute them there; and if not, it is quite clear the transfer of them to the commission there put an end to the agreement. And this seems to have been the view taken of it by the parties themselves, as manifested by their conduct after the appointment of the commission.

By the 3d article of the Convention, the claims were to be presented before the Board within six months from the day of its first sitting, unless a good reason could be given for the delay. The Board first met in London on the 15th of September, 1853; and on the 15th of October it adopted rules and regulations in respect to the proceedings before it, and, among others, required all claims to be presented within six months from the 15th of September, the day of its first sitting.

Now, the first step taken by these complainants in behalf of the claims of Pemberton, under the Convention, was a letter written to him by Lockett, dated December 15, requesting that a power of attorney should be given to Johnson, to act for him before the commission. This was three months after the commencement of its sittings, and after half the period had expired within which the claims were required to be presented. It does not appear that this letter was answered by Pemberton.

The next step taken was a letter from Johnson himself, dated at Washington, 22d of March, 1854, in which he announces that he had prepared a memorial on behalf of the claims of the Insurance Company, and was ready to forward it to the Commissioners, in London. This was seven days after the expiration of the six months.

In the meantime, Pemberton had employed agents residing in London to attend to his claims, and who, it appears, had the charge and management of the business until the close of the commission.

What is very material, also, in this letter of Johnson of the 22d of March, he there states, in respect to the situation of his two associates, as an inducement to Pemberton to give him, individually, the power of attorney—that Lockett is absent, and that Berret was unable to attend to the business, having been appointed postmaster of the city; and then proposes to conduct the business himself alone, for the compensation of twenty-five per centum of the money recovered, the half only of what is now claimed under the agreement of 1851. It does not appear that any answer was returned to this letter, doubtless for the reason that other agents had already been employed.

It is true that Johnson drew up the memorial to the Commissioners, on behalf of Pemberton, as above mentioned, but without any authority from him, and swore to it, at Washington, on the 17th of April, 1854, in which he endeavored to explain the delay in presenting the claim; and forwarded the same from this country on the 29th of May following. But the subject had already been brought to the notice of the government agent, and before the Board of Commissioners, as early as the 23d of that month, by the agents of Pemberton in London. This memorial, therefore, was of no particular importance.

It appears from the report of the proceedings under the commission, and of its decisions, communicated to Congress by the President, 11th of August, 1856 (Senate Docs., Vol. XV., 1855, 1856), that there were six separate claimants, besides Pemberton, for compensation arising out of the case of The Creole, and all depending, substantially, upon the same facts. And there were, also, the cases of The Brig Enterprise and Schooner Hermosa, involving principles similar to those upon which the reclamation depended in the case of The Creole. All the parties whose claims arise out of the case of The Creole were equally interested in furnishing the proofs upon which the general claim against the British Government rested; and the three vessels were interested in common, as to the principles of international law that should govern the decision of the Board of Commissioners.

The government agent and Commissioners took this view of these several claims, and but one argument was made in all of them, and that in the case of The Brig Enterprise, and but one opinion delivered by the Commissioners. As they disagreed, a second argument was made before the umpire.

The preparation of the claim of Pemberton, beyond the proofs of the interest of his company in the case of The Creole, was a very trifling matter; and even these proofs had been already furnished to this government, at the time the appeal was made there for redress. And as it respects the questions of international law involved in these cases, they had been the subject of repeated discussion between this government and Great Britain, and also in Congress, by some of the most distinguished statesmen and jurists of the country; and the preparation for the argument of the claim before the Board of Commissioners required little else than the labor of digesting and reproducing the principles and reasoning to be found in these discussions.

For the reasons above given we are satisfied the agreement and proofs in the case furnish no legal or just ground for a claim to the sum of money awarded by the court below, and that the decree should be reversed, and the proceedings remitted, with directions to enter a decree dismissing the bill.

DICKERSON B. MOREHOUSE, Plff. in Er.,

v.

WILLIAM A. PHELPS.

Description of grantees in deed, what sufficient —in ejectment, plaintiff must show valid title, or defendant's possession will prevail—assignability of occupant claims under U. S.

Where a patent from the United States grants, "unto the representatives of G. and M., and to their heirs," the said lot above described, to have and to hold, unto the said representatives, and their heirs and assigns, forever, as tenants in common, extrinsic proof was admitted showing who were such representatives.

The patents having been made for the benefit of those who obtained the certificate of preemption, and paid for the land, are technically accurate.

A plaintiff in ejectment, where defendant is in possession, must show a valid legal title to authorize a recovery of the land by him.

Where no such title is shown, defendant's possession is sufficient for his protection.

Up to the date of the entry and purchase, the title was in the United States; behind which date the courts can uphold no deed of conveyance of the public lands, unless Congress has authorized assignments of occupant claims to be made.

Argued Feb. 10, 1859. Decided Mar. 7, 1859.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Illinois.

This was an action of ejectment, originally commenced in the Circuit Court of Jo. Daviess County, Illinois, by William A. Phelps against Bradner Smith, to recover possession of a certain tract of land. After having been once remanded by the Supreme Court of the State of Illinois, judgment was rendered in the Circuit Court in favor of the plaintiff.

Subsequently this judgment was vacated and a new trial ordered, and Dickenson B. Morehouse asked to be made defendant in the suit in the place of Smith, upon affidavit that he claimed the interest in the lot sued for in this case, as the administrator of one R. P. Guyard, and that as Dickenson B. Morehouse, he leased the same to the said defendant.

This motion was overruled, but Morehouse was permitted to come in as co-defendant with the defendant, his tenant.

After various proceedings in the Circuit Court, judgment was again rendered for the plaintiff.

Morehouse appealed to the Supreme Court of the State of Illinois, by which court the judgment of the Circuit Court was affirmed.

The case is now brought here by writ of error.

Among other evidence, the plaintiff offered and read to the jury, patents issued by the United States Government to the legal representatives of Robert P. Guyard and Dickenson B. Morehouse, for lots 8 and 9, being the premises in question.

The date of these patents was Jan. 1, 1846. The basis of the claim of plaintiff below was a transfer from Guyard to himself, of which the following is a copy:

MINERAL POINT, CRAWFORD COUNTY, MICHIGAN TERRITORY, Nov. 8, 1829.

TO CAPTAIN J. C. LEGATE, Supt. U. S. Lead Mines.

SIR: I have this day sold, transferred, and set over, and by these presents do grant, bargain, sell, transfer and set over unto William A. Phelps, his heirs and assigns, all my right, title, interest or claim whatsoever in and to the three lots of ground I own in the town of Galena, Jo. Daviess County, State of Illinois, situated on the Wharf Row, the number not recollected, supposed to be either lots, 4, 5 and 6, or 5, 6 and 7, bounded as follows:

On the east by Fever River; on the west by Main Street or a triangular square, and on the south by a lot granted to me in the spring of 1828, and sold by me to M. Denarett; and on the north, by a street, alley, or other lots.

The most southern of these three lots was granted by permit to myself in the spring of 1828; the other two adjoining were granted to John Ward and Nathaniel Johnson, one lot to each, and by them transferred to me, all of which is entered on record in the permit book.

Given under my hand and seal, this 8th of November, 1829.

R. P. GUYARD. [SEAL.]

Approved November 9, 1829.

The defendant, Morehouse, claimed in virtue of his own right and as administrator of Guyard.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. E. B. Washburne and Reverdy Johnson, for plaintiff in error:

The Congress of the United States by an Act approved Feb. 5, 1829, provided for the laying off of a town at and including Galena, Illinois, under the direction of the Surveyor-General for the States of Illinois, Missouri, and the Territory of Arkansas. The Act further provided that the lots should be classed, &c., and previous to their sale, "each and every person or his, her or their legal representative or representatives, who shall heretofore have obtained from the agent of the United States a permit to occupy any lot or lots in the said town of Galena, or who shall have actually occupied and improved any lot or lots in the said town, or within the tract of land hereby authorized to be laid off into lots, shall be permitted to purchase such lot or lots by paying therefor in cash," &c., being the certain amounts specified in the said Acts according to the class in which the same fell.

It not being practicable to carry this Act into effect, Congress, on the 2d day of July, 1836, passed an amendatory Act, by which it was further provided, &c.

"That all acts and duties required to be done and performed by the Surveyor of the States of Illinois and Missouri and the Territory of Arkansas, under the Act to which this is an amendment, shall be done and performed by a board of commissioners, of three in number, any two of whom shall form a quorum to do business; said commissioners to be appointed by the President of the United States, and shall, previous to their entering upon the discharge of their duties, take an oath or affirmation to perform the same faithfully and impartially."

And it was further enacted, "That the said commissioners shall also have power to hear evidence and determine all claims to lots of ground arising under the Act to which this is an amendment; and for this purpose the said commissioners are authorized to administer all oaths that may be necessary, and reduce to writing all the evidence in support of claims to preemption presented for consideration; and when all the testimony shall have been heard and considered, the said commissioners shall file with the Register and Receiver of the Land Office at Galena, the testimony in the case, together with a certificate in favor of each person having the right of preemption; and upon making payment to the Receiver at Galena for the lot or lots to which such person is entitled, the receiver shall grant a receipt therefor, and issue certificates of purchase to be transmitted to the General Land Office, as in other cases of the sale of public land."

While the Board of Commissioners constituted by the above Act, were sitting in the discharge of their duties, Dickenson B. Morehouse, for himself and as the administrator and legal representative of one Robert P. Guyard, went before the said Board, and filed a claim to a preemption to the lots, the title to which is involved in this suit. He adduced before the said Commissioners the requisite proofs to entitle him to an award of the preemption right for himself individually, and as the administrator of Guyard's estate. The said Commissioners granted him the preemption right as claimed, and issued to him the proper duplicate certificate, which entitled him, under the instructions of the General Land Office, to go to the Local Land Office and buy the lots from the government; all of which the said Morehouse did. For himself and as the administrator of Guyard, he paid the price fixed by law for the said lots into the Local Land Office at Galena, and received the proper duplicate Receiver's receipts therefor, and afterwards upon the surrender of the said receipts in accordance with the rule of the General Land Office he received the patents for the said lots. For himself and as the administrator as aforesaid, he has retained the possession of the said lots since 1838, and paid taxes upon them up to this time.

The right of preemption to those lots was never claimed by Phelps or by any person for him, before the said Commissioners, and neither Phelps nor any person for him, ever purchased the said lots from the Local Land Office.

The question arising in this court upon the record is, who is the "legal representative" of Guyard as to the lots in dispute, within the meaning of the Statutes of the United States. Phelps claims that he is, by virtue of the letter or instrument above set out; Morehouse claims that he is, as administrator of Guyard, he having made the claim to the lots before the Board of Commissioners, which claim was allowed, and, entered them at the Land Office. The Supreme Court of Illinois have held, that under these Statutes Phelps is the "legal representative" of Guyard. This question is presented in the instructions asked for by the attorneys for Phelps, and given by the court below, and in the instructions asked for by the attorney of Morehouse and refused by the court below.

The construction of the Statutes above referred to being drawn in question in this case, the Supreme Court of Illinois made the certificate as found in the record, page 62.

It is submitted that the term "legal representative," as used in the Act of Feb. 5, 1829, clearly contemplates only those representatives who file their claims before the Board of Commissioners and have them allowed. If one be a "representative," and he does not prefer his claim as such for confirmation, he is not regarded.

In Strother v. Lucas, 12 Pet., 458, the confirmation was deemed to be made to the person who made and proved his "claim" before the Board of Commissioners. To the same point, see Bissell v. Penrose, 8 How., 337. Instructions and Opinions of Attorney-General, part 2, pages, 747, 752, 1043; also, Boone v. Moore, 14 Mo., 424; 6 Pet., 772; 2 How., 284; 4 Gilman, 454; 12 Ill., 317; 15 Ill., 572; Land Laws, Vol. III., 316; 2 Bay, 426–454; 16 How., 63.

Whatever right Phelps might have had, it was only an inchoate right, to be perfected by making his claim before the Board of Commissioners and procuring their award upon satisfactory proofs, and then following it up by a purchase from the Land Office. He could do these things or he could abandon his supposed right. He did so abandon it. On the other hand, Morehouse, as the administrator of Guyard, made the claim before the Board of Commissioners, adduced his proofs, received their award, and then perfected the title by entering the lots, the possession of which he retained to this day. Under these circumstances it is insisted that Morehouse, as the administrator of Guyard, is the "legal representative" of said Guyard, within the true intent and meaning of the Act of Feb. 5, 1829, authorizing the laying off a town on Bear River, &c.

Mr. M. Blair, for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice Catron delivered the opinion of the court:

Phelps recovered of Morehouse the undivided moiety of lots Nos. 8 and 9 in the Town of Galena, in a State Circuit Court in Illinois, which judgment was affirmed in the Supreme Court of that State; and from this decision the cause is brought here on writ of error. We are now called on to re-examine the controversy to the extent that Acts of Congress, and the proceedings of officers acting under the authority of the United States, are drawn in question.

Phelps claims, through a paper addressed to the agent of the United States superintending the lead mines at Fever River; and this paper his counsel assumes to be a deed that conveys lands. It bears date November 8, 1829, and is from Guyard to Phelps, for a moiety of the lots in dispute.

The courts of Illinois held it to be an effective conveyance of title, and that, by force thereof, Phelps became "the legal representative" of Guyard within the intent and true construction of the patents made to the representatives of Guyard and Morehouse.

The Act of 1836 required that commissioners should hear and determine all claims to lots of which a preference of entry was sought, according to the Act of 1829; they had power conferred on them to administer oaths and take evidence, and were directed to reduce it to writing, in support of claims to preemptions presented for consideration; and, when all the testimony was heard and considered, they were to file with the Register and Receiver the whole testimony in the case (that is, in all the instances), together with a certificate in favor of each person having the right of preemption; and on payment being made to the Receiver by the person ascertained to be entitled, the Register was ordered to issue a certificate of purchase to him to whom the right of preemption had been adjudged; and the remaining lots were to be exposed to public sale.

It was the political power that was dealing with this property. Congress could award it either for a consideration, or confer it on any one that they desired should have it. The awards were made through a tribunal exercising the political power, and whose adjudications were conclusive of the right to purchase; nor had the courts of justice any jurisdiction to interfere.

Phelps did not come forward and prefer a claim to have a preemption allowed, and if Morehouse had not acquired this right, the land would have been sold at auction. Phelps would have then stood in the situation of all others claiming preferences of entry throughout the public domain, who fail to prove up their claims before the Register and Receiver, and permit the land to be sold at the public sales. He abandoned his preference, and allowed it to be forfeited—even conceding its original validity.

2. If Phelps has a legal title, he took it by the terms of the patents. The patent for No. 9 recites, that the legal representatives of Robert P.

Guyard and Dickerson B. Morehouse had deposited in the General Land Office the Register's certificate at the Land Office at Galena, that full payment had been made, by said legal representatives above named, for lot No. 9 (the boundary of which is described), and which lot had been purchased by said representatives of Guyard and Morehouse; and, in consideration of the premises, the United States have given and granted, and do give and grant, "unto the said representatives of Guyard and Morehouse, and to their heirs, the said lot above described; to have and to hold, unto the said representatives, and their heirs and assigns, forever, as tenants in common." The patent for lot No. 8 is in the same terms.

For the purpose of explaining who the grantees are, and that they were the purchasers, extrinsic proof was introduced in the state circuit court, to the end of establishing the fact that Morehouse, as administrator of Guyard, and on his own behalf, proved the joint occupancy of lots 8 and 9 before the Commissioners appointed to grant certificates of preemption under the Act of 1836; that Morehouse obtained certificates of preemption, filed them with the Register, paid the purchase money to the Receiver of the Land Office at Galena, took out his patent certificates, presented them at the General Land Office, and received the patents. The deed to Phelps was produced and recorded at Galena, June 18, 1847. Morehouse obtained his preemption certificates for lots Nos. 8 and 9, paid his money for them, and got his patent certificates February 20, 1838, and on the 1st day of January, 1846, the patents issued.

We feel confident, from the face of the patents, that they were made for the benefit of those who obtained the certificate of preemption, and paid for the land. Such, in our judgment, is the fair construction of the patents, and of the 2d section of the Act of 1836, on which they are founded. The patents, throughout, refer to those who bring the claim before the board, obtain the right of entry, pay the purchase money, and enter the land.

It was the duty of Morehouse, as administrator of Guyard, to make payment for the moiety of the lots Nos. 8 and 9, on behalf of the estate of Guyard, out of the personal property in the administrator's hands. Revised Statutes of Illinois, title Wills, sec. 107, adopted in 1836.

And by the 98th and 99th sections of said title, the administrator was empowered to convert the lands into personal assets for the payment of debts; the personal estate having proved insufficient.

The capacity of Morehouse to cause the entry to be made, depends on state laws, with which we have no power to deal in the present writ of error, further than to ascertain from them that Morehouse was, in his capacity of administrator, "the legal representative" of Guyard; and such we think he was, and that the patents are technically accurate.

As Phelps was plaintiff in the ejectment suit, and Morehouse in possession, it was imposed on Phelps to show a valid legal title to authorize a recovery of the land by him; and having no such title, Morehouse's possessions was sufficient for his protection.

The decisions referred to on behalf of the defendant in error, where Spanish claims had been confirmed, and where the United States gave an additional sanction to an incipient title existing when we acquired Louisiana, do not apply. In those cases, titles which were undoubtedly private property, that could be alienated, and which descended, were examined, and their validity ascertained; and when found meritorious, ordered to be defined by survey, and a United States patent was in most cases ordered to be issued. But this did not defeat outstanding interests in the land for which the patent issued: as was held in the case of Stoddard v. Chambers, 2 How., 284; Bissell v. Penrose, 8 How., 337; and Landes v. Brant, 10 How., 348. The patent covered the whole title; at least, from the time it was asserted before a Board of Commissioners appointed by Congress to investigate the claim; and the patent inured to the protection of alienees and heirs. The United States Government was bound to protect existing interests in the lands acquired by the United States from France by the Treaty of 1803.

Here, however, a very different claim to the lands in the Town of Galena is set up. The government was the absolute owner; Congress might have repealed the Acts of 1829 and 1836, at any time before actual purchases were made by those claiming a preference to enter, and the lands have been sold at auction. Up to the date of the entry and purchase, the title was in the United States; behind which date the courts of justice can uphold no deed of conveyance of the public lands, unless Congress has authorized assignments of occupant claims to be made; and as the Acts of 1829 and 1836 awarded the preference of entry to the claimant who applied, and obtained, the favorable decision of the Board of Commissioners, no inquiry can be made into the dealings between Phelps and Guyard.

It is ordered that the judgment of the Supreme Court of Illinois be reversed, and that the cause be remanded, to be proceeded in according to this opinion.

Consent cannot confer jurisdiction—no jurisdiction without an appeal—withdrawal of transcript.

The consent of parties cannot give jurisdiction to this court, where the law does not give it.

Without an appeal taken in the District Court, this court has no jurisdiction, and the consent of parties cannot cure the defect.

But if the plaintiff in error desires to supply the omission, and take an appeal in the District Court, he has leave to withdraw the transcript now filed, and to use it upon his new appeal.

Motion filed Feb. 18, 1859. Decided Feb. 21, 1859.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois.

On motion to reinstate.

The case is stated by the court.

NOTE.—Jurisdiction of federal courts not given by consent. See Note to Gov. of Georgia v. African Slaves. 26 U. S. (1 Pet.), 110.

Messrs. Charles Ballance, in person, and Reverdy Johnson, for appellant.

Mr. Archibald Williams, for appellee.

Mr. Chief Justice Taney delivered the opinion of the court:

This case was dimissed on the 20th of December last, because it did not appear that an appeal had been taken in the District Court. A motion has now been made to reinstate the case, and, in support of that motion, a written agreement, signed by the counsel for the appellant and appellee, has been filed, consenting to reinstate the case, to waive all irregularities, and to try the case on the merits.

But the consent of parties cannot give jurisdiction to this court, where the law does not give it. And, without an appeal taken in the District Court, this court has no jurisdiction, and the consent of parties cannot cure the defect. The motion is, therefore, overruled.

But if the plaintiff in error desires to supply the omission, and take an appeal in the District Court, and bring his case legally before us, he has leave, in order to save expense, to withdraw the transcript now filed, and to use it upon his appeal, leaving a receipt for it with the Clerk of this court.

THE NEW YORK AND LIVERPOOL UNITED STATES MAIL STEAMSHIP COMPANY, Claimants of the Steamship PACIFIC, her Tackle, etc., Appts.,

v.

OTIS P. RUMBALL, Libt.

Collision between steamer and brig—rule, where steamers meet sailing vessels—nautical rules—do not apply when collision is inevitable—where brig was not in fault, steamer liable.

Where, in a collision between a steamer and brig, the brig kept her course, without any change whatever, until the collision was inevitable, an error then committed by those in charge of her under such circumstances, if the vessel was otherwise without fault, would not impair her right to recover for the injuries occasioned by the collision.

As a general rule, sailing vessels, when approaching steamers, are required to keep their course, and the steamers are required to keep out of the way.

Those engaged in navigating vessels upon the seas are bound to observe the nautical rules, in the management of their vessels on approaching a point where there is danger of collision.

Such rules of navigation are obligatory upon vessels approaching each other, so long as the means and opportunity to avoid the danger remain.

They do not apply to a vessel after the approach is so near that the collision is inevitable.

When a steamer approaches a sailing vessel, the steamer is required to exercise the necessary precautions to avoid a collision; and if this be not done, prima facie the steamer is chargeable with fault.

As the brig was run down and lost, and the evidence fails to satisfy the court that the brig was in fault, or the disaster inevitable, it necessarily follows that the collision was the result of fault on the part of the steamer, and that the steamer is answerable to the libelant for the damage.

NOTE.—Collision. Rights of steam and sailing vessels in reference to each other, and in passing and meeting. See note to St. John v. Paine, 51 U. S. (10 How.), 557.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York.

The libel in this case was filed in the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York, by the appellee, to recover damages resulting from a collision.

The said court entered a decree dismissing the libel. On appeal to the Circuit Court, this decree was reversed and a decree entered in favor of the libelant, for $7,107.16, with $412.82, costs; whereupon the defendant took an appeal to this court.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Clarkson N. Potter and Owen & Vose, for appellant:

1. No considerable distance could exist between the vessels, as libelant claimed.

As to estimates of time and distance, see The Europa, 2 Law & Eq., 559; The Iron Duke, 2 W. Rob., 381; The James Watt, 2 W. Rob., 274; 1 Blatchf., 371.

2. The libelant has the burden of proof. To recover, he must make it appear that the steamer was in fault. When it appears that the sailing vessel stood her course, and that the steamer could have avoided her, then the law presumes the steamer should have done so. But such facts must appear, to raise the presumption.

On the question of responsibility, see 13 How., 109; Barrett v. Williamson, 4 McLean, 589; The Delaware v. The Osprey, 2 Wall., Jr., 268.

3. In any event, the damages were excessive. The libelant was only entitled to the actual damage caused by the collision, viz.: the cost of bringing the brig to port and repairing her.

The Catharine v. Dickinson, 17 How., 170.

Messrs. B. D. Stillman and H. G. De-Forest, for appellees:

Conclusions on the facts and points of law.

The brig discharged her duty in all respects.

1st. A bright light was displayed when the steamer was first discovered.

2d. She kept her course close-hauled throughout.

3d. If her course was changed at all, it was just at the moment of collision, when the steamer had come so near as to discharge the brig from the consequences.

12 How., 443.

If any change of the brig's took place, it was in the right direction. It was justifiable to presume that the steamer would port her helm and pass to the right.

St. John v. Paine, 10 How., 585; The Rose, 2 W. Rob., 1.

The steamer did not discharge her duty.

The following rules apply to the present case:

"A vessel that has the wind free, &c., must get out of the way." "When vessels are crossing each other in opposite directions, and there is the least doubt of their going clear, the vessel on the starboard tack should persevere on her course, while that on the larboard tack should bear up or keep away before the wind." "The vessel on the larboard tack must give way, and the vessel on the starboard tack must hold on."

10 How., 591.

When a steamer meets a sailing vessel, the latter has the right to keep her course. It is the duty of the steamer to adopt such precautions as will avoid her.

10 How., 583.

And a steamer ought not, in wide water, to approach so near a sailing vessel as to create a hazard.

12 How., 461.

2. The steamer did not change her course quick enough. At the time the vessel struck, she had kept off no more than two points.

12 How., 461.

She had only one man at the wheel, which was an insufficient force with a ship of this size, and which may account in part for her tardy change of direction.

The Europa, 2 Eng. L. & Eq., 564.

3. The steamer was also in fault in not having sooner stopped her headway.

4. In attempting to cross the bow of the brig instead of keeping to the right by porting her helm, the steamer made herself responsible for all the consequences.

5. The steamer did not take proper precautionary measures to avoid the brig, and the decree of the court below should be affirmed.

Mr Justice Clifford delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal in admiralty, from a decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York, in a cause of collision, civil and maritime. It was commenced in the District Court on the 24th day of September, 1851, by the appellee, in behalf of himself and the other owners of the brig Alfaretta. According to the case made in the libel, The Alfaretta sailed from Millbridge, in the State of Maine, on the 10th day of August, 1851, fully laden with lumber freight, and bound on a voyage to the port of New York. She was a tight, stanch, strong vessel of one hundred and sixty-three tons burden, and in every respect well manned, tackled, appareled, and appointed, with a competent master, and sufficient crew; and was totally wrecked by the collision which occurred on the 16th day of the same month, without any fault of her officers or crew, and while she was lawfully pursuing her voyage from the place of departure to her place of destination. At the time of the disaster she was fifteen or twenty miles off the southern shore of Long Island, sailing close-hauled on the wind, with her larboard tacks aboard, and all her sails set, and was heading about northwest by west. While sailing on that course, with a light wind from southwest by west, her master and crew discerned a light bearing from them about west half south, which they judged to be the light of a steamer; and the libelant, who was the master of The Alfaretta, immediately caused a light to be hoisted in the forerigging of the brig. That vessel proved to be the steamship Pacific, and it is alleged that she had such a large number of lights that the libelant was not able to determine what direction she was steering, and kept his vessel on her course, without any deviation, until the collision took place. It occurred between eight and ten o'clock in the evening, as alleged in the libel, and about fifteen minutes after the light was placed in the forerigging of the brig, when the steamer, with great force and violence, ran into and struck the brig on her larboard bow, cutting her down to the water's edge, and carrying away her foremast, so that she filled in a few minutes and became a complete wreck.

On the 14th day of October following, the claimants of the steamer filed their answer to the allegations of the libel. Among other things not necessary to be noticed, they deny that the steamer had such a large number of lights at the time referred to, that the libelant was not able to determine what direction she was steering; and they also deny that the brig kept her course, without any deviation, until the collision occurred; or that the steamer ran into and struck the brig in the manner above stated. Their theory is, and they accordingly allege, that the steamer started from New York on the day of the collision, on her intended voyage to Liverpool, well manned and equipped for the voyage, and in every respect seaworthy; and that the lookout of the steamer, who was stationed at the forecastle, while she was proceeding on the voyage, between seven and eight o'clock in the evening, the weather being cloudy and the night dark, the wind southwest by south, and the steamer steering east half south, with her usual lights displayed, discovered the light of a vessel about two and a half points on the starboard bow of the steamer. Whereupon the helm of the steamer was immediately put to the starboard, and she at once swung off to east-northeast, and at or about the same time her engines were stopped. That vessel so discovered was the brig Alfaretta. She was close hauled on the wind at the time, and was steering to the westward, as the respondents allege, in a course nearly parallel to that of the steamer; but, instead of keeping her course, as she should have done, she suddenly and unexpectedly put her helm to port, and kept off, and came with her bows on to the steamer, striking her a little forward of her starboard wheel, which passed over the bows of the brig, cutting her down and damaging the steamer to the amount of $2,000. And they explicitly allege, that if the brig had kept her course, and had not put her helm to port, the collision would have been avoided. This statement, derived from the pleadings, exhibits very fully the real nature of the controversy between the parties, and the grounds assumed on the one side and the other in the prosecution and defense of the suit. Testimony was taken on both sides, in the District Court, and, after hearing, a decree was entered that the libel be dismissed, each party paying their own costs, and the libelant appealed to the Circuit Court. Both parties appeared by counsel in the Circuit Court, and, after a full hearing, it was ordered and adjudged that the decree of the District Court dismissing the libel be in all things reversed, and that the libelant to recover the damages sustained by reason of the collision, together with costs in both courts, and that the cause be referred to a commissioner to ascertain and report the damages. Additional testimony was taken before the commissioner, who reported that the sum of $7,107.19 was due to the libelants, to which report the respondents excepted; and, after the hearing upon the exceptions, the report was confirmed by the court, and a decree entered that the libelant recover the sum reported with costs. Whereupon a final decree was entered, in pursuance of the report, and the respondents appealed to this court. Many of the facts and circumstances attending the disaster, as well as those which preceded it, are so fully proved that they cannot properly be regarded as the subject of dispute. As alleged in the libel, the collision took place in the open sea, on the 16th day of August, 1851, some fifteen or twenty miles off the southern shore of Long Island. It occurred a little past eight o'clock in the evening, after the officers in charge of the respective vessels had been fully apprised of the approaching danger, and under circumstances which make it manifest that it ought to have been prevented. Both vessels had proper lights at the time, and competent and sufficient lookouts; and it is clearly proved that the duties of the lookouts were vigilantly and promptly performed. Lights had not been set on the brig when her lookout first discerned the light of the steamer from the forward part of the vessel. One had been prepared, however, and lighted by the steward, and was in the galley forward of the house on the deck, ready for that purpose. On seeing the light of the steamer, the lookout of the brig at once reported the fact to the master, who was then walking the deck, and he immediately caused the light, which was burning brightly, to be hoisted in the fore rigging of the brig, and it was kept there, in full view of the approaching steamer, until the vessels came together. Coffin, who hoisted the light, and was the lookout on the brig, testifies that he tied the light just under the foreyard, and remained standing in the rigging, watching the light of the steamer as she approached, until she was so near that he had just time to descend to the deck and take a few steps aft when the vessels struck. He says it was about fifteen minutes after he reported the light of the steamer to the master of the brig that the collision occurred; and, in this particular, he is strongly confirmed by the mate of the steamer, who admits that the brig was about three miles distant when her light was reported to him, as the officer of the deck, by the lookout on the starboard bow of the steamer. At the time the light of the steamer was first seen by the lookout, the brig was sailing on a course of northwest by west, close-hauled on the wind, with her larboard tacks aboard, and all her sails set. She was converging towards the track of the steamer, and was going through the water only three or four miles an hour, the wind being light, and blowing from the southwest by west.

Several witnesses describe the character of the night as overcast, and some speak of it as cloudy, with intervening stars; but all agree that it was not unusually dark. They all concur in saying that the surface of the sea was smooth, and there was no haze or mist on the water; and the mate of the steamer testifies that objects could be seen without lights at the distance of three miles.

When the steamer discovered the brig, she had all her signal lights displayed, and was on a course of east half south, and was moving through the water at the rate of twelve or thirteen miles an hour, using all her sails as well as her engines. Her mate and lookout first saw the light of the brig, and they testify that the bearing of the light was some two and a half points off the starboard bow of the steamer. Their statements, however, do not entirely agree with the testimony of the master. He was in his room at the time, calculating the position of the steamer, and did not hear the light of the brig reported. While there, he heard the mate call out, "hard a-starboard," and instantly went up on to the paddle-box of the steamer.

His account of the bearing of the brig is not entirely clear, as given in the record, or very satisfactory. At first, he says he saw the brig two and a half to three points off the starboard bow of the steamer, but finally fixes it at two points: and adds, to the effect that she was not over one third of a mile distant. He admits, however, that the steamer was then swinging off rapidly towards Long Island shore; and of course, if the bearing was only two points when the master reached the paddle-box, it must have been much less than two and a half points at the time the light was first discovered, as the vessels were then three miles apart, and the order of the mate, to starboard the helm, had not then been given; and of course the steamer did not commence to swing off to port till after that order was given and executed.

According to the testimony of the mate, his first order, after seeing the light of the brig, was to starboard the helm, and then, he says, the vessel began to swing off; and it was not until after he left the position he then occupied, and went on to the paddle-box, that he gave the order, hard a-starboard. After that order was given, and the usual response received from the wheelsman, then he says, the master came by his side, and repeated the order, adding that "the vessel will be into us—stop her;" and the mate says that the steamer had then swung off about three points; and yet the master says that the bearing of the light of the brig was still two points off the starboard bow of the steamer.

Statements so conflicting and uncertain do not furnish any definite elements which can safely be made the basis of a reliable mathematical calculation as to the precise bearing of the brig when her light was first seen, and are not entitled to much consideration in determining the question how the collision was produced.

Some uncertainty also exists as to the precise bearing of the steamer when her light was first discovered from the brig. It is stated in the libel as about west half south, and the testimony of the witnesses is equally indefinite. One witness estimates it at about three points off the larboard bow of the brig; another says it was about two points in the same direction; and a third witness says it was about west. Such indefinite statements cannot afford much aid in determining the principal question involved in this controversy.

Whatever may have been the precise positon of the vessels with respect to each other at the time the light of the steamer was first discovered by the lookout of the brig, it is certain that the course of the brig was converging towards the track of the steamer, and that they came together in the course of fifteen minutes after the light was reported to the master; and the brig was run down and lost. It was the starboard bow of the steamer which came in contact with the larboard bow of the brig, forward of the fore swifter, and slewed her round, carrying away her bowsprit, foremast, and main topmast, and cutting her down to the water's edge; and such was the headway of the steamer at the time, that she swept on for a considerable distance, without any apparent abatement of her speed, nothwithstanding her engines were stopped and reversed just before the collision took place.

All the circumstances tend to show that the disaster might have been prevented, and that there was fault somewhere, for which the offending party ought to be held responsible. Both parties appears to have so understood the matter when they made up their pleadings, as well as in the subsequent conduct of the cause.

It is alleged in the libel that the brig kept her course after the light of the steamer was seen, without any deviation, until the collision occurred. On the part of the respondents, that allegation in the libel is denied; and they allege that the brig, when her light was first seen, was steering to the westward, close-hauled on the wind, and in a course nearly parallel to the steamer; but instead of keeping her course, as she should have done, that she suddenly and unexpectedly put her helm up, kept off, and came with her bows on to the steamer.

Such is the issue, as made up by the parties in the pleadings, and it presents the princi pal question of fact to be determined by the court.

Our views upon the point cannot be stated in a manner which would be satisfactory to those interested, without some brief reference to the evidence on which they are based.

When the disaster occurred to the brig, her whole company, consisting of seven men, including the master and mate, were on the deck of the vessel, and witnessed the events. Four were examined as witnesses; and the mate testifies that it was the watch of the master, who, being the libelant and one of the owners of the vessel, was not examined. His watch commenced at eight o'clock in the evening, when the preceding watch closed. From six to eight o'clock the mate had charge of the deck, and he says that the course of the brig at sunset was northwest by west; that she was sailing close-hauled on the wind, and continued on the same course until eight o'clock, when he went below. He remained below until he heard a light reported, when he immediately went on deck, and at first saw only one light, but, as the vessel approached nearer, he saw more, and supposed it was a steamer; and he testifies positively that the brig did not change her course, after he went on deck, until the steamer struck her. On his return to the deck, he did not look at the compass, but says the brig was on the wind, with her larboard tacks aboard, and, in his judgment, was going the same course as when he went below.

Three of the seamen were also examined, and their testimony is equally full and explicit, and to the same effect. One of them was the lookout, who first discovered the light of the steamer, and reported it to the master; and the other two, on hearing his report, immediately went on deck, and remained throughout, watching the light as it approached, and with every opportunity to see and observe whatever transpired on the deck of the vessel. Some one or more of them testifies that the master twice gave the order "to keep her full and by," as the steamer advanced, and they all concur that the brig did not change her course, and that no danger was apprehended until just before the collision took place. All must admit that they had ample means of knowledge upon the subject of their testimony; and if their statements are incorrect, they must have willfully perverted the truth, which is not to be presumed. Several witnesses, however, examined on the part of the respondents, testify that the brig did change her course before the vessels came together; and among the number is the mate of the steamer, who beyond doubt describes the events truly, as they appeared to him at the time of the occurrence.

His testimony, as it is exhibited in the record, furnishes conclusive evidence that the two vessels were very close together, if not in actual contact, when the supposed change of course was made, and presents some ground of inference that the jib-boom of the steamer, or the rigging connected with the bowsprit, as they swept over the stem of the brig, or pressed against her fore rigging, may have produced the state of things which induced him to think that the brig had ported her helm. At first he said the change was made just before the collision, then immediately before it; but, upon further interrogation, he said it was before the jib-boom of the brig had touched the steamer, and finally added that the brig might have been twice the length of the ship off. All of his statements, however, are based upon the theory that the brig ran into the steamer, when it is satisfactorily shown that the real state of the case was the reverse. It was the bow of the steamer, near the catheads, which struck the jib-boom of the brig, and carried it away; and the evidence furnishes strong reasons to conclude that the brig had been partly slewed round just before that occurred. Be that as it may, it is certain from the evidence that the brig kept her course until just before the collision took place. When the mate of the steamer first saw her light, he says it was about three miles distant, and he admits that her direction then was north of west, and that he did not notice any change of her course, except the one already mentioned, when the vessels were close together. When the master went up on to the paddle-box of the steamer, and repeated the order previously given by the mate to put the helm hard a-starboard, he says the brig was then sailing close-hauled on the wind, and and that the two vessels were not more tha a third of a mile apart. His account of the change of course is, that it was made after that order was given, and he says the brig instantly turned directly across the bows of the steamer, and came right into her, thus showing conclusively that the alleged change, however produced, was made at the moment of collision. These references to the testimony of the witnesses must suffice, and they are believed to be amply sufficient to show what the state of the evidence is, as it is exhibited in the record. One remark is applicable to all of the witnesses introduced by the respondents; and that is, they had not the same means of knowledg respecting the matter in dispute as the witnesses for the libelant possessed, who had charge of the brig, and governed her course; and in weighing the evidence, and determining its force and effect, that important consideration cannot be overlooked. It must be admitted that the witnesses on the part of the libelant speak from actual knowledge, and unless they have willfully stated what they know to be false, their statements must be correct. They were on the deck of the vessel, interested, so far as their personal safety was concerned, to observe everything that transpired as the steamer approached, and they cannot well be mistaken in respect to the matter under consideration.

Those on board the steamer appear in the record under very different circumstances. They only infer what they have affirmed as to what transpired on the deck of the brig, and at best their statements respecting the matters in question are of the nature of opinions, and it is not difficult to see that they may be in error. In the excitement and confusion of the moment, they may have mistaken what was occasioned by the momentum of the steamer or the pressure of her bowsprit or jib-boom upon the stem or fore rigging of the brig, for a change of course produced by an alteration of her helm. All the testimony tends to show that the two vessels came together at an obtuse angle, and there is much reason to think that the brig had been pressed out of her course before the bows of the vessels came together. At all events, such an inference from the evidence is far more reasonable than would be the conclusion that all the witnesses for the libelants have willfully perverted the truth. Other grounds of reconciling the testimony consistent with the integrity of all the witnesses might be suggested, but we think it unnecessary, as the evidence clearly shows that the brig kept her course, without any change whatever, until the peril was impending and the collision inevitable.

An error committed by those in charge of a vessel under such circumstances, if the vessel was otherwise without fault, would not impair her right to recover for the injuries occasioned by the collision, for the plain reason that those who produced the peril and put the vessel in that situation would be chargeable with the error, and must answer for the consequences.

Our conclusion, however, on this branch of the case, is, that the respondents have failed to support the allegation of the answer, that the brig changed her course after the light of the steamer was discovered, and that the evidence satisfactorily shows that she did not change her course in any sense which can be regarded as a fault. Sailing vessels, when approaching a steamer, are required to keep their course; and steamers, under such circumstances, as a general rule, are required to keep out of the way. Many considerations concur to show that all those engaged in navigating vessels upon the seas are bound to observe the nautical rules recognized and approved by the courts, in the management of their vessels, on approaching a point where there is danger of collision. Those rules were framed and are administered to prevent such disasters and to afford security to life and property exposed to such dangers; and public policy, as well as the best interest of all concerned, requires that they should be constantly and rigidly enforced in all cases to which they apply. Few cases can be imagined where it is more needful that they should be observed than when a steamer and a sailing vessel are approaching each other from opposite directions, or on intersecting lines, for the obvious reason that the negligence of the one is liable to baffle the vigilance of the other; and if one of the vessels under such circumstances follows the rule, and the other omits to do so, or violates it, a collision is almost certain to follow.

Rules of navigation, such as have been mentioned, are obligatory upon vessels approaching each other, from the time the necessity for precaution begins, and continue to be applicable as the vessels advance, so long as the means and opportunity to avoid the danger remain. They do not apply to a vessel required to keep her course after the approach is so near that the collision is inevitable, and are equally inapplicable to vessels of every description, while they are yet so distant from each other that measures of precaution have not become necessary to avoid a collision. Sailing vessels approaching a steamer are required to keep their course on account of the correlative duty which is devolved upon the steamer to keep out of the way, in order that the steamer may know the position of the object to be avoided, and may not be led into error in her endeavor to comply with the requirement.

Under the rule that a steamer must keep out of the way, she must of necessity determine for herself and upon her own responsibility, independently of the sailing vessel, whether it is safer to go to the right or left, or to stop; and in order that she may not be deprived of the means of determining the matter wisely, and that she may not be defeated or baffled in the attempt to perform her duty in the emergency, it is required in the admiralty jurisprudence of the United States that the sailing vessel shall keep her course, and allow the steamer to pass either on the right or left, or to adopt such measures of precaution as she may deem best suited to enable her to perform her duty and fulfill the requirement of the law to keep out of the way.

Repeated decisions of this court have affirmed the doctrine here laid down, and carried it out to its logical conclusion, and in so many instances that the question cannot any longer be regarded as open to dispute. Accordingly, it was held in the case of The Steamer Oregon v. Rocca et al., 18 How., 570, that when a steamer approaches a sailing vessel, the steamer is required to exercise the necessary precautions to avoid a collision; and if this be not done, prima facie the steamer is chargeable with fault. That decision was founded upon the rule previously established in St. John v. Paine et al., 10 How., 583, where the whole subject is elaborately considered, and the reasons of the rule fully explained. Similar views are also maintained in the case of The Genesee Chief, 12 How., 461, and in various other cases to the present time. Exceptional cases may be imagined in a crowded thoroughfare, where the rule would not be applicable, but those will be considered when they arise. Such precautions as are inculcated in the rule referred to are enjoined, as before remarked, to prevent collision and afford security to life and property; and in a case where the rule could not be followed without defeating the end for which it was established, or without producing the mischief which it was the design of the rule to avert, of course it would not be applicable, and in such a case a departure from it would be both justifiable and commendable. Extreme cases, such as are supposed, will rarely if ever occur, and in referring to them it must not be understood that the rule will be relaxed to any extent whatever in other cases to which it properly applies.

Applying these principles to the case under consideration, it is obvious what the result must be. It is not denied that the collision took place, and that the brig was run down and lost; and such being the fact, and the evidence exhibited failing to satisfy the court that the brig was in fault, or the disaster inevitable, it necessarily follows that the collision was the result of fault on the part of the steamer, and that the steamer is answerable to the libelant for the damage.

Our attention was also drawn, at the argument, to the amount of the damages as reported by the Commissioner, and it was insisted that it is excessive. On that point it will be sufficient to say, that after a careful examination of the testimony before him, we see no ground to doubt that his duty was rightly performed.

The decree of the Circuit Court, therefore, is affirmed, with costs.

THE PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK, ex rel. ASA CUTLER; JOHN UNDERHILL, JR., AND ARZA UNDERHILL, Plffs. in Er., v. EDGAR C. DIBBLE, County Judge, &c.

(See S. C., 21 How., 366-371.)

N. Y. Act, for summary removal or persons from Indian lands, is not in conflict with Act of Congress or treaty of Constitution of U. S.

The New York Statute respecting intrusions on Indian lands, which authorizes the summary removal of persons, other than Indians, who settle or reside upon lands belonging to or occupied by any nation or tribe of Indians, is not contrary to the Constitution of the United States, nor any Act of Congress.

Unless such persons have, by the Treaty of May 20, 1842, between the United States and the Seneca Indians, a right of entry into these lands, they can not allege that such summary removal by authority of the Statutes of New York is in conflict with the Treaty, or any rights secured to the purchasers under it.

This Statute and the proceedings under it are not in conflict with the Treaty in question, nor with any Act of Congress, nor with the Constitution of the United States.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of New York.

The proceedings in this case were instituted before Edgar C. Dibble, County Judge of Genesee County, by the District Attorney, against the relators, under a Statute of New York, passed March 31, 1821. The court decided against the relators, who thereupon removed the proceeding, by certiorari, to the Supreme Court, where said decision was affirmed. They then removed the cause to the court of Appeals, where it was again affirmed, and the record remitted to the Supreme Court for execution of the judgment; whereupon the relators removed the cause, by writ of error, to this court, under the 25th section of the Judiciary Act.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. R. H. Gillett and Joshua L. Brown, for the plaintiffs in error.

The Law of New York of the 31st March, 1821, under which these proceedings were instituted, is repugnant to the Constitution and laws of the United States, and therefore null and void.

Act of March 30, 1802, 2 U. S. L., 139; Treaty of 1794, 7 U. S. L., 45, art 2.

The scope and object of the Act of New York in question, and the two above Acts, are precisely the same. Congress had made provision for the exact case, and while that law remained in force, New York legislated upon the same identical subject. Both laws cannot stand. Two separate governments cannot have jurisdiction and control of the same subject at the same time. One law must yield to the other, and the Constitution of the United States, art. 6, determines which. The New York Act of 1821, however, may be fairly presumed to have been intended to apply exclusively to certain other reservations, over which it was right and proper for the State to legislate. The reservations held by the Senecas, however, were within the Indian Intercourse Law of 1802, and the Treaty of 1794. The question, whether a law like the one under consideration is valid, is well settled.

Golden v. Prince, 3 Wash. C. C., 314; Sturges v. Crowninshield, 4 Wheat., 122; City of New York v. Miln, 11 Pet., 102; Fox v. Ohio, 5 How., 410; Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat., 1, 210; Holmes v. Jennison, 14 Pet., 540, 574; North River Steamboat Company v. Livingston, 3 Cow., 714; The Passenger Cases, 7 How., 283; Worcester v. Georgia, 6 Pet., 515.

The decision in this case rests mainly upon the Indian Intercourse Act of 1802, and it declares that a state law which interferes therewith is null and void.

2. If the Act of 1821 was not invalid at the time of its enactment, it was superseded and annulled by the Treaties of 1838 and 1842, so far as it interferes with the right of Ogden and Fellows to enjoy the advantages secured to them under those Treaties.

NOTE.—Jurisdiction of U. S. Supreme Court where federal question arises, or where is drawn in question Statute, Treaty, or Constitution of U. S. See note to Matthews v. Zane, 8 U. S. (4 Cranch), 382; note to Martin v. Hunter, 14 U. S. (1 Wheat.), 304; and note to Williams v. Norris, 25 U. S. (12 Wheat.), 117.

Fisher v. Harnden, 1 Paine's C.C., 55; U. S. v. The Peggy, 1 Cranch, 103; Ware v. Hylton, 3 Dall., 199; Jackson v. Munson, 8 Cai., 137; The Bello Corrunes, 6 Wheat., 152; Gordon v. Kerr, 1 Wash. C. C., 322; Foster v. Neilson, 2 Pet., 253; Martin v. Hunter, 1 Wheat., 304; Carver v. Jackson, 4 Pet., 1, 100; Owings v. Norwood, 5 Cranch, 344.

These cases fully settle the principle assumed on this point, that the subsequent Treaty by the Federal Government supersedes all repugnant State legislation upon the same subject. Under the Treaty, these reservations ceased to be Indian lands, and those acquiring title to them under the Treaty acquired the right of possession, which could not be controlled by any enactment of the State Legislature. Consequently, when Dibble decided to expel the purchasers, or those holding under them, he acted without legal authority, and his decision must be reversed.

3. Under the Treaties of 1838 and 1842, the legal title to the premises occupied by Cutler and the Underhills became vested in Ogden and Fellows, under whom they held, and they were authorized to continue in possession until ousted by a claimant showing a better title.

Messrs. J. H. Martindale and Wakeman & Bryan, for the defendant in error:

The Statute in question (Session Laws of New York, 21, p. 183) is in the nature of a police regulation, to preserve the public peace and property. Clearly it is for the Legislature of New York, when it does not exceed the prescribed limits of the Constitution of that State, or of the United States, to determine for itself the mode of entering upon and asserting title however derived, to the lands within the jurisdiction and sovereignty of the State. It is not denied that the Treaties in question are as authoritative as a law of Congress; but it is insisted that the rights of property vested in the Tonawandas by the laws of New York and the ancient Treaties between them and the United States can no more be taken away from them by a law of Congress or a public treaty, without their consent, than the rights of property of any citizen whomsoever; that is, neither they nor any citizen can be deprived of rights of property vested in them, without due process of law.

Art. 5, Amendment to Constitution; Murray v. Wooden, 17 Wend., 531; 2 Pet., 657; 4 Hill, 140; 19 Wend., 676, 677.

Counsel then examined the title of the Tonawandas and of the Seneca Indians to their lands, and said: And now the question arises, will not the law take notice of these facts, this altered condition of the Indian tribes.

Having produced this separation of Senecas into distinct bands occupying widely separated reservations; having encouraged the adoption by them of the ideas of individual personal rights in their improvements, and thus secured their civilization; having invited their submission to our laws by deliberate treaty; having guaranteed to them their lands until they should choose to sell them, and surrendered them to the care and protection of New York; can the General Government enter that State and apply to them and their property the maxims which regulate the conduct of civilized conquerors towards savages? Do these New York Indians hold their separate reservations and property by the sufferance and mercy of their conquerors, or are they under the protection of the Constitution and laws of the country?

The deed and Treaty of May 20, 1842, are without effect, because they were procured without the consent and authority of the Legislature of the State of New York.

Goodell v. Jackson, 20 Johns., 725.

The Treaty of 1794 between the United States and the Six Nations conferred unlimited authority on the Senecas to sell their lands when they should choose to, the people of the United States having the right to purchase them. But what construction may be given to the Treaty, or howsoever conclusive it may be deemed to be on the Tonawandas, the conditions precedent contained in it have not been complied with.

Blacksmith v. Fellows, 7 N. Y., 401.

Mr. Justice Grier delivered the opinion of the court:

This case is brought before us by a writ of error to the Supreme Court of New York, under the 25th section of the Judiciary Act. It had its origin in a proceeding before the County Judge of Genesee County, instituted by the District Attorney against Asa Cutler, John Underhill, and Arza Underhill, the relators, pursuant to the provisions of an Act of Assembly entitled "An Act respecting intrusion on Indian lands," passed March 31, 1821.

This Act made it unlawful for any persons other than Indians to settle and reside upon lands belonging to or occupied by any tribe of Indians, and declared void all contracts made by any Indians, whereby any other than Indians should be permitted to reside on such lands; and if any persons should settle or reside on any such lands contrary to the Act, it was made the duty of any judge of any county court where such lands were situated, on complaint made to him, and due proof of such residence or settlement, to issue his warrant, directed to the sheriff, commanding him to remove such persons.

On notice to the relators of the institution of this proceeding, they appeared before the judge and pleaded to his jurisdiction, on the ground that they had entered and occupied the lands, claiming title under a written instrument adversely to the Seneca Nation of Indians, and therefore, by the Constitution and laws of the State, they were entitled to a trial by jury, according to the course of the common law, and could not thus be removed by summary proceeding under this Act.

This plea was overruled by the judge. The relators then pleaded that this tract of 12,800 acres called the Tonawanda reservation, was not owned by the Seneca Indians; that by a Treaty made with the United States on the 20th of May, 1842, the Seneca Nation of Indians had, by indenture set forth in the Treaty, conveyed to Thomas Ludlow Ogden and Joseph Fellows this tract of land, with others; that this grant was duly confirmed by the State of Massachusetts, pursuant to the provisions of the Act of cession made between that State and the State of New York, on the 16th of December, 1786; that the whole amount of the consideration stipulated by the Treaty and deed had been paid by said Ogden and Fellows; and that relators were in possession under said Ogden and Fellows, and adversely to the Indians. They therefore denied the power and authority of the Judge to determine their right to the lands in their possession, or to remove them, under the powers conferred by the Act of Assembly of New York.

After hearing the parties, the Judge decided against the relators, who removed the proceedings by certiorari to the Supreme Court.

The record contains the testimony on both sides, and numerous documents concerning the Treaty with the Seneca Indians, and also the subsequent proceedings by the officers of the government. It will not be necessary to a clear apprehension of our decision in this case to state them particularly, nor is it material to our inquiry whether the Judge may have erred in his decision, that "the Seneca nation had not duly granted and conveyed the reserve in question to Ogden and Fellows."

The Supreme Court and the Court of Appeals of New York have decided, "that the provisions of this Act respecting intrusions on Indian lands, which authorize the summary removal of persons, other than Indians, who settle or reside upon lands belonging to or occupied by any nation or tribe of Indians, are constitutional, and that a citizen who enters upon their land before their title has been extinguished, and they have removed, or have been removed by the Act of the government, can acquire no such right of property or possession as is within the protection of the provisions of the Constitution which secure a trial by jury." They, therefore, affirmed the judgment of the County Judge.

The only question which this court can be called on to decide is, whether this law is in conflict with the Constitution of the United States, or any treaty or Act of Congress, and whether this proceeding under it has deprived the relators of property or rights secured to them by any treaty or Act of Congress.

The Statute in question is a police regulation for the protection of the Indians from intrusion of the white people, and to preserve the peace. It is the dictate of a prudent and just policy. Notwithstanding the peculiar relation which these Indian Nations hold to the Government of the United States, the State of New York had the power of a sovereign over their persons and property, so far as it was necessary to preserve the peace of the Commonwealth, and protect these feeble and helpless bands from imposition and intrusion. The power of a State to make such regulations to preserve the peace of the community is absolute, and has never been surrendered. The Act is, therefore, not contrary to the Constitution of the United States.

Nor is this Statute in conflict with any Act of Congress, as no law of Congress can be found which authorizes white men to intrude on the possessions of Indians.

Is it in conflict with rights acquired by Ogden and Fellows, under the Treaty, and contract making a part of it? If the Treaty of 1842 had been executed; if the United States, in their character of sovereign guardian of this nation, had delivered up the possession to these purchasers, then this Statute of New York, when applied to them, would clearly be in conflict with their rights acquired under the Treaty. But, by the case, it is admitted that the Indians have not been removed by the United States. The Tonawanda band is in peaceable possession of its reserve, and has hitherto refused to surrender it. Unless, therefore, these persons claiming under Ogden and Fellows have, by the Treaty, a right of entry into these lands, and, as a consequence, to forcibly oust the possessors or turn them out by action of ejectment, they cannot allege that this summary removal by authority of the Statute of New York is in conflict with the Treaty, or any rights secured to the purchasers under it. This proceeding does not affect their title. The question of the validity of this Treaty to bind the Tonawanda band is one to be decided, not by the courts, but by the political power which acted for and with the Indians. So far as the Statute of New York is concerned, it only requires that the Indians be in possession; they are not bound to show that they are owners. They may invoke the aid of the Statute against all white intruders, so long as they remain in the peaceable possession of their lands.

The relators cannot claim the protection of the Treaty, unless they have a right of entry given them by it, before the Indians are removed by the government. This court have decided, in the case of Fellows v. Blacksmith, 19 How., 366, that this Treaty has made no provision as to the mode or manner in which the removal of the Indians or the surrender of their reservations was to take place; that it can be carried into execution only by the authority or power of the government which was a party to it. The Indians are to be removed to their new homes by their guardians, the United States, and cannot be expelled by irregular force or violence of the individuals who claim to have purchased their lands, nor even by the intervention of the courts of justice. Until such removal and surrender of possession by the intervention of the Government of the United States, the Indians and their possessions are protected, by the laws of New York, from the intrusion of their white neighbors.

We are of opinion, therefore, that this Statute and the proceeding in this case are not in conflict with the Treaty in question, or with any Act of Congress, or with the Constitution of the United States.

The judgment of the Court of Appeals of New York is, therefore, affirmed with costs.

v.

WM. A. WOODWARD AND WM. C. DUSENBERRY, late Partners under the Firm of WOODWARD & DUSENBERRY.

(See S. C., 21 How., 266-275.)

Check, when money.

A check on a bank, payable at sight, to order, and indorsed in blank, and which an agent, to raise money on negotiable paper, took as money, and which was presently paid to a bona fide holder by the cashier of the bank, is money.

The note or bill purchased by such check was sold for money; title passed to the purchaser, and the principal was bound by the contract of the agent.

Argued Feb. 7, 1859. Decided Feb. 21, 1859.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Ohio.

This was an action of assumpsit brought in the court below, by the defendants in error, on a certain promissory note.

The trial below resulted in a verdict and judgment in favor of the plaintiffs for $4.473.76, with costs; whereupon the defendant sued out this writ of error.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Henry Stanbery, for plaintiffs in error:

We claim that the court erred. A certificate of deposit is in no sense cash or money; it is simply an acknowledgment of a debt, with a promise of payment. The transaction between Hood and Woodward & Dusenberry was simply the exchange of one form of negotiable security for another.

This was clearly a breach of trust, and a perversion of the authority to use the note for the loan of money.

We refer to the following cases:

Thorold v. Smith, 11 Mod., 71, 87; Bartlett v. Pentland, 10 B. & C., 758; Atkins v. Owen, 4 Ad. & E., 819; Nightingal v. Devisme, 5 Burr., 2589.

Messrs. N. H. Swayne and F. F. Marbury, for defendants in error:

It will not do to narrow the question to the simple proposition stated in Mr. Stanbery's brief, viz.: whether the certificate is money. It is not necessary to affirm this, to show the transaction binding on all the parties, and the remedy within the count for money had and received. Hood, having authority to borrow money on this note, had authority to receive anything which, in the usual course of business, is treated as such, and will command it. If he got the money or its equivalent, the object of himself and his principals was attained, and it does not lie in their mouths, after having acquiesced in what was done, and realized the money on the certificate, to dispute their liability, because the money, in form, was not given to Hood at the precise time that he parted with the note.

The transaction was just the same, in legal contemplation and in substance, as if he had received the $6,000 in specie, or bank bills, or the check of Woodward & Dusenberry, and then deposited the amount with them, and taken their certificate of such desposit.

The certificate was of the deposit of so much money, and in fact it yielded in money, on presentation, the full sum of $6,000 expressed on its face.

The makers of the note lived in Ohio, where they wanted to use their funds, and for their convenience and accommodation, this negotiable certificate of deposit of cash, answering their purpose as cash, was granted.

The class of cases relied on by the plaintiff in error, such as Bartlett v. Pentland, 10 B. & C., 758; Atkins v. Owen, 4 Ad. & E., 819, merely hold that a naked agent authorized to receive payment, cannot do so by discharging a debt due from himself to the party to whom the payment should be made. See observations upon those cases, Dunlap's Paley, Agency, 284.

As to the first case cited by the learned counsel, can there be a doubt that, even in that age, if the servant or the master had in fact, received the money on the goldsmith's note, the plaintiff in that case would have been estopped? So in the last case cited, if the defendant had converted the stock into money, is there any question that the action for money had and received would lie? The other two cases do not seem to be at all analogous.

The court had held in a more analogous case (Taylor v. Merchant's Fire Ins. Co., 9 How., 402), that where the mode of payment is not prescribed, the agent may exercise a discretion.

The judgment should be affirmed, with costs.

In England, especially in the earlier cases, there was a strong disposition to limit the evidence under the money counts, to strict money transactions. Lord Holt strenuously insisted the then growing practice in trade, of treating banker's cash notes and promissory notes as negotiable, until they were made so by the statute of Anne. But the American authorities have liberalized the doctrine in this respect, to meet the expanded customs of commercial transactions, and have held those money securities which in the common course of business are treated as money, and even bills of exchange and promissory notes, proper evidence under the money counts. They have even gone farther, and sustained this action in cases where there was no negotiable money security received by the defendant, but where, in the nature of the transaction, he ought, in equity to respond for money received.

See, also, Owenson v. Morse, 7 T. R., 64.

A certificate of deposit is like a check on a banker, of which it is said (Chit. Bills, 823), "in practice they are taken as cash, and it has been decided that a banker in London receiving bills from his corrrspondent in the country, to whom they had been indorsed to present for payment, is not guilty of negligence in giving up such bills to the acceptor, upon receiving a check on a banker for the amount, although it turn out that such check is dishonored."

Russell v. Hankey, 6 T. R., 12.

If the agency of a stranger, for receiving payment for his principal will thus authorize the receipt of such securities, as money, why may not an agent, having a common interest with his principals, do the same thing?

In construing the authority conferred on Hood by the plaintiffs in error, we must look to the circumstances of the parties, their place of residence, their relations to the subject of the agency and to each other, their common interest in the transaction; and if Hood did what it may reasonably be supposed the others would have done, had they been present, it cannot be said that he exceeded his authority. And es pecially if, after it was done, they acquiesced by their silence and availed themselves of the benefits of the transaction, they must be presumed to have authorized it. If Hood treated the certificate as money, so did they; and shall they now be permitted to say that they will not be bound by their agreement to receive it as money?

In passing upon the transactions of men, the law treats the subject-matter, according to the usual understanding and usages prevailing where the transaction took place. In this view the certificate of deposit is money. It is so treated and dealt with in the common business of life.

Mr. Justice Catron delivered the opinion of the court:

Hood and nine others, including the defendants, made a note of hand in Ohio, dated October 24th, 1849, for $15 000, payable to Woodward & Dusenberry, thirty days after date, at their office in New York.

For himself, and as the agent of the other makers, Hood applied to the payees, Woodward & Dusenberry, for an advance of money on the note, for the benefit of all the makers jointly. Woodward & Dusenberry agreed with Hood to advance, on a pledge of the note, as security, $6 000; and Hood requested them to give him their certificate of deposit for that sum, to the credit of John Ritchey, cashier; which was done; and Ritchey, as payee, indorsed the paper to Hood. It was subsequently presented for payment by bona fide holders, and Woodward & Dusenberry paid the full amount thereof in cash.

At the time the certificate of deposit was given, and indorsed by Ritchey, and the fifteen thousand dollar note delivered to Woodward & Dusenberry, they agreed with Hood that if he should return to them the certificate of deposit, they would then surrender to him the note. The money advanced not having been refunded, except in part, this suit was brought in assumpsit to recover the balance.

In their answer to a bill of discovery, Woodward & Dusenberry admit they were advised by Hood that the $15,000 note "had been executed by himself and his friends, the other signers thereof, for the purpose of borrowing money thereon for the joint benefit of all of them;" also, "that at the time said note was delivered to the said Woodward & Dusenberry, they issued and delivered to said Hood, for the joint use and benefit of all the parties signing said note, as the respondent understood it, the certificate of deposit of said Woodward & Dusenberry for the sum of $6.000, by request of said Hood, made payable to the order of John Ritchey, Esq., cashier, at the office of said Woodward & Dusenberry in New York city, on the return of said certificate, and which said certificate was received by said Hood on behalf of himself and his associates as so much cash."

Upon this and other evidence in the case, the counsel for the defendants (the now plaintiffs in error) asked the court to instruct the jury, that if they should find, from the evidence, that Hood was only authorized to use the note to borrow money thereon for the joint benefit of himself and the other makers thereof, and that at the time the plaintiffs, Woodward & Dusenberry, received the same from Hood, and delivered to him the certificate of deposit, they had notice that Hood so held the note for the said purpose, then the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover of the defendants; which instruction the court refused to give, but did instruct the jury that the certificate of deposit so delivered to Hood was, in effect, money and came within the authority to borrow money. Exceptions were taken to the refusal to give the charge asked for, and to the charge as given.

They claimed that the court erred, insisting that a certificate of deposit is, in no sense, cash or money; it is simply an acknowledgment of a debt, with a promise of payment; that the transaction between Hood and Woodward & Dusenberry was simply the exchange of one form of negotiable security for another; and that this was clearly a breach of trust, and a perversion of the authority to use the note for the loan of money. And they refer to the following authorities in support of this position: Thorold v. Smith, 11 Mod., 71, 87; Burtlett v. Pentland, 10 Barn. & C., 760; Atkins v. Owen, 4 Ad. & Ellis, 819; Nightingale v. Devisone, 5 Burr., 2589. Here Woodward & Dusenberry had $6.000 in bank, or a broker's office, and the cashier gave a certificate to that effect, and promised to pay the money to the holder of the certificate who should present it. Hood could have taken out the money the next hour.

A certificate of this kind was a means of advance, that in all probability suited these borrowers, who resided in Ohio, quite as well as the gold or silver would have done. It was to the same effect as if Hood had received the money, and deposited the specie, subject to his own check on the cashier of the bank. This certificate was actually paid in cash to the agent of the parties to the note, for such the bona fide holder was.

To maintain, as we are asked in effect to do, that a check on a bank, payable at sight, to order, and indorsed in blank, and which an agent, to raise money on negotiable paper, took as money, and which check was presently paid to a bona fide holder by the cashier of the bank, was not money; that the note or bill purchased was not sold for money; that no title passed to the purchaser; and that the principal was not bound by the contract of the agent, would be a startling doctrine in the marts of commerce of this country, where money is usually transferred by bank checks, and may be fairly presumed to change hands on the check being given.

We order that the judgment be affirmed.

v.

BUSHROD W. FOLEY.

(See S. C., 21 How., 393, 394.)

Writ of error returnable 3d Monday of January, is void—cannot be amended—transcript withdrawn.

A writ of error returnable on the third Monday in January cannot be supported, and does not bring the case before the court.

In such case as the court cannot exercise a power of amendment, they can do nothing more than dismiss for want of jurisdiction.

But the plaintiff may withdraw the transcript, and use it in connection with the proper process to bring the case here.

Motion filed Feb. 18, 1859. Decided Feb. 21, 1859.

IN ERROR to the Court of Appeals of the State of Kentucky.

On motion, by the plaintiff in error, to remand, with leave to amend the writ of error.

The case is stated by the court.

Mr. T. Ewing, for plaintiff in error.

No counsel appeared for defendant in error.

Mr. Chief Justice Taney delivered the opinion of the court:

The writ of error in this case was issued on the 27th, day of December last, and made returnable on the third Monday in January, and the defendant in error cited to appear on that day.

It has already been decided at the present term, in the case of Insurance Co. of the Valley of Virginia v. Mordecai, that such writ of error cannot be supported, and does not bring the case before the court.

A motion has been made, on behalf of the plaintiff in error, to remand the case to the court below, with leave to amend the writ of error and citation. But, as the transcript stands, there is no case before us in which we can exercise a power of amendment. We can do nothing more than dismiss it for want of jurisdiction.

But if the plaintiff desires it, he may, in order to save expense, withdraw the transcript, and use it in connection with the proper and legal process to bring the case here; and if withdrawn, a receipt for it must be left with the clerk, but as it now stands, it must be dismissed for want of jurisdiction.

THE WHITE WATER VALLEY CANAL CO., Plffs. in Er.,

v.

HENRY VALLETTE ET AL.

Usury, when bonds not void for—fraud as to—agreement for mortgage or pledge, binding—where no loan, no usury—contingent profit, not power of corporation to make bonds—Legislature may legalize.

Where appellee agreed to complete the canal of appellants for a certain amount of interest-bearing bonds of the Company; held, that the bonds were not void for usury, although the amount of bonds was double the amount of money estimated as necessary to expend to complete the work, and although the bonds expressed that the principal sum thereby payable was a loan, the appellee having taken the risk of the contract on his own hands.

Where the appellee's proposal had been examined and adopted by appellant's board, and its conditions performed in good faith by the appellee, and the final settlement between the contracting parties was amicable; held, that there was no fraud or circumvention.

These facts are a bar to any relief from the contract on the ground of oppression.

A court of equity treats an agreement for a mortgage or pledge of bonds, or other property, as binding, and will give it effect according to the intention of the parties.

It is essential to usury in Indiana, that a certain gain, exceeding the legal rate of interest, should accrue to the lender as a consideration for the loan. Where there is no loan there can be no usury.

And where there is a loan, although the profit derived to the lender exceeds the legal rate, yet if that profit is contingent or uncertain, the contract, if bona fide and without any design to evade the statute, is not usurious.

A corporation, without special authority, may dispose of land, goods and chattels, or of any interest in the same, as it deems expedient; and in the course of their legitimate business may make a bond, mortgage, note, or draft; and also may make compositions with creditors, or an assignment for their benefit, except when restrained by law.

But, in January, 1845, the Legislature of Indiana passed an Act, that all the bonds which might be issued in accordance with the contract existing between the Company and Vallette were legalized.

When the Legislature relieves a contract from the imputation of illegality, neither of the parties to the contract are in a condition to insist on this objection.

Argued Feb. 1, 1859. Decided Feb. 21, 1859.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Indiana.

The bill in this case was filed in the court below, by the defendant in error, to recover on certain bonds.

The court below having entered a decree in favor of the complainant, the defendant sued out this writ of error.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. N. C. McLean and H. Stanbery, for plaintiff in error:

We now proceed to cite some authorities in support of the principles involved, and which may be stated broadly as follows:

1. Corporations are strictly limited to the exercise of those powers which are expressly granted to them, or are necessarily incident, either to the purposes of their existence, or to the proper enjoyment of their express powers.

2. An express grant of a specific power in one section of a charter, is a prohibition against the exercise of the same power by implication from the provisions of another section.

3. The express grant of a specific power is restrictive in its operation, and not only must the occasion for its exercise arise, but the method and manner of its execution must be strictly adhered to, according to the terms of the grant, or its exercise is a nullity.

4. A corporation may deny the validity of any contract which it may have entered into, without authority for so doing under its charter.

Beaty v. Knowler, 4 Pet., 164; Head v. Providence Ins. Co., 2 Cranch, 127; Perrine v. Ches. and Del. Can. Co., 9 How., 172; Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 13 Pet., 519; Commissioners, &c. v. Holcomb, 7 Ohio, part 1, 232; Bank of Chillicothe v. Swayne, 8 Ohio, 252; People v. Utica Ins. Co., 15 Johns., 358; N. Y. Firemen's Ins. Co. v. Ely, 2 Cow., 678; Idem., 5 Conn., 560; L. & F. Ins. Co. v. Mechanics' F. Ins. Co., 7 Wend., 31; The P. D. & M. Steam Nav. Co. v. Dandridge, 8 G. & J., 248; Farmers' Loan and Trust Co. v. Carroll, 5 Barb., 613.

These bonds are peculiar in their character. The 18th section provides for the issue of bonds identical in form and security with these, but only for the payment of a loan previously negotiated. We may search in vain through every other portion of this charter, for any other authority for this issue; and the cases which I have cited, support most conclusively the principle, that the express grant of the power here excludes the idea of its existence under any other section by implication. If, however, the other view of the case is taken, that these bonds were issued to Vallette, in conformity with the provisions of the 18th section, for a loan of money, and the contract was used merely as a device to cover up the terms of the loan, usury is clear.

(Counsel here reviewed the evidence and proceeded:)

Will a court of equity lend its power to give priority to one creditor over all others, at least equally meritorious, simply because that creditor has, by falsehood, apparently obtained the recognition of his priority as set forth in these bonds?

If the bonds were given in payment of a debt for work and labor in completing the canal, they are void for want of power to issue them for such purpose under the charter. If, on the other hand, the bonds were issued for a loan, as they purport upon their face, the usury is proved beyond the shadow of doubt, and the relief which they pray for, must be given to the company.

1 Rev. Stat. of Ind., p. 344.

We will not discuss the question whether this is or is not a loan of money. It is a matter of no importance.

I. Whatever be its name, the transaction is one which does not bring the case within the usury laws.

It is a contract to construct the canal at specified prices, and receive therefor payment in the bonds of the Company.

The work, at the contract prices, amounted to $112,000. It was paid for in the bonds of the Company, according to the contract.

Much better terms could have been got, if the Company had had cash to pay. But in the exchange of work for bonds, it was the best that could be done.

There was no money passed between the parties in the transaction. Vallette did the work under a contract, and took a lien on the work, to secure the payment of his bonds.

It is in equity just what the contract of a builder would be, who should contract for a lien on the rents of the house which he should build, until paid.

And it would not interfere at all with the builder's equity, if he demanded a higher price, payable in bonds at a distant day, than if he were to be paid in cash. If we did but know how much it would have cost him to insure the claim, we might determine whether the contract was reasonable.

Until this matter is settled, as the agreement was made between parties entirely competent to contract, we must presume it to be so.

II. It is no matter whether this be a loan or not.

The Corporation had a right, by its general powers, independently of the 18th section, to make this contract. It creates a lien that equity will enforce. The contract comes within the reason and spirit of the 18th section. If the Company is thereby authorized to pledge the tolls, &c., of the canal, for the repayment of money borrowed to construct, it is also authorized to make the pledge for construction directly.

III. But the Act of Jan. 4, 1845, removes all possible difficulty, if there were any. After the contract was made and executed by Vallette, it sanctions the contract and makes valid all bonds which shall be issued in pursuance of it.

If the Company had not the power already to issue these bonds, their issue after the Act is an acceptance of it.

The following authorities were cited and quoted by the counsel:

Thompson v. N. Y. & H. R. R. Co., 3 Sand. Ch., 626; James v. C. & H. R. R. Co., 6 Am. Law Reg., 718; Palmer v. Lawrence, 3 Sandf., 162; Steam Nav. Co. v. Weed, 17 Barb., 378; see, also, Sedgwick on Const., p. 90; Moss v. Rossie Lead M. Co., 5 Hill, 137.

The case last cited will be found to contain a very full collection and able analysis of all the leading authorities upon this subject.

The bond gives to Vallette an equitable lien on all the real and personal property of the Company, and it so declares in express terms.

The Company had power to make this contract, not only by express language and authority of the charter, but also by being authorized to build the canal. The Corporation has all the implied necessary and proper power to make such contracts as shall enable them to accomplish the great end of building the canal.

State, 88; Barry v. Exchange Co., 1 Sand. Ch., 289; Moss v. Oakley, 2 Hill, 265.

It is not competent for a corporation to deny its power to make a contract, and particularly where its power is not limited by its charter, and no prohibition clause is contained in the charter, and no general prohibitory law exists.

Bank of Chilicothe v. Town of Chillicothe, 7 Ohio, 2d part, 31, supra.

On the question of usury, the counsel cited cases of Andrews v. Pond, 13 Pet., 78; 4 Pet., 128; Andrews v. Russell, 7 Blackf., 475; 8 Ind., 27.

The Act of Jan. 4, 1845. was valid and effectual to confirm the contracts and bonds, even had there been any previous doubt on the question.

Johnson v. Bentley, 16 Ohio, 100; Lewis v. McElvain, 16 Ohio, 356.

Moreover, it is folly to talk about the transaction being a loan of money or of goods. All the evidence in the case contradicts such a supposition. If the real transaction is a contract and not an agreement of borrowing and lending, it cannot be usurious.

Mr Justice Campbell delivered the opinion of the court:

This controversy originated in a contract between the appellants and the appellee (Vallette), in which the latter agreed to complete that portion of the canal through the valley of White Water River that lies between the cities of Laurel and Cambridge, in Indiana.

In the year 1836, the State of Indiana projected the improvement of which this is a part, and prosecuted the work until 1842, at an expenditure of more than one million of dollars. In that year the appellants were incorporated, and the State surrendered the unfinished work to them, investing them with powers to continue it till its completion. In 1844 this Corporation became embarrassed in their affairs, and were unable to negotiate loans upon the pledge of their property. Their resources were inadequate to the demands of their enterprise, and there was fear that it would be abandoned, or at least inconveniently postponed. In July, 1844, the president of the Company applied to the appellee (Vallette) for assistance, and the reeult of their negotiation was, that the latter submitted a proposal to the Company to supply materials and to complete at his expense the canal, according to the plan of the chief engineer, by the 1st of September, 1845, for one hundred and twenty-five bonds of the Company, of $1,000 each, upon ten years' time, drawing interest at seven per cent. per annum, payable semi annually, he (Vallette) to pay in the paper of the Company $500 as a bonus.

This proposal was accepted, and a detailed contract was drawn out and executed, embracing some modifications not material to this dispute. The appellee agreed to construct in a substantial and workmanlike manner the sections of the canal, under the directions of the chief engineer, and according to particular specifications. The engineer was to decide whether the work had been performed agreeably to contract and the instructions of the engineer; and payment was to be made upon his certificate of the work done at the end of every sixty days. The contract was punctually performed by the appellee to the satisfaction of the Company, and upon a final settlement one hundred and sixteen bonds of $1,000 each were issued to him, one hundred and twelve bearing date the 1st of February, 1845, with interest at the rate of seven per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually at New York, the principal to be paid at ten years from date. These bonds contain recitals and stipulations as follows: that the principal sum is the first and only loan created by the Company under their charter for the completion of the canal; that the faith of the Company and their effects, real and personal, are pledged for the payment of the debt and interest; that these bonds shall have a preference over all debts to be thereafter contracted; that in default of the payment of interest, the holder of the bonds might enter into possession of the tolls, water rents, and other incomes of the Company; and might apply to any court of the State (federal or state) for the appointment of a receiver, and that the Company would not appeal to any other court; that they would pay ten per cent. as liquidated damages on the amount of the interest thus collected. The interest on these bonds was paid until August, 1854, since when the Corporation has been in default.

The appellees hold the one hundred and twelve bonds above described, and have filed this bill to enforce the covenants they contain by the appointment of a receiver. They allege that the Company is insolvent; that its stock has no value, and that the canal is exposed to dilapidation and ruin, and they have no ability to remedy such disasters.

The defendants resist the demand of the appellees. They aver that the president of the Company applied to Vallette for a loan of money; that Vallette was willing to advance the sum required, if he could make a profit of one hundred per cent., and the president and directors were ready to concede this profit. That the contract was made between them as a device and contrivance to evade the laws of Indiana upon the subject of interest and usury, and that the contract between the parties in its essence and spirit was a loan of money at that exhorbitant and usurious rate of interest. That the work was done by the Company through the superintendence of their engineer, and that Vallette paid out the money to contractors merely to secure its appropriation to the improvement of the canal to strengthen his security. That the amount expended was but $56,000, and the estimates of the engineer prior to the making of the contract did not exceed $65,000; and that the contract was arranged so that the profit of one hundred per cent. might be realized.

They complain that the exactions of the appellee were exorbitant and oppressive. That the canal has been exposed to disasters from heavy floods, and a debt has been created for reparations and improvements that is superior in dignity and merit to that of the appellee, and that he had waived his preference to induce them to make the advance.

In the absence of objections to the validity of these bonds, there can be no question concerning their legal operation and effect, or of the jurisdiction of a court of equity to enforce them. That court treats an agreement for a mortgage or pledge of bonds or other property, as binding, and will give it effect according to the intention of the contracting parties.

Duncan v. The Company of Proprietors of the Manchester Water-works, 8 Price, 697; Fector v. Philpott, 12 Price, 197; Seymour v. Canandaigua and N. F. R. R. Co., 25 Barb., 284.

In Fripp v. Chard Railway Company, 21 Eng. L. & Eq., 58, the Vice-Chancellor decided that the Court of Chancery might appoint a receiver of the property of a corporation created by Act of Parliament in favor of a mortgagee, although by the Act a committee was constituted to whom all the powers of management were referred. And at the present term of this court a receiver for the tolls of a bridge erected by a Corporation in Indiana was allowed by this court in favor of a judgment creditor, whose legal remedy had been exhausted. Covington Drawbridge Co. v. Shepherd, 21 How., 112 infra.

The question then arises, whether the contract between these parties, as disclosed by the pleadings and proofs, is valid. It is essential to the nature of usury in Indiana, that a certain gain, exceeding the legal rate of interest, should accrue to the lender as a consideration for the loan. Where there is no loan there can be no usury. State Bank v. Coquillard, 6 Ind., 282.

And where there is a loan, although the profit derived to the lender exceeds the legal rate, yet if that profit is contingent or uncertain, the contract, if bona fide and without any design to evade the statute, is not usurious. Cross v. Hepner, 7 Ind., 357.

The testimony does not support the averment of the answer, that this contract involved a device or contrivance to elude the prohibition of the statute. The president of the Corporation (Mr. Helm) testifies: "I know nothing of any such device or arrangement; I thought it was all right; and there was none, so far as I know or believe, to evade the Usury Laws of Indiana; nor was there any device or arrangement to cover up a loan of money from Vallette to said Company, as I know of no such loan." The testimony of the solicitor of the Corporation (Mr. Parker), who superintended all the negotiations, and drew the papers, is equally explicit. He says: "I am satisfied there was no device or management had or intended between said Vallette and the Canal Company, in the matter of this contract or otherwise, whatever, in this connection, to avoid any Usury Laws of the State of Indiana, or any other State. I never thought of such a thing myself, and never had an intimation of it from any other source; and had there been anything of the kind, I would certainly have known it, as I have said the whole matter in every shape it assumed was presented to me for my consideration. Vallette had all the risk of his contract on his own hands, until completed and taken off his hands by the Company. And I have a strong impression in my own mind, that in one if not more instances he suffered by that risk in consequence of damage done his work, while in progress, by high waters." In the absence of simulation in the contract, the reason assigned in the last sentences, quoted from the testimony of this witness, is conclusive on the question of the usury. These witnesses are sustained by their fellow-members of the board. The recital in the bonds, that this was a loan, is explained by the fact that the form of the bonds was settled after the work was finished, and with reference to their negotiability in New York, and the contract was regarded with favor by the Corporation, and the payment of interest was made without exception for several years. It is admitted that the contract provided prices for the work done, far exceeding the cash estimates of the engineer. This, the witnesses say, was the natural consequence of the embarrassment of the Company and their want of credit. But they prove that the proposal of Vallette was understood and considerately examined; that it was adopted by the Board, with only one dissentient vote; that its conditions were performed in good faith by the appellee, and that the final settlement between the contracting parties was amicable. There was on the part of the appellee no fraud or circumvention.

These facts oppose an insuperable bar to any relief from the contract on the ground of lesion or oppression. Harrison v. Guest, 35 Eng. L. & Eq., 487.

The remaining question for consideration is, whether it was competent for this Corporation to execute such securities as these bonds in fulfillment of their covenants in a construction contract, fairly made and executed by the other party. The 1st section of the Act of Incorporation endows the corporate body with faculties for suits, contracts, and all other things legitimate for such company to do; and "all the powers and privileges in anywise necessary and expedient to carry into effect the proper business" of the association. The 17th section establishes the president and directors as the governing body, and that "their regular and efficient doings not inconsistent with this charter" "shall in all cases be deemed the doings of the Company, and forever held valid as such."

The 18th section invests them with "full power to negotiate any loans that may be deemed expedient for carrying out all the objects contemplated by this Act; and for the payment of such loans, agreeably to the terms agreed upon, said Company shall bind themselves by their bonds, which bonds," &c., &c., &c., "shall be a valid lien upon all the stock and effects of said Company in the order of their issue, and all the effects of the Company, both real and personal, shall be deemed and taken as a pledge for the punctual payment of the interest on said bonds, and the ultimate redemption of the principal, agreeably to contract.

It is well settled that a corporation, without special authority, may dispose of land, goods, and chattels, or of any interest in the same, as it deems expedient, and in the course of their legitimate business may make a bond, mortgage, note, or draft; and also may make compositions with creditors, or an assignment for their benefit, with preferences, except when restrained by law.

Partridge v. Badger, 25 Barb., 146; Barry v. Merchants' Ex. Co., 1 Sandf. Ch., 280; Beers v. Phœnix Glass Co., 14 Barb., 358; Dana v. Bank of the U. S., 5 W. & S., 223; Frazier v. Willcox, 4 Rob., 517; U. S. Bank v. Huth, 4 B. Mon., 423; The State v. Bank of Md., 6 Gill & J., 205; Pierce v. Emery, 32 N. H., 486.

But, in addition to the general powers of the Corporation, in this instance there is "full power" (specially conferred) to negotiate any loan or loans that the Company might deem expedient for carrying out any or all of the objects of the Act. We should find great difficulty in deciding that the Corporation was restrained by the laws concerning interest and usury, in view of the comprehensive language of the 18th section of the Act. Those laws rest upon considerations of policy applicable, for the most part, to individuals engaged in their ordinary business; and the Legislature might well conclude that a numerous body, engaged in a public enterprise, under the direction of an intelligent board, might be trusted with a plenary control of their property or credit, to accomplish the aim of the association.

If the rights of the appellees depended upon the Act of Corporation alone, it would be difficult to resist them. But, in January, 1845, the Legislature of Indiana passed an Act, that recites the Corporation had entered into a contract with Vallette to complete the canal, and was to be paid in their bonds, drawing the legal interest in New York, and doubts were entertained as to the legality of the issue of these bonds; and thereupon it was enacted, that all the bonds which might be issued in accordance with the contract existing between the Company and Vallette, were legalized. A large portion of the work specified in the contract was performed after this enactment, and the settlement under which these bonds were issued took place subsequently. This act implies that there was no illegality in the fact that bonds were employed as a medium of payment for supplies of materials for, or work and labor done upon, the canal.

The objection that a contract was illegal, and that no judgment can, therefore, be rendered upon it, is not allowed from any consideration of favor to those who allege it. The courts, from public considerations, refuse their aid to enforce obligations which contravene the laws or policy of the State. When the Legislature relieves a contract from the imputation of illegality, neither of the parties to the contract are in a condition to insist on this objection. Andrews v. Russell, 7 Black., 475; 8 Ind., 27.

Upon a review of the whole case, it is the opinion of the court that the contract between these parties was made without fraud or surprise; that there is no illegality in the cause, or consideration; that the priority of payment has not been released or defeated; and that the relief sought is within the competency of a court of equity to allow.

Decree affirmed.

School lots in donation tract, how selected—facts showing selection.

The Act of March 18, 1818, granting one hundred thousand acres, called the donation tract, did not authorize the Register to select the school lots in that tract.

The Act of March 3, 1803, conferred that power on the Secretary of the Treasury.

The fact that they were not sold, nor offered for sale, and were claimed as school lands; that the trustees for the township took possession of them; the indorsement on the plat of the lots, of the word "school"; that this township had no school lands assigned to it, unless the lots referred to were assigned; were proper to be submitted to the jury, from which they might have presumed that the lots had been duly selected by the Secretary of the Treasury for school lots.

Argued Jan. 24, 1859. Decided Feb. 22, 1859.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Ohio.

This was an action of ejectment brought in the court below, by the plaintiff in error, to recover 100 acre lot, No. 8, in the donation tract, Marietta District, Ohio.

The plaintiff, on the trial, gave in evidence a patent from the United States conveying said lands to Samuel A. H. Marks, in fee simple, and a regular chain of title from Marks to himself. The defendant claimed to hold the premises under a lease from the Trustees of Township 9, Range 11., in the County of Morgan, and in the district of lands subject to sale at Chillicothe, who leased them to him as school lands for the use of said Township.

The trial below resulted in a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, with damages assessed at one cent, subject, however, to the opinion of the court on the law involved. The court having set aside the verdict and entered judgment for the defendant, the plaintiff sued out this writ of error.

The legislation of Congress under which the cause arises, as well as the precise point upon which the case turned in this court, appears in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. S. F. Vinton and J. J. Coombs, for plaintiff in error.

Mr. John E. Hanna, for the defendant in error.

By the Act of 21st of April, 1792, there was granted to Rufus Putnam and others, known as the Ohio Company, one hundred thousand acres of land in the Marietta District, in the territory northwest of the Ohio River. The object of Congress and the grantees seems to have been to cause the country to be inhabited by making donations, through the Company, to actual male settlers, of one hundred acres each; and all of the tract not thus disposed of within five years from the date of the grant, reverted, by its terms, to the United States, as public lands. The ordinary laws for surveying by ranges, townships and sections, did not apply to this tract, nor to the surplus that might revert, as ordinary surveys would have thrown the townships and sections into fractions, by the hundred-acre lots previously disposed of by the Company.

By compact, the United States stipulated to give to the State of Ohio one thirty-sixth part of the public lands in that State, for the use of schools; and the 16th section of each township was the land thus contracted to be given, in cases where there were regular surveys in townships of six miles square; and, by the Acts of April 30, 1802, and March 3, 1803 (sec. 3), Congress further stipulates that the lands previously promised "for the use of schools, in lieu of such of the sections number sixteen as have been otherwise disposed of, shall be selected by the Secretary of the Treasury, out of the unappropriated reserved sections in the most contiguous townships."

By the Act of March 18, 1818, Congress directed the lands in the Ohio Company's donation tract to be surveyed by the Surveyor-General, separating that conveyed to settlers, from that not conveyed, and belonging to the United States by reversion. This latter land he was to lay off into townships and sections, or into one-hundred-acre lots, conforming them to the plan observed by the Company, when providing for actual settlers. And he was ordered to make returns of the surveys to the General Land Office, and to the Register of the Land Office at Marietta. The lands were laid off into one hundred-acre tracts, and these tracts the Act orders to be sold, "with the exception of the usual proportion for the support of schools." By the President's proclamation, they were offered for sale on the first Monday in June, 1819. There was no reservation to the general order of sale, except of such lands as the Secretary should select, according to the power vested in him by the Act of 1803, for the use of schools; and it is a fair presumption, that the Register offered all the lands for sale that were not reserved. But the difficulty is, that for the lands in dispute there might have been no bidder when they were offered. That the Secretary had the power to reserve school lots, and to bind the United States and the townships to his selection, is very clear; and we think it is equally clear that the Register of the Marietta District had no power to designate these school lots. As a subordinate, he could lawfully record the orders of the Secretary in this respect, but could do no binding act himself.

Six of the lots of one hundred acres each, lying in a body, and square form, together with lot No 84, adjoining on the east, were not sold (including No. 8, the lot in dispute).

On the tract book found in the office of the Register at Marietta, and by which the sales of 1819 were governed, the word "school" was written on the plot of each of the seven lots; but whether made as early as 1819, or afterwards, does not appear; nor, whether the then Register (Wood) put the designation there by order of the Secretary.

It is admitted that the School Commissioners took possession of the land sued for in 1834, and have held it ever since by their lessee: and it is also admitted that township nine, range eleven, which claims the lots marked "school," is without school lands, unless the lots thus designated belong to it as such.

On the return made of the surveys to the General Land Office in 1818, there is no indication that a reservation of any land was made for township nine, range eleven.

The manner in which the Secretary should authenticate his selections was not prescribed by Congress, and depends in this case on evidence not found of record. It must be proved by circumstances, and cannot be proved in any other way.

Another consideration is pressed on the court, on the part of the plaintiff, to overcome the fact that this designation is of no value, to wit: that the Secretary of the Treasury, by his letter of July 13, 1805, directed land equal to one section on the southern part of the donation tract to be laid off as compensation for section sixteen, in township five, range ten, the school tract in township five having been otherwise appropriated; and hence it happened, as is alleged, that the Register marked the lots in controversy "school." In 1805, the lots thus marked had not been surveyed; and each one hundred-acre lot is marked on the tract book of surveys returned in 1818; and as the trustees took the school land for township five, range ten, elsewhere, the argument has not much force.

It is also insisted that, in point of fact, the entire section No. 16, in township nine, range eleven, remained undisposed of by the Ohio Company, and was subject to be appropriated by the Commissioners of the township for school purposes; and therefore no claim could be set up by them to lands elsewhere. The Act of April 30th, 1802, section 7, provides that the 16th section of every township shall be granted to the inhabitants of the same for the use of schools. But, then, the 16th section is a designated portion of land that may result from an execution of the public surveys made by the United States, according to the rules and regulations Congress had made or might make. Until ranges were established, and the lands surveyed into townships or sections, no title to any definite land vested in the township. It had no authority to survey and ascertain the 16th section. This authority was reserved exclusively to the United States, and to be exercised as part of the political power. Now, as the 16th section of township nine, range eleven, never was legally ascertained, and as no other evidence could be heard to fix its identity than a survey approved by the department, established for the distribution and sale of the public lands, the assumption that the land was unappropriated where the 16th section would have fallen, had a survey in fact been made of the township, amounts to nothing. Cases affecting school lands, in Ohio and elsewhere, come under the rule laid down in the noted case of General Green's grant of twenty-five thousand acres, in the military district of North Carolina (2 Wheat., 19). The Legislature of that State made the grant by an Act of Assembly; having made it, it reserved the power to locate the land by survey through its officers. The land being surveyed, and the survey returned and recorded in the proper land office, it was held by this court that the title attached to the land designated, on the obvious legal ground that the State of North Carolina was estopped to disavow its own Act in defining by survey the precise land granted; and so, also, General Green and his heirs were estopped to call in question the validity of the definite location, the authority to locate by survey having been reserved by the granting power. So, here the granting power reserved the right to ascertain and identify the land granted to the schools. Until this was done, no title could be taken of any particular tract; and when the location was made by authority of the United States, each party was estopped to deny its binding force. It was, in fact, a title by mutual estoppel.

We now come to the precise case presented on the trial below. The jury were instructed:

1st. "That the proofs and legal presumptions sustaining the title of the defendant must have reference solely to, and be based upon, the Act of Congress, approved March 18, 1818, entitled 'An Act providing for the sale of certain lands in the District of Marietta,' &c., in connection with the Act of the 21st of April, 1792, granting to Rufus Putnam and others, as agents and trustees, one hundred thousand acres, called the donation tract; and that, in the absence of any express authority to any other officer to make the selection of school lands in said donation tract, by a fair construction of said Act of 1818, the Register of the Land Office at Marietta rightfully exercised such authority."

2d. "That all the evidence and admissions of facts in the case raised a legal presumption that the said Register of the Land Office at Marietta had exercised the authority so vested in him by said Act of March 18, 1818, prior to the entry and patent under which the plaintiff claims title, by legally selecting the lands in controversy in this suit (with other lands) for the support of schools in said township nine, in range eleven, and it was, therefore, their duty to return a verdict for the defendant."

The first instruction assumes that the Act of 1818 authorized the Register to select the school lots in the donation tract; whereas the 3d section of the Act of March 3, 1803, conferred the exclusive power on the Secretary of the Treasury, and therefore the instruction is erroneous.

The second instruction declares that the evidence and admissions of facts in the case raised a legal presumption "that said Register had exercised the authority vested in him by the Act of 1818, prior to the entry and patent under which the plaintiff claims title," &c.

As the Register had no power to select, it could not be held that he had legally selected; nor did he make the entry on the tract book in due form, had he been instructed by the Secretary to record his selection.

The word "school," appearing on the tract book, has much significance; but, standing alone, it did not authorize the Circuit Court to presume, as matter of law, that the lands had been selected by order of the Secretary. If his letter to the Register, directing him to make the selection, had been produced, and taken in connection with the designation, then we think the court would have been warranted in making the legal presumption.

The narrow point in this cause is, did the Secretary select the land in controversy (with other lots) for the use of schools. If he did, then the title of the United States was devested thereby, and the lands withdrawn from sale. There are numerous facts tending to prove that they were selected. 1st. They were not sold, nor is it at all probable that they were offered for sale, in 1819. If they are of good quality, and favorably situated, a jury may be satisfied that, had they been offered to bidders at the public sale, they would have been purchased. 2d. They were claimed as school lands, selected for township nine, range eleven. 3d. The trustees for the township took possession of them, and leased them out as early as 1834; and their tenant is yet in possession and here sued. 4th The indorsement, on the plot of the lots, of the word "school," indicates, to some extent, that they had been selected by the proper authority. What weight this may have, it will be proper to leave to the jury. 5th. That this township had no school lands assigned to it, unless the lots referred to were assigned.

These facts, with others, were proper to be submitted to the jury, from which they might have presumed that the lots had been duly selected.

In the language of the Supreme Court of Ohio, in the case of Coombs and Ewing v. Lane, 4 Ohio, 112—"Facts presumed are as effectually established as facts proved, where no presumption is allowed." That was a suit for the possession of this same land, and involved the same evidence this case does, and presented the same questions of law. But there, the cause was submitted to the Circuit Court on the law and the facts, without the intervention of a jury, and the Supreme Court was appealed to in order to reverse the opinion of the lower court, on a motion for a new trial. The state courts dealt with both facts and law; whereas, here, the jury must deal with the facts and presumptions, under the instructions of the court, as respects the law.

We order the judgment of the Circuit Court to be reversed, and remand the cause for another trial.

JOHN J. ANDERSON ET AL.

What is final decree—power of Circuit Court to remand case—defect of jurisdiction cannot be cured by amendment.

Where a steamboat was sold by the Marshal, and the proceeds paid into the District Court, which decreed that the sum claimed by the petitioners was due from the fund then in court, to the petitioners, but that, as the fund might not be sufficient to satisfy all claims that might be established against the vessel, no order for the payment of the money would be made by the court until it should be further advised in the premises; held, that there was no final decree upon which an appeal would lie. The decree was not final, even as to the amount in controversy between the parties.

The Circuit Court, therefore, had no jurisdiction of the case, and their judgment, affirming the decree, was erroneous on that ground. The appeal ought to have been dismissed for want of jurisdiction.

But if the appeal had been regularly before the Circuit Court, it was not authorized to remand the case to the District Court, to carry into execution its decisions.

As the defect of jurisdiction in the Circuit Court appeared upon the transcript, it could not be cured by an amendment in this court, because consent cannot give jurisdiction, nor legalize it when exercised without the authority at law.

Argued Feb. 11, 1859. Decided Feb. 28, 1859.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Missouri.

On motion to dismiss.

The history of the case and a statement of the facts appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. T. Polk, for appellants.

Mr. J. H. Rankin, for appellees.

Mr. Chief Justice Taney delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellees in this case filed a petition in the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Missouri, stating that they had, by the laws of Missouri, a lien on the steamboat Republic for $2,000, which they had loaned to the clerk of the boat to purchase supplies and necessaries, in order to enable her to proceed on a voyage from St. Louis to New Orleans; that the vessel, at the time the petition was filed, was under seizure in the district, in a case of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, and had been ordered by the court to be sold; and the petitioners prayed that they might be permitted to intervene in their own interest, and be paid out of the proceeds when the steamboat was sold.

The appellants answered, stating that they were owners of seven eighths of the vessel, and denying that the money was needed or used for supplies; and insisting that the boat is not liable for it, and that it is not a lien by the laws of Missouri.

The petition was filed on the 3d of June, 1857, and the vessel, it appears, was sold by the Marshal, upon the seizure mentioned in the petition, and the sale reported and the proceeds paid into the registry of the court on the 28d of the same month. The proceeds amounted to $26,250. Further proceedings were had on the petition of the appellees, and testimony taken; and on the 7th of September, in the same year, the District Court decreed that the sum claimed by the petitioner was due, with interest and costs, and a lien on The Republic, and referred the matter to the commissioner of the court to compute and report the amount due.

The commissioner accordingly made his report, stating the amount due for principal and interest on the sum loaned, to be $2,084. This report was confirmed by the court; and thereupon the court passed a decree, adjudging that there was due from the fund then in court, to the petitioners, the sum of $2,084, and to bear interest from that day; but that, inasmuch as some of the causes against The Republic had not then been determined, and the fund in court might not be sufficient to satisfy all of the claims that might be established against the vessel, no order for the payment of the money would be made by the court until it should be further advised in the premises.

The present appellants thereupon prayed an appeal to the Circuit Court for the District of Missouri, which was granted; and further proceedings took place in the Circuit Court, and further testimony was taken. And, at the October Term, 1857, the decree of the District Court was affirmed, and the case remanded to the District Court to carry out this decree; and from this decree the appellants prayed an appeal to this court.

This is substantially the case, as it appears on the transcript from the Circuit Court. We do not now speak of the admissions filed here, which we shall presently notice. But, upon the transcript itself, it appears that there was no final decree in the District Court, upon which an appeal would lie to the Circuit Court; no final disposition of the fund in the registry. Indeed, it was not final even as to the amount in controversy between these parties; for the amount to be awarded to the appellees was made to depend upon the amount of other claims upon the fund, which were then depending before the District Court. And, under the Act of Congress, no appeal would lie from the District to the Circuit Court until there was a final decree upon the whole case—that is, not until all the claims on the money in the registry had been ascertained and adjusted, and the whole amount of the proceeds of the sale of the vessel distributed, by the decree, among the parties which the District Court deemed to be entitled, according to their respective priorities and rights.

The Circuit Court, therefore, had no jurisdiction of the case, as it came before them; and their judgment, affirming the decree, was erroneous on that ground. The appeal ought to have been dismissed for want of jurisdiction. This point was directly decided in this court, in the case of Mordecai et al. v. Lindsay et al., 19 How., 200.

But if the appeal had been regularly before the Circuit Court, it was not authorized to remand the case to the District Court, to carry into execution its decisions. The appeal carries up the res, or money in the registry, of the District Court, to the Circuit Court; and when the rights of the parties are adjudicated there, the court must carry into execution its own decree.

In order to cure these defects in the record, an agreement has been filed in this court, in which they admit that the whole fund has been finally disposed of by the Circuit Court among the claimants, with the exception of the sum in controversy between these parties. And they move to amend the record here according to this agreement.

But, in the case of Mordecai et al. v. Lindsay et al., above referred to, a similar motion was made to amend the record here, upon a like agreement. But the court decided that, as the defect of jurisdiction in the Circuit Court appeared upon the transcript, it could not be cured by an amendment in this court, because consent cannot give jurisdiction, nor legalize jurisdiction exercised without the authority at law. The rule laid down in that case must govern this.

The decree of the Circuit Court must, therefore, be reversed, and the case remanded to the court, with directions to dismiss the appeal for want of jurisdiction.

The District Court can then proceed to pass a final decree, if that has not been already done; and from that decree any party who may think himself aggreived may appeal to the Circuit Court, and from the final decree of that court to this, where the sum in controversy is large enough to give jurisdiction to the respective courts upon such appeals.

This view of the subject makes it unnecessary to examine whether the amount in controversy between the parties in this appeal is over $2,000; for their respective rights have not been judicially decided upon in the Circuit Court, for want of jurisdiction, as above stated, when it acted upon the controversy.

Bills—and notes, negotiability of, after payment—accommodation indorsers—transfer, as collateral security—liability of trustee.

On payment of bill of exchange by the indorser, it does not cease to be assignable.

The various indorsers to an accommodation bill, where no consideration has passed as among themselves, are not, unless by special agreement, bound to pay in equal proportions as co-sureties.

The fact that the bills were assigned to the plaintiff as collateral security for a pre-existing debt, does not impair his right to recover.

Where in action against trustee the averments in regard to the assignment nowhere show that the trustee had sufficient funds in his hands, after complying with the terms of the trust, to pay this bill, the pleadings are defective.

Argued Jan. 19, 1859. Decided Mar. 4, 1859.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Indiana.

This was an action of assumpsit, brought in the court below by the appellees against Enoch McCarty, as indorsee of a bill of exchange. The defendant pleaded eight pleas in bar of the action, some of which were afterwards withdrawn. The plaintiffs demurred to each plea. The court sustained the demurrers and called a jury to assess plaintiffs' damages. The said jury assessed the damages at $5,284.50, and the court entered judgment accordingly, whereupon the defendant took an appeal to this court.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Mr. O. H. Smith, for the plaintiffs in error:

We submit the following legal porpositions:

1. That a joint and co-surety cannot assign the bill, except to a bona fide holder, before due and without notice.

2. That an indorser's liability is only for the consideration money which he received, and interest thereon as against such holders.

3. That a pledgee of an overdue bill takes it subject to all equities.

Vallette v. Mason, 1 Cart. Ind., 288.

4. That a party taking it for security for a prior debt, parts with nothing, and does not take it in course of trade, and is not a bona fide holder.

Coddington v. Bay, 20 Johns., 637; Stalker v. McDonald, 6 Hill, 93.

5. The bill was not negotiable in Holland's hands, with E. Tyner's name subsequent to his, still on it.

Beck v. Robley, 1 H. Bl., note 89; 3 Maule & S., 97; Guild v. Eager, 17 Mass., 615.

The counsel then reviewed the pleadings, especially the 7th and 8th pleas (see opinion of the court, page 439) contending that they were good. In support of this position, he cited Stalker v. McDonald, 6 Hill, 93; Byles, Bills, 114; 1 Litt., 290; Cox v. Hodge, 7 Blackf., 146; 8 Barn. & C., 345; 9 Barn. & C., 241; 18 Wend., 478; 4 Pike, 546; 15 Mass., 534; 2 Cai. Cas., 200; 21 Pick., 195; 9 Met., 511; 4 N. H., 221; 5 Den., 307; 12 N. Y., 466; 13 Ala., 422.

Our positions, as applicable to the several pleas, are distinctly these:

First. That as the bill was received by the appellees after it was due and dishonored, they took it with notice that it was subject to all prior equities between the parties.

Byles, Bills, 129, 130, and numerous authorities, tit. Transfer.

Second. That this case rests upon the same legal defense that could be set up in a suit between the indorsers of a bill, as to their equities, if the action had been brought by one of them after paying the bill against the defendant. The same authorities as above.

Third. That co-sureties are liable to contribution as between themselves, after the payment of the bill.

Byles, Bills, 199; Kemp v. Finden, 12 M. & W., 421, and authorities cited to fourth position.

Fourth. That if one co-surety takes up the bill, he cannot maintain an action up it against a co surety, but may use it as evidence of the amount paid, in an action of assumpsit for money laid out and expended, in which he may recover in contribution the equitable pro rata proportion of the money he has actually paid from his co-surety.

Done v. Whalley, 17 L J. Exch., 225; S. C., 2 Exch., 198; Gale v. Walsh, 5 T. R., 239; Rogers v. Stephens, 2 T. R., 713; Orr v. Maginnis, 7 East., 359.

Fifth. That although the indorsers are prima facie liable to each other in the order in which their names stand upon the bill, yet it lies in averment in the pleadings that they are co-sureties, and parol proof is admissible as between them, to show the true state of their liability. The same principles applies in suits brought by an indorsee of the bill against a remote indorser, when the bill was taken after it was due and dishonored.

Sixth. That if the principal places funds or property in the hands of one co-surety sufficient to pay the bill in trust for that purpose, and such co-surety takes up the bill from the holder, he cannot sue his co-surety on the bill, nor for contribution, until he has exhausted the assets of the principal in his hands.

Seventh. That time given by the holder to one co-surety for the payment of the bill to the prejudice of another co-surety, upon a contract binding upon the holder, without the assent of the other co-surety, discharges such other co-surety from liability upon the bill.

It is admitted that these authorities speak of principal and surety; but we maintain that the principles decided apply to the holder and a co-surety, the case before this court.

Eight. That after a bill is taken up from the holder by a co-surety, it is no longer available in the hands of such co-surety, or his indorsee who takes it with notice after due and dishonored, so as to enable such co surety taking up the bill, or such indorsee, to maintain an action on the bill against any other co-surety.

Ninth. That a plea can only be demurred to specially for duplicity, in which case the demurrer must point out a duplicity specially; and if the plaintiff, instead of demurring, replies to the plea, his replication must answer so much of the plea as it assumes to answer; and if it assumes to answer the whole plea and only answers a part, it is bad on demurrer.

Tenth. It is no ground of even special demurrer, that a plea contains surplusage; the doctrine of utile per inutile non vitiatur (1 Chit. Pl., 547) applies.

It is important that the court should keep in mind that the bill of exchange in this case was received by the appellees after it was due and dishonored, and therefore subject to all the equities of prior parties.

Mr. R. H. Gillet, for defendant in error:

The only questions which this case present for the consideration of the court relate to the sufficiency of the pleas as a bar to the action, and of the replication as an answer to the 6th plea.

The 3d plea assumes that some of the parties to the bills in question sustain towards each other the relation of co sureties, but this is a mistake. The undertaking of sureties is a joint undertaking; but that of the parties to these bills, is separate and successive.

McDonald v. Magruder 3 Pet., 470; Wilson v. Stanton, 6 Blackf., 507.

It is not sufficient in pleading to state that a certain relation exists between the parties; but the facts which create such relation must be stated.

1. Chit. Pl., 578; Gould Pl., 357.

As the plea in question simply assumes that Holland was one of the indorsers and co-sureties, instead of stating the facts on which that assumption is based, it is bad under the rule, unless it can be maintained that upon the payment of a bill by an indorser, it ceases to be assignable; but the law is otherwise.

Callow v. Lawrence, 3 Maule & S., 95; Hubbard v. Jackson, 4 Bing., 390; Graves. v Key, 3 B. & Ad., 313.

The 5th plea is also bad. It is immaterial where the parties to the bills resided when they were made, or whether they were accommodation bills or bills drawn, accepted and indorsed in the regular course of business, as the plea admits that they were gotten up in order to enable the acceptor to borrow money thereon of the bank, at and by which they were discounted. The only statements in this plea which bear any resemblance to a valid defense, are the allegations that the bank at which the bills were discounted is still the holder and owner thereof, and that the indorsers were joint and co-sureties thereof. The first of these allegations is negatived in a subsequent part of the plea, and the second disposed of by the notice which has been taken of the 3d plea.

The counsel then reviewed the 6th plea and the replication thereto, with reference principally to the facts in the case. The insufficiency of the 1st plea is apparent, from what has been said respecting the 3d.

The 8th plea commences with the allegation that the bill mentioned in the 1st and 2d counts of the declaration, are one and the same bill. It is for that cause bad, as amounting to the general issue.

1 Chit. Pl., 559.

Instead of stating the facts on which the defense rests, it sets forth evidence tending to prove those facts. It is therefore an arugmentative plea, and bad on special demurrer. It is also bad for repugnancy. Above all these and similiar objections, stands the fact that the plea does not state facts sufficient to constitute a defense. It is a settled doctrine that the legal effect of a written instrument cannot be varied by proof of a contemporaneous parol agreement.

Wilson v. Black, 6 Blackf., 509; Norton v. Coons, 6 N. Y., 33.

But had there been a valid agreement made by and between the drawer and indorsers of the bill in question, that they, in the event of the failure of the acceptor should contribute equally in the payment of the bill, would that fact preclude a recovery in this case? On this point I refer the court to Burrough v. Moss, 10 B. & C., 558; Whitehead v. Walker, 10 M. & W., 696; Sturtevant v. Ford, 4 M. & Gr., 101; Hughes v. Large, 2 Pa. St., 103.

Again, the 8th, and all the other pleas, profess to be an answer to the whole action, and as a matter of course are bad, unless they disclose a valid defense to the entire demand. On this point it is submitted, that although the drawer and indorsers may, by virtue of some agreement or understanding between them, bear towards each other the relation of co-sureties, yet Holland, who took the bill up, held it as a valid security against the defendant for the sum due from him under such agreement, and that it is now held by the plaintiffs. But as none of the pleas disclose the facts on which the assumption that the drawer and indorsers stand in that relation towards each other, the court cannot ascertain their rights and liabilities.

This is a writ of error to the District Court of Indiana.

The action was brought on a bill of exchange for $4,500, dated October 16, 1054, drawn by Tyner and Childers, of Peru, Indiana, on Richard Tyner, of New York, and made payable to the defendant sixty days after date, at the office of Winslow Lanier, & Co., in the City of New York; which bill, at sight, was accepted by the drawee, and afterwards by the payee assigned to one Holland, who subsequently assigned it to Ezekiel Tyner, by whom it was afterwards assigned to the plaintiffs. Payment of the bill was refused at maturity, and it was protested for non-payment. Due notice was given.

The defendant pleaded eight pleas in bar of the action; the first, second and fourth being withdrawn, it is only necessary to notice the third, fifth, sixth, seventh and eighth.

The third plea states that George Holland, who is one of the indorsers and co-sureties thereof, before the commencement of this suit, on the 21st day of December, 1854, fully paid the bill to the Richmond branch of the State Bank of Indiana, who was then and there the holder and owner of the same; and that the plaintiffs received the same after they became due, and were so paid.

This plea assumes that one of the indorsers and co-sureties, paid the bill. In McDonald v. Magruder, 3 Pet., 470, and in Wilson v. Stanton, 6 Blackf., 507, the doctrine was laid down that co-sureties are bound to contribute equally to the debt they have jointly undertaken to pay; but the undertaking must be joint, not separate and successive. The liabilities must arise from the indorsements, and not from a distinct agreement to pay the face of the bill jointly; the plea does not necessarily import a joint undertaking; the facts on which the joint liability is founded must be stated. On the payment of the bill by the indorser, it does not cease to be assignable.

The allegations in the fifth plea are not sufficient to bar the action. Several of the matters so stated have no direct bearing on the points made. The various parties to an accommodation bill, where no consideration has passed as among themselves, are not, unless by special agreement, bound to pay in equal proportions as co-sureties. The averments of the plea are defective in not stating there was an agreement between the drawers and indorsers of the bills of exchange to contribute equally in paying them.

Nor does the fact that the bills were assigned to the plaintiff as collateral security for a pre-existing debt, impair the plaintiff's right to recover.

The sixth plea alleges that no consideration passed between said drawer, acceptor or indorsers, for said bills, and that the same remained in the hands of R. Tyner until negotiated by him to the Richmond Bank, for his benefit. And afterwards, and before said bill became due, to wit: on the 1st of October, 1854, R. Tyner, Tyner & Childers, and E. Tyner & Co., failed, and made a general assignment of their property, rights, &c., to Holland, Abner McCarty, and R. H. Tyner: and Holland accepted the trust, and became the active trustee; that the assignments were made for the debts and liabilities, first, to indemnify and save harmless Abner McCarty; second, to indemnify and save harmless Holland, said plaintiff, and N. D. Gallion, in proportion to their respective liabilities, and next for the payment of other debts and trusts. The property so assigned is averred to have been of the value of $150,000, and amply sufficient to pay the bills in suit, &c., and that Holland, on July 1, 1855, delivered said bills, indorsed in blank to said plaintiff, as collateral security for a pre-existing debt of Richard Tyner to said plaintiff, all of which was known to the plaintiff.

To this plea the plaintiff replied, that the said E. Tyner & Co. did not, each nor either of them, make an assignment of their property, rights, credits or effects, to the said Holland, McCarty, and Tyner, as stated in sixth plea of the defendant; but it is true that the said Richard Tyner, in 1854, made an assignment of said property, rights and effects, to the said Holland, McCarty and Tyner, and in trust: first, to indemnify and save harmless the said Abner McCarty as a creditor and surety of the said Richard Tyner; second, to indemnify and save harmless the said Holland, N. D. Gallion, Ezekiel Tyner, and the said plaintiff, as creditors and securities; but the plaintiff says the property, rights, credits and effects, so assigned to the said Holland, McCarty and Richard H. Tyner, were and still are wholly insufficient in value to indemnify and save harmless the said McCarty as such creditor and surety, so that there are now no effects or money of the said R. Tyner from which the bill could be paid, or any part thereof.

This replication was demurred to, but it was sufficient, and the demurrer was properly overruled.

In the seventh plea, which was amended, an agreement is alleged between the bank and Holland, that if Holland would give his notes to the bank, bearing six per cent. interest, with real and personal security, payable by installments on the 1st day of January, 1856, 1857, and 1858, the bank would extend the times of payment as above stated, which was agreed to by Holland, the bank being then the holder of the bills; and that this was done without the consent or knowledge of defendant. And it is further alleged that the above bills were, after due, delivered to said plaintiff by said Holland, as collateral security for a pre-existing liability of said Holland, and for no other consideration.

To this plea there was a demurrer on the ground that there was no agreement between Holland, E. Tyner & Co., and the defendant, that on the failure of Richard Tyner to pay the bills of exchange, Holland, E. Tyner & Co., and the defendant, jointly, or in equal proportions, should pay them. There was no sufficient averment to this effect. The delivery of the bills to the plaintiff, as collateral security for a pre-existing debt, under the decision of Swift v. Tyson, 16 How., 1, was legal. The demurrer was properly sustained.

In his eighth plea, the defendant says that the bills of exchange, in the declaration mentioned, are one and the same identical bills, and not other or different; that defendant never indorsed but one bill of the amount and date stated. He further says, that the firm of Tyner & Childers consisted of Richard Tyner, James N. Tyner and William Childers; and that of E. Tyner & Co., of Richard Tyner, and Ezekiel Tyner, and Childers, and that said R. Tyner drew said bill in the name of Tyner & Childers, and accepted the same in his own name, and indorsed the same in the name of E. Tyner & Co.; that each of the parties, with the said George Holland and this defendant, were at the time of drawing, accepting, and indorsing, citizens of Indiana; that the bill of exchange was discounted by the said bank, and the proceeds paid to Richard Tyner; that said indorsers were co-sureties thereon; and it was understood the said defendants, the said George Holland and Ezekiel Tyner, were each to be co sureties, and liable to pay a pro rata share of said bill; and each of said parties have, since the indorsing of said bill, admitted a liability, with the others, in case of insolvency of prior parties, for whose benefit said bill was so made to contribute towards payment.

And the defendant further says, that before the bill became payable, the said Tyner & Childers, and the said R. Tyner and E. Tyner & Co., failed, and each of said firms made a general assignment of lands, goods, property and effects, of the value of $1,000 to $5,000, to one H. J. Shirk; first, to pay depositors; second, debts for which A. Mc Carty and Holland were liable; and also for the payment of debts to plaintiffs, and liabilities to them, the said R. Tyner assigned property and effects, amounting in value to between $60,000 and $150,000, to Holland, McCarty, and R. Tyner, in trust: first, to indemnify and save harmless Abner McCarty; and second, this defendant and George Holland, the said plaintiffs, and N. D. Gallion, in proportion to their respective liabilities for him, and then for payment of other debts upon other trusts; and Holland became active for the execution of the trust, and took up of the Richmond Bank the bill of which it was holder, and by giving new notes of the said Holland for this and other debts of the said Tyner and Holland, and others, amounting to over $20,000, which sums were payable subsequently, with interest, and secured by mortgage on real estate conveyed by Holland to the bank, all of which was done without the consent or knowledge of the defendant.

And the defendant says that Holland, still being one of the trustees of said R. Tyner, and having property in his hands upon the trust aforesaid of greater value than the amount of the bills, afterwards, on the 1st of July, 1855, at the county aforesaid, delivered said bills to the plaintiffs as collateral security for a pre-existing debt of the said R. Tyner, on which the said Holland was indorser. And the defendant says the moneys in said bills of exchange have not yet been paid by the said Holland, or anyone on his behalf. To this plea there was a demurrer.

This plea but reiterates in effect the same defenses which have already been disposed of in deciding upon the demurrers before noticed, and it is not perceived how any any additional force can be given to them by being grouped together in one plea.

The fact that these parties were accommodation indorsers does not make them co-sureties, bound to contribute equally to the payment of the bills, without a special agreement to that effect; and there is no sufficient averment that any such agreement existed.

The averments in regard to the assignment are also defective, for they nowhere show that Holland had, at any time, sufficient funds in his hands, after complying with the terms of the trust—viz: to save Abner McCarty and others harmless—to pay this bill; and unless such a state of fact existed, there could be nothing in his hands made available for the bills.

If the fact should appear that these parties are bound to each other by a separate and distinct agreement, other than that which appears by the indorsements upon the bills, the plaintiff in error will have his remedy in an action of indebitatus assumpsit against the other parties to the bills. But we think the averments in in the pleas noticed are wanting in precision, and do not bring the case within the rule of special agreements, which impose a joint obligation.

The demurrers are sustained, and the judgment is affirmed.

GEORGE KENDALL, LEANDER WARE AND GEORGE L. JENCKES, Plffs. in Er.

v.

JOSEPH S. WINSOR.

(See S. C., 22 How., 322–331.)

Patent right—concealment of invention, effect of—reasonable delay—meaning of "not known or used"—inventor's intent, a question for jury.

Where the inventor designedly withholds his invention from the public, if, during such a concealment, an invention similar to or identical with his own should be made and patented, or brought into use without a patent, the latter cannot be inhibited nor restricted.

But a delay requisite for completing an invention, or a discreet and reasonable forbearance to proclaim the theory or operation of a discovery during its progress to completion, is proper.

The phrase "not known or used before the application for a patent" means, not known or used by others before the application.

The intent of an inventor with respect to an assertion or surrender of his rights, is an inquiry or conclusion of fact, and peculiarly within the province of the jury, upon the evidence submitted to them at the trial.

Argued Feb. 16, 1859. Decided Mar. 7, 1859.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Rhode Island.

The history of the case and a statement of the facts involved, appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. T. A. Jenckes, for plaintiff in error.

Mr. Charles M. Keller, for defendant in error:

The question presented by the exceptions to the ruling of the court below depends upon the construction of the 7th section of the Act of March 3, 1839.

The counsel for defendants below assumed that the prior use or sale named in that section of the Act, means any use or sale prior to the application for a patent, whether with or without the consent and allowance of the inventor. The learned court below gave a different construction to that Act, and held in conformity with the ruling in Pierson v. The Eagle Screw Co., 3 Story, 402, that the use and sale therein named must be a use and sale with the consent and allowance of the inventor before his application for letters patent.

This construction is in strict conformity with the construction given to the Act of 1793.

Mellus v. Silsbee, 4 Mas., 108, 110; Shaw v. Cooper, 7 Pet., 292, 319, 320.

The Act of March 3, 1839, is an Act in addition to the Act of 1836, and being engrafted thereon, should be construed by the provisions of the Act of 1836, so as to harmonize therewith. And when so construed, the sale and use before application for letters patent to work a license, must be a sale or use with the consent and allowance of the inventor.

There can be no license without consent, and no consent without knowledge; and yet the first exception calls for a construction of the Act which shall work a license merely on proof of user by the defendants, before the plaintiff's application for a patent, with or without his knowledge or consent.

The second exception calls for a construction which shall work a license on proof of knowledge, with or without consent. And the third exception calls for a construction which shall work a license on proof of knowledge, and in the absence of notice that he did not consent.

The presumption is against the consent; and yet the exceptions would invert the rule, and put the onus probandi on the party having the advantage of presumption.

Mr. Justice Daniel delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action on the case in the Circuit Court of the United States, instituted by the defendant in error against the plaintiffs, for the recovery of damages for an alleged infringement by the latter of the rights of the former as a patentee. No question was raised upon the pleadings or the evidence in this case as to the originality or novelty of the invention patented, nor with respect to the identity of that invention with the machine complained of as an infringement of the rights of the patentee, nor as to the use of that machine. These several facts were conceded; or at any rate were not controverted, between the parties to this suit.

Under a plea of not guilty, the defendant in the circuit court gave notice of the following defenses to be made by him:

1. A license from the plaintiff to use his invention.

2. A right to use that invention in virtue of the 7th section of the Act of Congress of the 3d of March, 1839, which section provides: "That every person or corporation who has or shall have purchased or constructed any newly invented machine, manufacture, or composition of matter, prior to the application of the inventor or discoverer for a patent, shall be held to possess the right to use, and vend to others to be used, the specific machine, manufacture, or composition of matter, so made or purchased, without liability therefor to the inventor or any other person interested in such invention."

To the relevancy and effect of the evidence adduced with reference to the two defenses thus notified, and to the questions of law arising upon the issues made by those defenses, this controversy is properly limited.

Upon the trial in the circuit court, in support of this defense, evidence was introduced tending to show that the plaintiff constructed a machine, in substantial conformity with his specification, as early as 1846, and that in 1849 he had several such machines in operation, on which he made harness to supply all such orders as he could obtain; that he continued to run these machines until he obtained his letters patent; that he repeatedly declared to different persons that the machine was so complicated that he preferred not to take a patent, but to rely on the difficulty of imitating the machine, and the secrecy in which he kept it. And the defendants also gave evidence tending to prove that the first of their machines was completed in the autumn of 1853, and the residue in the autumn of 1854; and that, in the course of that fall, the plaintiff had knowledge that the defendants had built, or were building, one or more machines like his invention, and did not interpose to prevent them.

The plaintiff gave evidence tending to prove that the first machine built by him was never completed so as to operate; that his second machine was only partially successful, and improvements were made upon it; that in 1849 he began four others, and completed them in that year, and made harness on them, which he sold when he could get orders; that they were subject to some practical difficulties, particularly as it respected the method of marking the harness, and the liability of the bobbin to get out of the clutch; that he was employed in devising means to remedy these defects, and did remedy them; that he also endeavored to simplify the machine by using only one cam-shaft; that he constantly intended to take letters patent when he should have perfected the machine; that he applied to Mr. Keller for this purpose in February, 1853, but the model and specifications were not sent to Washington till November, 1854; that he kept the machines from the view of the public, allowed none of the hands employed in the mill to introduce persons to view them, and that the hands pledged themselves not to divulge the invention; that among the hands employed by the plaintiff was one Kendall Aldridge, who left the plaintiff's employment in the autumn of 1852, and entered into an arrangement with the defendants to copy the plaintiff's machine for them, and did so; and that it was by Aldridge, and under his superintendence, and by means of the knowledge which he had gained while in the plaintiff's employment, under a pledge of secrecy, that the defendant's machines were built and put in operation; and that one of the defendants had procured drawings of the plaintiff's machine, and has taken out letters patent for it in England.

Each party controverted the facts thus sought to be proved by the other.

The defendant's counsel prayed the court to instruct the jury as follows:

1. That it is the duty of an inventor, if he would secure the protection of the patent laws, to apply for a patent as soon as his machine (if he has invented a machine) is in practical working order, so as to work regularly every day in the business for which it was designed; and if he does not so apply, he has no remedy against any persons who possess themselves of the invention, with his knowledge and without his notification to desist, or of his claims as an inventor before he applies for his patent.

2. That a machine can no longer be considered as an experiment, or the subject of experiment, when it is worked regularly in the course of business, and produces a satisfactory fabric, in quantities sufficient to supply the entire demand for the article.

3. That in order to justify the delay of the plaintiff in applying for a patent after his machine was in practical working order, on the ground of the desire to improve and perfect it, the plaintiff must show some defect in construction, or difficulty in the operation or mode of operation, which he desired and expected to remove by further thought and study; and if no such thing is shown, then the machine must be held to have been completed and finished, in the sense of the patent law, at the time it was put in regular working use and operation.

4. That under the 7th section of the Act of 1839, entitled, &c., if the jury are satisfied that the machine, for the use of which the defendants are sued, were constructed and put in operation before the plaintiff applied for his patent, then the defendants possessed the right to use, and vend to others to be used, the specific machines made or purchased by them, without liability therefor to the plaintiff; and the jury are to inquire and find only the fact of such construction before the date of the plaintiff's application, in order to render a verdict for the defendants.

5. That under said section of said Act, if the machines used by the defendants were purchased or constructed by them before the application of the plaintiff for his patent, with the knowledge of the plaintiff, then they must be held to possess the right to use, and vend to others to be used, the machines so purchased or constructed; and the jury are to inquire into and find only the fact of such purchase or construction, and that the plaintiff had knowledge of the same, in order to render a verdict for the defendants.

6. That under said section of said Act, if the machines used by the defendants were purchased or constructed by them before the application of the plaintiff for his patent, without the knowledge of the plaintiff, and without his notifying the defendants of his claim as the inventor, and requiring them to desist from such construction, then they must be held to possess the right to use, and vend to others to use, the machines so purchased or constructed; and the jury are to inquire only into and find the fact of such purchase or construction, and that the plaintiff had knowledge of the same, and did not notify the defendant to desist from such purchase or construction of his claims as inventor, in order to render a verdict for the defendants.

The court set aside all those prayers for instructions, and did instruct the jury as follows:

1. That if Aldridge, under a pledge of secrecy, obtained knowledge of the plaintiff's machine—and he had not abandoned it to the public—and thereupon, at the instigation of the defendants, and with the knowledge, on their part, of the surreptitiousness of his acts, constructed machines for the defendants, they would not have the right to continue to use the same after the date of the plaintiff's letters patent. But if the defendants had these machine's constructed before the plaintiff's application for his letters patent, under the belief authorized by him that he consented and allowed them so to do, then they might lawfully continue to use the same after the date of the plaintiff's letters patent, and the plaintiff could not recover in this action. And that if the jury should find that the plaintiff's declaration and conduct were such as to justify the defendants in believing he did not intend to take letters patent, but to rely on the difficulty of imitating his machine, and the means he took to keep it secret, this would be a defense to the action. And they were further instructed, that to constitute such an abandonment to the public as would destroy the plaintiff's right to take a patent, in a case where it did not appear any sale of the thing patented had been made, and there was no open public exhibition of the machine, the jury must find that he intended to give up and relinquish his right to take letters patent. But if the plaintiff did intend not to take a patent, and manifested that intent by his declarations or conduct, and thereupon it was copied by the defendant, and so went into use, the plaintiff could not afterwards take a valid patent.

To which refusal to give the instructions prayed for, as well as to the instructions given, the defendants, by their counsel, excepted before the jury retired from the bar; and, as the matter thereof did not appear of record, prayed the court to allow and seal this bill of exceptions; which, being found correct, has been allowed and sealed accordingly by the presiding judge.

Justice Sup. Ct. U. S.

The first ground of defense assumed under the notice from the defendant in the court below—viz.: a license from a patentee—may at once be disposed of by the remark that no evidence was offered on the trial, bearing directly or remotely upon the fact of an actual license from the patentee, either to the defendant or to any person whomsoever. The defense, then, must depend exclusively upon the proper construction of the section of the law above cited, and the application of that section to the conduct of the parties, as shown by the bill of exceptions.

It is undeniably true, that the limited and temporary monopoly granted to inventors was never designed for their exclusive profit or advantage; the benefit to the public or community at large was another and doubtless the primary object in granting and securing that monopoly. This was at once the equivalent given by the public for benefits bestowed by the genius and meditations and skill of individuals, and the incentive to further efforts for the same important objects. The true policy and ends of the patent laws enacted under this government are disclosed in that article of the Constitution, the source of all these laws, viz: "to promote the progress of science and the useful arts," contemplating and necessarily implying their extension, and increasing adaptation to the uses of society. Vide Constitution of the United States, art. I., sec. 8, clause 9. By correct induction from these truths, it follows that the inventor who designedly, and with the view of applying it indefinitely and exclusively for his own profit, withholds his invention from the public, comes not within the policy or objects of the Constitution or Acts of Congress. He does not promote, and, if aided in his design, would impede, the progress of science and the useful arts. And with a very bad grace could he appeal for favor or protection to that society which, if he had not injured, he certainly had neither benefited nor intended to benefit. Hence, if, during such a concealment, an invention similar to or identical with his own should be made and patented, or brought into use without a patent, the latter could not be inhibited nor restricted, upon proof of its identity with a machine previously invented and withheld and concealed by the inventor from the public. The rights and interests, whether of the public or of individuals, can never be made to yield to schemes of selfishness or cupidity; moreover, that which is once given to or is invested in the public cannot be recalled nor taken from them.

But the relation borne to the public by inventors, and the obligations they are bound to fulfulfill, in order to secure protection from the former and the right to remuneration, by no means forbid a delay requisite for completing an invention, or for a test of its value or success by a series of sufficient and practical experiments; nor do they forbid a discreet and reasonable forbearance to proclaim the theory or operation of a discovery during its progress to completion, and preceding an application for protection in that discovery. The former may be highly advantageous, as tending to the perfecting the invention; the latter may be indispensable, in order to prevent a piracy of the rights of the true inventor.

It is the unquestionable right of every inventor to confer gratuitously the benefits of his ingenuity upon the public, and this he may do either by express declaration or by conduct equally significant with language—such, for instance, as an acquiescence, with full knowledge in the use of his invention by others; or he may forfeit his rights as an inventor by a willful or negligent postponement of his claims, or by an attempt to withhold the benefit of his improvement from the public until a similar or the same improvement should have been made and introduced by others. Whilst the remuneration of genius and useful ingenuity is a duty incumbent upon the public, the rights and welfare of the community must be fairly dealt with and effectually guarded. Considerations of individual emolument can never be permitted to operate to the injury of these. But whilst inventors are bound to diligence and fairness in their dealings with the public with reference to their discoveries on the other hand, they are by obligations equally strong entitled to protection against frauds or wrongs practiced to pirate from them the results of thought and labor, in which nearly a lifetime may have been exhausted; the fruits of more than the viginti annorum lucubrationes, which fruits the public are ultimately to gather. The shield of this protection has been constantly interposed between the inventor and fraudulent spoliator by the courts in England, and most signally and effectually has this been done by this court, as is seen in the cases of Pennock & Sellers v. Dialogue, 2 Pet., 1, and of Shaw v. Cooper, 7 Pet., 292. These may be regarded as leading cases upon the questions of the abrogation or relinquishment of patent privileges as resulting from avowed intention, from abandonment or neglect or from use known and assented to.

Thus, in the former case, the court, on page 18, interpreting the phrase, "not known or used before the application for a patent, make the inquiry, 'what is the true meaning of the words not known or used,' &c. They cannot mean that the thing invented was not known or used before the application by the inventor himself; for that would be to prevent the only means of his obtaining a patent. The use as well as the knowledge of his invention must be indispensable, to enable him to ascertain its competency to the end proposed, as well as to perfect its component parts. The words, then, to have any rational interpretation, must mean, not known or used by others before the application. But how known or used? If it were necessary, as it well might be, to employ others to assist in the original structure or use by the inventor himself, or if before his application his invention should be pirated by another, or used without his consent, it can scarcely be supposed that the Legislature had within its contemplation such knowledge or use." Further on in the same case, page 19, the court say: "If an inventor should be permitted to hold back from the knowledge of the public the secrets of his invention, if he should for a long period of years retain the monopoly, and make and sell his invention publicly, and thus gather the whole profits of it, relying on his superior skill and knowledge of the structure, and then, and then only, when the danger of competition should force him to secure the exclusive right, he should be allowed to take out a patent, and thus exclude the public from any further use than what would be derived under it during his fourteen years, it would materially retard the progress of science and the useful arts, and give a premium to those who should be least prompt to communicate their discoveries." In Shaw v. Cooper, 7 Pet., this court, on page 319, in strict coincidence with the decision in 2 Pet., say: "The knowledge or use spoken of in the Statute could have referred to the public only, and cannot be applied to the inventor himself; he must necessarily have a perfect knowledge of the thing invented and its use, before he can describe it, as by law he is required to do preparatory to the emanation of a patent. But there may be cases in which the knowledge of the invention may be surreptitiously obtained, and communicated to the public, that do not affect the right of the inventor. Under such circumstances, no presumption can arise in favor of an abondonment of the right to the inventor to the public, though an acquiescence on his part will lay the foundation for such a presumption."

The real interest of the inventor with respect to an assertion or surrender of his rights under the Constitution and laws of the United States, whether it be sought in his declarations or acts, or in forbearance or neglect to speak or act, is an inquiry or conclusion of fact, and peculiarly within the province of the jury, guided by legal evidence submitted to them at the trial.

Recurring now to the instruction from the judge at circuit in this case, we consider that instruction to be in strict conformity with the principles hereinbefore propounded, and with the doctrines of his court, as declared in the cases of Pennock v. Dialogue and Shaw v. Cooper. That instruction diminishes or excludes no proper ground upon which the conduct and intent of the plaintiff below, as evinced either by declarations or acts, or by omission to speak or act, and on which also the justice and integrity of the conduct of the defendants were to be examined and determined. It submitted the conduct and intentions of both plaintiff and defendants to the jury, as questions of fact to be decided by them, guided simply by such rules of law as had been settled with reference to issues like the one before them; and upon those questions of fact the jury have responded in favor of the plaintiff below, the defendant in error. We think that the rejection by the court of the prayers offered by the defendants at the trial was warranted by the character of those prayers, as having a tendency to narrow the inquiry by the jury to an imperfect and partial view of the case, and to divert their minds from a full comprehension of the merits of the controversy.

The decision of the Circuit Court is affirmed, therefore, with costs.

Certificate in record that Acts of Congress came in question, unnecessary—judicial authority must be conferred by government—cannot be exercised in jurisdiction of another government—State Government and General Government are separate and distinct sovereignties—judicial power of this court—state court or judge may issue habeas corpus except when person imprisoned by U. S.—duty of marshal to make return to state court, but to refuse to obey its mandate, or to take prisoner before state court or judge—state judge or court no right to require it—marshal's duty to resist state process—process has no validity beyond jurisdiction—defects in commissioners' proceedings, how revised—exclusive jurisdiction of District Court.

Where, after judgment in the Supreme Court of Wisconsin, and before writ of error was sued out, the state court entered on its record that, in such final judgment the validity of certain Acts of Congress was drawn in question, and the decision of the court was against their validity respectively; held, that this certificate was not necessary to give this court jurisdiction, because the proceedings upon their face show that these questions arose, and how they were decided.

There can be no such thing as judicial authority, unless it is conferred by a government or sovereignty.

No State can authorize one of its judges or courts to exercise judicial power, by habeas corpus or otherwise, within the jurisdiction of another and an independent government.

Although the State of Wisconsin is sovereign within its territorial limits, to a certain extent, yet that sovereignty is limited and restricted by the Constitution of the United States.

The powers of the General Government and of the State, although both exist and are exercised within the same territorial limits, are yet separate and distinct sovereignties, acting separately and independently of each other, within their respective spheres.

This court has judicial power over all cases in law and equity arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States, and in such cases, as well as others enumerated, has appellate jurisdiction both as to law and fact, with such exceptions and under such regulations as Congress shall make.

State court, or judge, who is authorized by the laws of the State to issue the writ of habeas corpus, may issue it in any case where the party is imprisoned within its territorial limits, provided it does not appear, when the application is made, that the person imprisoned, is in custody under the authority of the United States.

The court or judge has a right to inquire, in this mode of proceeding, for what cause and by what authority the prisoner is confined within the territorial limits of the state sovereignty.

And it is the duty of the Marshal, or other person having the custody of the prisoner, to make known to the judge or court, by a proper return, the authority by which he holds him in custody.

But it is at the same time imperatively his duty to obey the process of the United States, to hold the prisoner in custody under it, and to refuse obedience to the mandate or process of any other government.

And consequently it is his duty not to take the prisoner, nor suffer him to be taken, before a state judge or court upon a habeas corpus issued under state authority.

No state judge or court, after they are judicially informed that the party is imprisoned under the authority of the United States, has any right to interfere with him, or to require him to be brought before them.

And if the authority of a State, in the form of judicial process or otherwise, should attempt to control the Marshal or other authorized officer or agent of the United States, in any respect, in the custody of the prisoner, it would be his duty to resist it, and to call to his aid any force that might be necessary to maintain the authority of law against illegal interference.

No judicial process, whatever form it may assume, can have any lawful authority outside of the limits of the jurisdiction of the court or judge by whom it is issued, and an attempt to enforce it beyond these boundaries is nothing less than lawless violence.

If there was any defect of power in the commissioner of the United States, or in his mode of proceeding, it was for the tribunals of the United States to revise and correct it, and not for a state court.

Where the District Court had exclusive and final jurisdiction, by the laws of the United States, neither the regularity of its proceedings nor the validity of its sentence could be called in question in any other court, either of a State or the United States, by habeas corpus or other process.

Act of March 2, 1833; 2 Wall., Jr., 521; Ex parte Robinson, 3 Liv., Law Mag., 886.

The plaintiff in error in the first of these cases is the Marshal of the United States for the District of Wisconsin, and the two cases have arisen out of the same transaction, and depend, to some extent, upon the same principles. On that account, they have been argued and considered together; and the following are the facts as they appear in the transcripts before us:

Sherman M. Booth was charged before Winfield Smith, a Commissioner duly appointed by the District Court of the United States for the District of Wisconsin, with having, on the 11th day of March, 1854, aided and abetted, at Milwaukee, in the said district, the escape of a fugitive slave from the deputy-marshal, who had him in custody under a warrant issued by the District Judge of the United States for that district, under the Act of Congress of September 18, 1850.

Upon the examination before the Commissioner, he was satisfied that an offense had been committed as charged, and that there was probable cause to believe that Booth had been guilty of it; and thereupon held him to bail to appear and answer before the District Court of the United States for the District of Wisconsin, on the first Monday in July then next ensuing. But on the 26th of May his bail or surety in the recognizance delivered him to the Marshal, in the presence of the Commissioner, and requested the Commissioner to recommit Booth to the custody of the Marshal; and he having failed to recognize again for his appearance before the District Court, the Commissioner committed him to the custody of the Marshal, to be delivered to the keeper of the jail until he should be discharged by due course of law.

Booth made application on the next day, the 27th of May, to A. D. Smith, one of the justices of the Supreme Court of the State of Wisconsin, for a writ of habeas corpus, stating that he was restrained of his liberty by Stephen V. R. Ableman, Marshal of the United States for that district, under the warrant of commitment hereinbefore mentioned; and alleging that his imprisonment was illegal, because the Act of Congress of September 18, 1850, was unconstitutional and void; and also that the warrant was defective, and did not describe the offense created by that Act, even if the Act were valid.

Upon this application, the justice, on the same day, issued the writ of habeas corpus, directed to the Marshal, requiring him forthwith to have the body of Booth before him (the said justice), together with the time and cause of his imprisonment. The Marshal thereupon, on the day above mentioned, produced Booth, and made his return, stating that he was received into his custody as Marshal on the day before, and held in custody by virtue of the warrant of the Commissioner above mentioned, a copy of which he annexed to and returned with the writ.

To this return Booth demurred, as not sufficient in law to justify his detention. And upon the hearing the justice decided that his detention was illegal, and ordered the Marshal to discharge him and set him at liberty, which was accordingly done.

Afterwards, on the 9th of June, in the same year, the Marshal applied to the Supreme Court of the State for a certiorari, setting forth in his application the proceedings hereinbefore mentioned, and charging that the release of Booth by the justice was erroneous and unlawful, and praying that his proceedings might be brought before the Supreme Court of the State for revision.

The certiorari was allowed on the same day; and the writ was accordingly issued on the 12th of the same month, and returnable on the third Tuesday of the month; and on the 20th the return was made by the justice, stating the proceedings, as hereinbefore mentioned.

The case was argued before the Supreme Court of the State, and on the 19th of July it pronounced its judgment, affirming the decision of the associate justice discharging Booth from imprisonment, with costs against Ableman, the Marshal.

Afterwards, on the 26th of October, the Marshal sued out a writ of error, returnable to this court on the first Monday of December, 1854, in order to bring the judgment here for revision; and the defendant in error was regularly cited to appear on that day; and the record and proceedings were certified to this court by the Clerk of the state court in the usual form, in obedience to the writ of error. And on the 4th of December, Booth, the defendant in error, filed a memorandum in writing in this court, stating that he had been cited to appear here in this case, and that he submitted it to the judgment of this court on the reasoning in the argument and opinions in the printed pamphlets therewith sent.

After the judgment was entered in the Supreme Court of Wisconsin, and before the writ of error was sued out, the state court entered on its record, that, in the final judgment it had rendered, the validity of the Act of Congress of September 18, 1850, and of February 12, 1793, and the authority of the Marshal to hold the defendant in his custody, under the process mentioned in his return to the writ of habeas corpus, were respectively drawn in question, and the decision of the court in the final judgment was against their validity, respectively.

This certificate was not necessary to give this court jurisdiction, because the proceedings upon their face show that these questions arose, and how they were decided; but it shows that at that time the Supreme Court of Wisconsin did not question their obligation to obey the writ of error, nor the authority of this court to re examine their judgment in the cases specified. And the certificate is given for the purpose of placing distinctly on the record the points that were raised and decided in that court, in order that this court might have no difficulty in exercising its appellate power, and pronouncing its judgment upon all of them.

We come now to the second case. At the January Term of the District Court of the United States for the District of Wisconsin, after Booth had been set at liberty, and after the transcript of the proceedings in the case above mentioned had been returned to and filed in this court, the grand jury found a bill of indictment against Booth for the offense with which he was charged before the Commissioner, and from which the state court had discharged him. The indictment was found on the 4th of January, 1855. On the 9th a motion was made by counsel on behalf of the accused, to quash the indictment, which was overruled by the court; and he thereupon pleaded not guilty, upon which issue was joined. On the 10th a jury was called and appeared in court, when he challenged the array; but the challenge was overruled and the jury impaneled. The trial, it appears, continued from day to day, until the 18th, when the jury found him guilty in the manner and form in which he stood indicted in the fourth and fifth counts. On the 16th he moved for a new trial and in arrest of judgment, which motions were argued on the 20th, and on the 23d the court overruled the motions, and sentenced the prisoner to be imprisoned for one month, and to pay a fine of $1,000 and the costs of prosecution; and that he remain in custody until the sentence was complied with.

We have stated more particularly these proceedings, from a sense of justice to the District Court, as they show that every opportunity of making his defense was afforded him, and that his case was fully heard and considered.

On the 26th of January, three days after the sentence was passed, the prisoner, by his counsel, filed his petition in the Supreme Court of the State, and with his petition filed a copy of the proceedings in the District Court, and also affidavits from the foreman and one other member of the jury who tried him, stating that their verdict was, guilty on the fourth and fifth counts, and not guilty on the other three; and stated in his petition that his imprisonment was illegal, because the Futigive Slave Law was unconstitutional; that the District Court had no jurisdiction to try or punish him for the matter charged against him, and that the proceedings and sentence of that court were absolute nullities in law. Various other objections to the proceedings are alleged, which are unimportant in the questions now before the court, and need not, therefore, be particularly stated. On the next day, the 27th, the court directed two writs of habeas corpus to be issued—one to the Marshal, and one to the Sheriff of Milwaukee, whose actual keeping the prisoner was committed by the Marshal, by order of the District Court. The habeas corpus directed each of them to produce the body of the prisoner, and make known the cause of his imprisonment, immediately after the receipt of the writ.

On the 30th of January the Marshal made his return, not acknowledging the jurisdiction, but stating the sentence of the District Court as his authority; that the prisoner was delivered to, and was then in the actual keeping of, the Sheriff of Milwaukee County, by order of the court, and he, therefore, had no control of the body of the prisoner; and if the Sheriff had not received him, he should have so reported to the District Court, and should have conveyed him to some other place or prison, as the court should command.

On the same day the sheriff produced the body of Booth before the state court, and returned that he had been committed to his custody by the Marshal, by virtue of a transcript, a true copy of which was annexed to his return, and which was the only process or authority by which he detained him.

This transcript was a full copy of the proceedings and sentence in the District Court of the United States, as hereinbefore stated. To this return the accused, by his counsel, filed a general demurrer.

The court ordered the hearing to be postponed until the 2d of February, and notice to be given to the District Attorney of the United States. It was accordingly heard on that day, and on the next (February 3d), the court decided that the imprisonment was illegal, and ordered and adjudged, that Booth be, and he was, by that judgment, forever discharged from that imprisonment and restraint, and he was accordingly set at liberty.

On the 21st of April next following, the Attorney-General of the United States presented a petition to the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, stating briefly the facts in the case, and at the same time presenting an exemplification of the proceedings hereinbefore stated, duly certified by the Clerk of the state court, and averring in his petition that the state court had no jurisdiction in the case, and praying that a writ of error might issue to bring its judgment before this court to correct the error. The writ of error was allowed and issued, and, according to the rules and practice of the court, was returnable on the first Monday of December, 1855, and a citation for the defendant in error to appear on that day was issued by the Chief Justice at the same time.

No return having been made to this writ, the Attorney-General, on the 1st of February, 1856, filed affidavits, showing that the writ of error had been duly served on the Clerk of the Supreme Court of Wisconsin, at his office, on the 30th of May, 1855, and the citation served on the defendant in error on the 28th of June, in the same year. And also the affidavit of the District Attorney of the United States for the District of Wisconsin, setting forth that when he served the writ of error upon the clerk, as above mentioned, he was informed by the clerk, and has also been informed by one of the justices of the Supreme Court, which released Booth, "that the court had directed the clerk to make no return to the writ of error, and to enter no order upon the journals or records of the courts concerning the same." And, upon these proofs, the Attorney-General moved the court for an order upon the clerk to make return to the writ of error, on or before the first day of the next ensuing term of this court. The rule was accordingly laid, and on the 22d of July, 1856, the Attorney-General filed with the clerk of this court the affidavit of the Marshal of the District of Wisconsin, that he had served the rule on the clerk on the 7th of the month above mentioned; and no return having been made, the Attorney-General, on the 27th of February, 1857, moved for leave to file the certified copy of the record of the Supreme Court of Wisconsin, which he had produced with his application for the writ of error, and to docket the case in this court, in conformity with a motion to that effect made at the last term. And the court thereupon, on the 6th of March, 1857, ordered the copy of the record filed by the Attorney-General to be received and entered on the docket of this court, to have the same effect and legal operation as if returned by the clerk with the writ of error, and that the case stand for argument at the next ensuing term, without further notice to either party.

The case was accordingly docketed, but was not reached for argument in the regular order and practice of the court until the present term.

This detailed statement of the proceedings in the different courts has appeared to be necessary in order to form a just estimate of the action of the different tribunals in which it has been heard, and to account for the delay in the final decision of a case, which, from its character, would seem to have demanded prompt action. The first case, indeed, was reached for trial two terms ago. But as the two cases are different portions of the same prosecution for the same offense, they, unavoidably, to some extent, involve the same principles of law, and it would hardly have been proper to hear and decide the first before the other was ready for hearing and decision. They have accordingly been argued together, by the Attorney-General of the United States, at the present term. No counsel has in either case appeared for the defendant in error. But we have the pamphlet arguments filed and referred to by Booth in the first case, as hereinbefore mentioned, also the opinions and arguments of the Supreme Court of Wisconsin, and of the judges who compose it, in full, and are enabled, therefore, to see the grounds on which they rely to support their decisions.

It will be seen, from the foregoing statement of facts, that a judge of the Supreme Court of the State of Wisconsin, in the first of these cases, claimed and exercised the right to supervise and annul the proceedings of a commissioner of the United States, and to discharge a prisoner, who had been committed by the commissioner for an offense against the laws of this Government, and that this exercise of power by the judge was afterwards sanctioned and affirmed by the Supreme Court of the State.

In the second case the state court has gone a step farther, and claimed and exercised jurisdiction over the proceedings and judgment of a District Court of the United States, and upon a summary and collateral proceeding, by habeas corpus, has set aside and annulled its judgment, and discharged a prisoner, who had been tried and found guilty of an offense against the laws of the United States, and sentenced to imprisonment by the District Court.

And it further appears that the state court have not only claimed and exercised this jurisdiction, but have also determined that their decision is final and conclusive upon all the courts of the United States, and ordered their clerk to disregard and refuse obedience to the writ of error issued by this court, pursuant to the Act of Congress of 1789, to bring here for examination and revision the judgment of the state court.

These propositions are new in the jurisprudence of the United States as well as of the States; and the supremacy of the state courts over the courts of the United States, in cases arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States, is now for the first time asserted and acted upon in the Supreme Court of a State.

The supremacy is not, indeed, set forth distinctly and broadly, in so many words, in the printed opinions of the judges. It is intermixed with elaborate discussions of different provisions in the Fugitive Slave Law, and of the privileges and power of the writ of habeas corpus. But the paramount power of the State court lies at the foundation of these decisions; for their commentaries upon the provisions of that law, and upon the privileges and power of the writ of habeas corpus, were out of place, and their judicial action upon them without authority of law, unless they had the power to revise and control the proceedings in the criminal case of which they were speaking; and their judgments, releasing the prisoner, and disregarding the writ of error from this court, can rest upon no other foundation.

If the judicial power exercised in this instance has been reserved to the States, no offense against the laws of the United States can be punished by their own courts, without the permission and according to the judgment of the courts of the State in which the party happens to be imprisoned; for, if the Supreme Court of Wisconsin posessed the power it has exercised in relation to offenses against the Act of Congress in question, it necessarily follows that they must have the same judicial authority in relation to any other law of the United States; and, consequently, their supervising and controlling power would embrace the whole Criminal Code of the United States, and extend to offenses against our revenue laws, or any other law intended to guard the different departments of the General Government from fraud or violence. And it would embrace all crimes, from the highest to the lowest; including felonies, which are punished with death, as well as misdeamenors, which are punished by imprisonment. And, moreover, if the power is possessed by the Supreme Court of the State of Wisconsin, it must belong equally to every other State in the Union, when the prisoner is within its territorial limits: and it is very certain that the State courts would not always agree in opinion; and it would often happen, that an act which was admitted to be an offense, and justly punished, in one State, would be regarded as innocent, and indeed as praiseworthy, in another.

It would seem to be hardly necessary to do more than to state the result to which these decisions of the state courts must inevitably lead. It is, of itself, a sufficient and conclusive answer; for no one will suppose that a government which has now lasted nearly seventy years, enforcing its laws by its own tribunals, and preserving the union of the States, could have lasted a single year, or fulfilled the high trusts committed to it, if offenses against its laws could not have been punished without the consent of the State in which the culprit was found.

The judges of the Supreme Court of Wisconsin do not distinctly state from what source they suppose they have derived this judicial power. There can be no such thing as judicial authority, unless it is conferred by a government or sovereignty; and if the judges and courts of Wisconsin possess the jurisdiction they claim, they must derive it either from the United States or the State. It certainly has not been conferred on them by the United States; and it is equally clear it was not in the power of the State to confer it, even if it had attempted to do so; for no State can authorize one of its judges or courts to exercise judicial power, by habeas corpus or otherwise, within the jurisdiction of another and independent Government. And although the State of Wisconsin is sovereign within its territorial limits to certain extent, yet that sovereignty is limited and restricted by the Constitution of the United States. And the powers of the General Government, and of the State, although both exist and are exercised within the same territorial limits, are yet separate and distinct sovereignties, acting separately and independently of each other, within their respective spheres. And the sphere of action appropriated to the United States is as far beyond the reach of the judicial process issued by a state judge or a state court, as if the line of division was traced by landmarks and monuments visible to the eye. And the State of Wisconsin had no more power to authorize these proceedings of its judges and courts, than it would have had if the prisoner had been confined in Michigan, or in any other State of the Union, for an offense against the laws of the State in which he was imprisoned.

It is, however, due to the State to say, that we do not find this claim of paramount jurisdiction in the state courts over the courts of the United States asserted or countenanced by the Constitution or laws of the State. We find it only in the decisions of the Judges of the Supreme Court. Indeed, at the very time these decisions were made, there was a statute of the State which declares that a person brought up on a habeas corpus shall be remanded, if it appears that he is confined:

1st. By virtue of process, by any court or judge of the United States, in a case where such court or judge has exclusive jurisdiction; or,

2d. By virtue of the final judgment or decree of any competent court of civil or criminal jurisdiction." Revised Statutes of the State of Wisconsin, 1849, ch. 124, page 629.

Even, therefore, if these cases depended upon the laws of Wisconsin, it would be difficult to find in these provisions such a grant of judicial power as the Supreme Court claims to have derived from the State.

But, as we have already said, questions of this kind must always depend upon the Constitution and laws of the United States, and not of a State. The Constitution was not formed merely to guard the States against danger from foreign nations, but mainly to secure union and harmony at home; for if this object could be attained, there would be but little danger from abroad; and to accomplish this purpose, it was felt by the statesmen who framed the Constitution, and by the people who adopted it, that it was necessary that many of the rights of sovereignty which the States then possessed should be ceded to the General Government; and that, in the sphere of action assigned to it, it should be supreme and strong enough to execute its own laws by its own tribunals, without interruption from a State or from state authorities. And it was evident that anything short of this would be inadequate to the main objects for which the Government was established; and that local interests, local passions or prejudices, incited and fostered by individuals for sinister purposes, would lead to acts of aggression and injustice by one State upon the rights of another, which would ultimately terminate in violence and force, unless there was a common arbiter between them, armed with power enough to protect and guard the rights of all, by appropriate laws, to be carried into execution peacefully by its judicial tribunals.

The language of the Constitution, by which this power is granted, is too plain to admit of doubt or to need comment. It declares that "this Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be passed in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land, and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the Constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding."

But the supremacy thus conferred on this Government could not peacefully be maintained, unless it was clothed with judicial power, equally paramount in authority to carry it into execution; for if left to the courts of justice in the several States, conflicting decisions would unavoidably take place, and the local tribunals could hardly be expected to be always free from the local influences of which we have spoken. And the Constitution and laws and treaties of the United States, and the powers granted to the Federal Government, would soon receive different interpretations in different States, and the Government of the United States would soon become one thing in one State and another thing in another. It was essential, therefore, to its very existence as a Government, that it should have the power of establishing courts of justice, altogether independent of state power, to carry into effect its own laws; and that a tribunal should be established in which all cases which might arise under the Constitution and laws and treaties of the United States, whether in a state court or a court of the United States, should be finally and conclusively decided. Without such a tribunal, it is obvious that there would be no uniformity of judicial decision; and that the supremacy (which is but another name for independence), so carefully provided in the clause of the Constitution above referred to, could not possibly be maintained peacefully, unless it was associated with this paramount judicial authority.

Accordingly, it was conferred on the General Government, in clear, precise and comprehensive terms. It is declared that its judicial power shall (among other subjects enumerated) extend to all cases in law and equity arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States, and that in such cases, as well as the others there enumerated, this court shall have appellate jurisdiction both as to law and fact, with such exceptions and under such regulations as Congress shall make. The appellate power, it will be observed, is conferred on this court in all cases or suits in which such a question shall arise. It is not confined to suits in the inferior courts of the United States, but extends to all cases where such a question arises, whether it be in a judicial tribunal of a State or of the United States. And it is manifest that this ultimate appellate power in a tribunal created by the Constitution itself was deemed essential to secure the independence and supremacy of the General Government in the sphere of action assigned to it; to make the Constitution and laws of the United States uniform, and the same in every State; and to guard against evils which would inevitably arise from conflicting opinions between the courts of a State and of the United States, if there was no common arbiter authorized to decide between them.

The importance which the framers of the Constitution attached to such a tribunal, for the purpose of preserving internal tranquillity, is strikingly manifested by the clause which gives this court jurisdiction over the sovereign States which compose this Union, when a controversy arises between them. Instead of reserving the right to seek redress for injustice from another State by their sovereign powers, they have bound themselves to submit to the decision of this court, and to abide by its judgment. And it is not out of place to say, here, that experience has demonstrated that this power was not unwisely surrendered by the States; for in the time that has already elapsed since this Government came into existence, several irritating and angry controversies have taken place between adjoining States, in relation to their respective boundaries, and which have sometimes threatened to end in force and violence, but for the power vested in this court to hear them and decide between them.

The same purposes are clearly indicated by the different language employed when conferring supremacy upon the laws of the United States, and jurisdiction upon its courts. In the first case, it provides that "this Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, shall be the supreme law of the land, and obligatory upon the judges in every State." The words in italics show the precision and foresight which marks every clause in the instrument. The sovereignty to be created was to be limited in its powers of legislation, and if it passed a law not authorized by its enumerated powers, it was not to be regarded as the supreme law of the land, nor were the state judges bound to carry it into execution. And as the courts of a State, and the courts of the United States, might, and indeed certainly would, often differ as to the extent of the powers conferred by the General Government, it was manifest that serious controversies would arise between the authorities of the United States and of the States, which must be settled by force of arms, unless some tribunal was created to decide between them finally and without appeal.

The Constitution has accordingly provided, as far as human foresight could provide, against this danger. And in conferring judicial power upon the Federal Government, it declares that the jurisdiction of its courts shall extend to all cases arising under "this Constitution" and the laws of the United States—leaving out the words of restriction contained in the grant of legislative power which we have above noticed. The judicial power covers every legislative Act of Congress, whether it be made within the limits of its delegated powers, or be an assumption of power beyond the grants in the Constitution.

This judicial power was justly regarded as indispensable, not merely to maintain the supremacy of the laws of the United States, but also to guard the States from any encroachment upon their reserved rights by the General Government. And as the Constitution is the fundamental and supreme law, if it appears that an Act of Congress is not pursuant to and within the limits of the power assigned to the Federal Government, it is the duty of the courts of the United States to declare it unconstitutional and void. The grant of judicial power is not confined to the administration of laws passed in pursuance to the provisions of the Constitution, nor confined to the interpretation of such laws; but, by the very terms of the grant, the Constitution is under their view when any Act of Congress is brought before them, and it is their duty to declare the law void, and refuse to execute it, if it is not pursuant to the legislative powers conferred upon Congress. And as the final appellate power in all such questions is given to this court, controversies as to the respective powers of the United States and the States, instead of being determined by military and physical force, are heard, investigated, and finally settled, with the calmness and deliberation of judicial inquiry. And no one can fail to see, that if such an arbiter had not been provided, in our complicated system of government, internal tranquillity could not have been preserved; and if such controversies were left to arbitrament of physical force, our Government, State and National, would soon cease to be Governments of laws, and revolutions by force of arms would take the place of courts of justice and judicial decisions.

In organizing such a tribunal, it is evident that every precaution was taken, which human wisdom could devise, to fit it for the high duty with which it was intrusted. It was not left to Congress to create it by law; for the States could hardly be expected to confide in the impartiality of a tribunal created exclusively by the General Government, without any participation on their part. And as the performance of its duty would sometimes come in conflict with individual ambition or interests, and powerful political combinations, an Act of Congress establishing such a tribunal might be repealedin order to establish another more subservient to the predominant political influences or excited passions of the day. This tribunal, therefore, was erected, and the powers of which we have spoken conferred upon it, not by the Federal Government, but by the people of the States, who formed and adopted that Government, and conferred upon it all the powers, legislative, executive, and judicial, which it now possesses. And in order to secure its independence, and enable it faithfully and firmly to perform its duty, it engrafted it upon the Constitution itself, and declared that this court should have appellate power in all cases arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States. So long, therefore, as this Constitution shall endure, this tribunal must exist with it, deciding in the peaceful forms of judicial proceeding the angry and irritating controversies between sovereignties, which in other countries have been determined by the arbitrament of force.

These principles of constitutional law are confirmed and illustrated by the clause which confers legislative power upon Congress. That power is specifically given in article 1, section 8, paragraph 18, in the following words:

"To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper to carry into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof."

Under this clause of the Constitution, it became the duty of Congress to pass such laws as were necessary and proper to carry into execution the powers vested in the Judicial Department. And in the performance of this duty, the First Congress, at its first session, passed the Act of 1789, ch. 20, entitled "An Act to establish the judicial courts of the United States." It will be remembered that many of the members of the Convention were also members of this Congress, and it cannot be supposed that they did not understand the meaning and intention of the great instrument which they had so anxiously and deliberately considered, clause by clause, and assisted to frame. And the law they passed to carry into execution the powers vested in the Judicial Department of the Government proves, past doubt, that their interpretation of the appellate powers conferred on this court was the same with that which we have now given; for by the 25th section of the Act of 1789, Congress authorized writs of error to be issued from this court to a state court, whenever a right had been claimed under the Constitution or laws of the United States, and the decision of the state court was against it. And to make this appellate power effectual, and altogether independent of the action of state tribunals, this Act further provides, that upon writs of error to a state court, instead of remanding the cause for a final decision in the state court, this court may at their discretion, if the cause shall have been once remanded before, proceed to a final decision of the same, and award execution.

These provisions in the Act of 1789 tell us, in language not to be mistaken, the great importance which the patriots and statesmen of the First Congress attached to this appellate power, and the foresight and care with which they guarded its free and independent exercise against interference or obstruction by States or state tribunals.

In the case before the Supreme Court of Wisconsin, a right was claimed under the Constitution and laws of the United States, and the decision was against the right claimed; and it refuses obedience to the writ of error, and regards its own judgment as final. It has not only reversed and annulled the judgment of the District Court of the United States, but it has reversed and annulled the provisions of the Constitution itself, and the Act of Congress of 1789, and made the superior and appellate tribunal the inferior and subordinate one.

We do not question the authority of state court, or judge, who is authorized by the laws of the State to issue the writ of habeas corpus, to issue it in any case where the party is imprisoned within its territorial limits, provided it does not appear, when the application is made, that the person imprisoned is in custody under the authority of the United States. The court or judge has a right to inquire, in this mode of proceeding, for what cause and by what authority the prisoner is confined within the territorial limits of the state sovereignty. And it is the duty of the Marshal, or other person having the custody of the prisoner, to make known to the judge or court, by a proper return, the authority by which he holds him in custody. This right to inquire by process of habeas corpus, and the duty of the officer to make a return, grows, necessarily, out of the complex character of our Government, and the existence of two distinct and separate sovereignties within the same territorial space, each of them restricted in its powers, and each within its sphere of action, prescribed by the Constitution of the United States, independent of the other. But, after the return is made, and the state judge or court judicially apprised that the party is in custody under the authority of the United States, they can proceed no further. They then know that the prisoner is within the dominion and jurisdiction of another Government, and that neither the writ of habeas corpus, nor any other process issued under state authority, can pass over the line of division between the two sovereignties. He is then within the dominion and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States. If he has committed an offense against their laws, their tribunals alone can punish him. If he is wrongfully imprisoned, their judicial tribunals can release him and afford him redress. And although, as we have said, it is the duty of the Marshal, or other person holding him, to make known, by a proper return, the authority under which he detains him, it is at the same time imperatively his duty to obey the process of the United States, to hold the prisoner in custody under it, and to refuse obedience to the mandate or process of any other Government. And consequently it is his duty not to take the prisoner, nor suffer him to be taken, before a state judge or court upon a habeas corpus issued under state authority. No state judge or court, after they are judicially informed that the party is imprisoned under the authority of the United States, has any right to interfere with him, or to require him to be brought before them. And if the authority of a State, in the form of judicial process or otherwise, should attempt to control the Marshal or other authorized officer or agent of the United States, in any respect, in the custody of his prisoner, it would be his duty to resist it, and to call to his aid any force that might be necessary to maintain the authority of law against illegal interference. No judicial process, whatever form it may assume, can have any lawful authority outside of the limits of the jurisdiction of the court or judge by whom it is issued; and an attempt to enforce it beyond these boundaries is nothing less than lawless violence.

Nor is there anything in this supremacy of the General Government, or the jurisdiction of its judicial tribunals, to awaken the jealousy or offend the natural and just pride of State sovereignty. Neither this Government, nor the powers of which we are speaking, were forced upon the States. The Constitution of the United States, with all the powers conferred by it on the General Government, and surrendered by the States, was the voluntary act of the people of the several States, deliberately done, for their own protection and safety against injustice from one another. And their anxiety to preserve it in full force, in all its powers, and to guard against resistance to or evasion of its authority, on the part of a State, is proved by the clause which requires that the members of the State Legislatures, and all executive and judicial officers of the several States (as well as those of the General Government), shall be bound, by oath or affirmation, to support this Constitution. This is the last and closing clause of the Constitution, and inserted when the whole frame of Government, with the powers hereinbefore specified, had been adopted by the Convention; and it was in that form, and with these powers, that the Constitution was submitted to the people of the several States, for their consideration and decision.

Now, it certainly can be no humiliation to the citizen of a Republic to yield a ready obedience to the laws as administered by the constituted authorities. On the contrary, it is among his first and highest duties as a citizen, because free government cannot exist without it. Nor can it be inconsistent with the dignity of a sovereign State, to observe faithfully, and in the spirit of sincerity and truth, the compact into which it voluntarily entered when it became a State of this Union. On the contrary, the highest honor of sovereignty is untarnished faith. And certainly no faith could be more deliberately and solemnly pledged than that which every State has plighted to the other States to support the Constitution as it is, in all its provisions, until they shall be altered in the manner which the Constitution itself prescribes. In the emphatic language of the pledge required, it is to support this Constitution. And no power is more clearly conferred by the Constitution and laws of the United States, than the power of this court to decide, ultimately and finally, all cases arising under such Constitution and laws; and for that purpose to bring here for revision, by writ of error, the judgment of a state court, where such questions have arisen, and the right claimed under them denied by the highest judicial tribunal in the State.

We are sensible that we have extended the examination of these decisions beyond the limits required by any intrinsic difficulty in the questions. But the decisions in question were made by the supreme judicial tribunal of the State; and when a court so elevated in its position has pronounced a judgment which, if it could be maintained, would subvert the very foundations of this Government, it seemed to be the duty of this court, when exercising its appellate power, to show plainly the grave errors into which the state court has fallen, and the consequences to which they would inevitably lead.

But it can hardly be necessary to point out the errors which followed their mistaken view of the jurisdiction they might lawfully exercise; because, if there was any defect of power in the Commissioner, or in his mode of proceeding, it was for the tribunals of the United States to revise and correct it, and not for a state court. And as regards the decision of the District Court, it had exclusive and final jurisdiction by the laws of the United States; and neither the regularity of its proceedings nor the validity of its sentence could be called in question in any other court, either of a State or the United States, by habeas corpus or any other process.

But although we think it unnecessary to discuss these questions, yet, as they have been decided by the state court, and are before us on the record, and we are not willing to be misunderstood, it is proper to say that, in the judgment of this court, the Act of Congress commonly called the Fugitive Slave Law is, in all of its provisions, fully authorized by the Constitution of the United States; that the Commissioner had lawful authority to issue the warrant and commit the party, and that his proceedings were regular and conformable to law. We have already stated the opinion and judgment of the court as to the exclusive jurisdiction of the District Court, and the appellate powers which this court is authorized and required to exercise. And if any argument was needed to show the wisdom and necessity of this appellate power, the cases before us sufficiently prove it, and at the same time emphatically call for its exercise.

The judgment of the Supreme Court of Wisconsin must, therefore, be reversed in each of the cases now before the court.

JOHN W. BRITTAN, Appt.,
v.
WM. A. BARNABY, Claimant of the Ship ALBONI, her Tackle, &c.

(See S. C., 21 How., 527–538.)

Freight, when demandable—what is—delivery of part—reasonable time—lien for, when part delivered—opportunity to examine goods—when may be stored, to preserve lien—memorandum on bill of lading—custom, as varying.

The consignee of a ship has no right to demand the freight upon the whole shipment, when he was only ready to deliver a part of it.

Where a ship master has a larger shipment under one bill of lading than he can land in the business hours of a day, as he has the control of unloading the cargo, he must take care to do it in such quantities that he may be able to have the pro rata freight ascertained; and until it shall be done, he is not in readiness to deliver such part, or to demand the freight which may be due upon it. Goods so landed will be under his care and responsibility, without additional expense to the consignee of them until they shall be ready for delivery.

"Freight" is the hire agreed upon between the owner and master, for the carriage of goods from one port or place to another.

That hire, without a different stipulation by the parties, is only payable when the merchandise is in readiness to be delivered to the person having the right to receive it. Then the freight must be paid before an actual delivery can be called for.

The master is bound to deliver the goods in a reasonable time.

When the shipment cannot be landed in a day, if he lands a part of it, his lien upon the whole gives him the power to ask from the consignee of the merchandise a satisfactory security for the payment of the entire freight as called for by the bill of lading. But a security or arrrangement is all that he can ask.

He may not demand that the whole freight of the shipment should be paid before the consignee has the opportunity to examine his goods, to see if the obligations of the bill of lading have been fulfilled by the ship owner.

When landings of the same shipment are made on different days, if the shipper shall not be present to receive the goods, and has not made an arrangement to secure the payment of the freight, they may be stored for safe keeping at the consignee's expense and risk, in the ship owner's name, to preserve his lien for the freight.

A stamp or memorandum upon a bill of lading (that freight is payable prior to delivery) cannot of itself change the well-known commercial rule in respect to the delivery of goods and the payment of freight.

The conveyance and delivery is a condition precedent, to payment of freight, and must be fulfilled.

A memorandum or stamp upon the back of a bill of lading, is insufficient to explain or change it though the ship owner may have made it as an intimation of his mode of doing business, or that a practice prevailed in conformity with it at the port to which the goods were carried and delivered to the consignee.

Any practice at San Francisco, however general it may have become, has not the force of custom to release its merchants from the obligation of an ordinary bill of lading.

Argued Jan. 27, 1859. Decided Mar. 7, 1859.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the districts of California.

The libel in this case was filed in the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of California, by the appellant, for the recovery of the value of certain goods and merchandise shipped on board of said vessel in New York, to be transported and delivered to the libelant at San Francisco.

The said court entered a decree dismissing the libel, with costs. This decree having been affirmed, on appeal, by the Circuit Court, the libelant took an appeal to this court.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. John Sherwood and D. Lord, for appellant.

The principle of mercantile law, that the consignee of the goods has a right to insist that they shall be discharged from the vessel and that he may examine them before he makes himself liable for the freight, is elementary.

The carrier is not at liberty to insist that the goods shall not be landed before he can call upon the merchant for freight. Abb. This principle is also fully established by the Civil Law.

NOTE.—Lien for freight. Who has, and how waived. See note to Blaine v. the Charles Carter, 8 U. S. (4 Cranch 320), and note to Raymond v. Tyson, 58 U. S.

The master has no right to retain the merchandise on board his vessel for default of payment of the freight; but he may, at the time of the discharge, refuse to deliver it, or cause it to beheld for the freight.

Delivery cannot be perfect, until the carrier has discharged the goods from the vessel. Until the carrier is thus discharged from the custody of the goods the freight is not earned.

The distinction between "discharged" and "delivery" is clearly settled.

Ostrander v. Brown, 15 Johns., 39; 1 Pars., Cont., 673; Price v. Powell, 3 N. Y., 322.

When the consignee is ready to receive the goods and tenders the freight, but delivery is refused for the reason that a claim exists contrary to the terms of the bill of lading, the carrier certainly cannot be discharged from his liability.

Stevenson v. Hart, 4 Bing., 476; Powell v. Myers, 26 Wend., 591; 1 Pars., Cont., 666.

2. In this action, all the goods set forth in the bill of lading were not discharged in one day. The reason does not appear. A part having been discharged on the 24th day of October, the libelant offered to pay the freight on that part, and thus placed it in the power of the carrier to have relieved himself from the responsibility of sending the goods to the warehouse.

It was competent for the parties to have agreed to this, and no greater expense or inconvenience would have accrued or resulted. The claimant having refused this reasonable offer, must take the consequences resulting from his refusal.

3. The claimant has offered testimony on the subject of the usages or customs of San Francisco. No foundation for this, however, was laid in his answer or otherwise.

Customs and usages must be pleaded. The decree must be upon the matters alleged and proved.

The words stamped, "goods to be delivered at the vessel's tackles when ready for delivery; not accountable for breakage, leakage or for loss or damage by fire or collision; freight payable prior to delivery, if required; contents," do not vary the contract. Part of them are inconsistent with the words used in the body of the instrument, and otherwise are too indefinite.

No other effect can be given to these stamped words, than to those notices which are intended to limit the carrier's liability, but which generally are rejected as having no value.

Mr. Jacob Broom, for appellee:

1. By the general mercantile law, the obligation of the carrier does not extend beyond carrying from port to port; for this he receives his freight money. All necessary and proper charges that accrue on the goods after arrival, as wharfage, cartage, &c., must be paid by the shipper. If he insist upon a delivery of all the goods at once, before payment, such charges as this renders necessary must be borne by him. According to the course of the California trade, storage is proper and necessary where all the the goods embraced in the bill of lading are not got out in one day; for the master is not at liberty to leave goods exposed on a wharf, but it is his duty to see that they are safely kept.

2. There is no obligation on the master to deliver part of the goods in a single bill of lading, upon payment of part of the freight. Abb. Ship., 493; marginal paging, 377.

3. The contract of the parties here is express, that the consignee shall receive the goods at "the ship's tackles," and that freight must be paid "prior to delivery if required." The stamp is a part of the contract.

5. Even if the usuage were not perfect and universal, but partial, yet, as it was the usage of D. L. Ross & Co., and the libelants had notice of it by previous dealings with that house, and took a bill of lading with notice stamped on its face, it is binding on them.

Mr. Justice Wayne delivered the opinion of the court:

This cause involves an important commercial principle, of daily recurrence in practice, which does not appear to be well understood and settled in San Francisco. Our decision will correct the misapprehension there, in regard to the delivery of merchandise by ship owners, and the payment of freight for its transportation.

The libelant was the owner and consignee of goods of a value exceeding $4,000, which were shipped in good order and condition at New York, on board of the ship Alboni, to be car ried and delivered in San Francisco, in the same order, at a rate of freight expressed in the bill of lading. It amounted to $247.12, including $11.77 for primage. The bill of lading, upon its face, is in the ordinary form; but there was a stamp upon the back of it, in these words: "That the goods were to be delivered at the ship's tackles when ready for delivery—not accountable for loss or damage by fire or collision; freight payable prior to delivery, if required; contents unknown." The proctors in the cause agreed that those words were stamped on the original bill of lading.

The ship arrived at San Francisco. Notice of it was given to the libelant by the consignee of the ship; and he also required payment of the freight of the goods as they should be landed from the ship on the wharf, and that if it was not paid, and the goods received by four o'clock of the day, such of them as had been landed would be placed in a warehouse for safe keeping, at the expense of the libelant. The notice and the requirement are taken from the second article of the respondent's answer to the libel. He adds, that the libelant had refused to pay the freight according to the terms of the bill of lading.

The testimony discloses what the respondent considered to be its terms, and the refusal of the libelant to acquiesce in his interpretation.

The goods were landed from the ship in parcels, on different days, from the 24th to the 27th of October, inclusive. The clerk of the libelant attended on each day to receive them, and in conformity to the notice which had been given, he offered to pay the freight of such of the merchandise as had been landed. The consignee of the ship refused to receive it, or to deliver such goods, claiming that he had a right to demand the freight upon the whole shipment, when he was only ready to deliver a part of it. In the assertion of this right (certainly not in conformity with the notice he had given to the libelant) the respondent from day to day warehoused the goods.

The libelant did all he was bound to do under the notice which had been given to him. He could not have done more. The respondent's refusal to deliver the parcels as they were landed cannot be justified, under the notice he had given, by any delay there may have been in the delivery, either from the necessity of weighing or measuring them, or from the claim made by him to have the freight paid upon the whole shipment before he would deliver a part of it. He had taken his course, and the libelant acquiesced in it, by offering to pay the freight on each parcel as it was put on the wharf, though not bound to do so by the commercial law. The respondent's refusal has no justification, either in law, nor can it be vindicated by any evidence in the cause.

We do not mean to say that the libelant had a right to take the parcels on the days they were landed, without the payment of a pro rata freight; but where a shipmaster has a larger shipment under one bill of lading than he can land in the business hours of a day, as he has the control of unloading the cargo, he must take care not to do it in such quantities that he may not be able to have the pro rata freight ascertained in the only way in which it can be done. Until it shall be done, he is not in readiness to deliver such part, or to demand the freight which may be due upon it. Goods so landed will be under his care and responsibility, without additional expense to the consignee of them, until they shall be ready for delivery.

Odinarily, no difficulty arises between the ship's owner and the consignee of the goods; their interest, convenience, and responsibilities, usually suggest to them some arrangement for the freight beforehand, by which goods landed from day to day may be taken without delay by the consignee of them. In this instance, however, no opportunity was given to the libelant to make such an arrangement, the consignee of the ship having absolutely demanded the whole freight of the shipment as the condition for the delivery of any part of it.

On the fourth day, when all of the libelant's shipment had been landed, and before they were sent to a warehouse, he demanded from the consignee of the ship a delivery order for all the merchandise specified in the bill of lading, tendering at the same time, in gold, the whole freight due. The delivery order was refused, the answer being that the goods were subject, in addition to the freight, to a charge for storage and cartage. The last was also warehoused by the respondent, as those of the three previous landings had been.

The foregoing is a sufficient statement of the facts and evidence in this case for the decision of it. It will not be necessary to notice again the attendance of the clerk of the libelant on days of landing, to receive the goods and pay the freight,

The word freight, when not used in a sense to imply the burden or loading of the ship, or the cargo which she has on board, is the hire agreed upon between the owner and master for the carriage of goods from one port or place to another. That hire, without a different stipulation by the parties, is only payable when the merchandise is in readiness to be delivered to the person having the right to receive it. Then the freight must be paid before an actual delivery can be called for. In other words, the rule is, in the absence of any agreement to the contrary of it, that freight, under an ordinary bill of lading, is only demandable by the owner, master, or consignee of the ship, when they are ready to deliver the goods in the like good order as they were when they were received on board of the ship. Such is the general rule. Neither party can require from the other that the merchandise shipped under one bill of lading shall be put up into parcels for delivery, or for the payment of freight. They may do so by stipulation in the bill of lading, or by subsequent agreement, for either of the purposes just mentioned. The master is bound to deliver the goods in a reasonable time. What may be so, depends upon the facilities there may be for the discharge of the cargo at the port of delivery, and the impediments in the way of it. When the shipment is large, or, from the master's storage of it, it cannot be landed in a day, if he leaves a part of it, his lien upon the whole gives him the power to ask from the consignee of the merchandise a satisfactory security for the payment of the entire freight as called for by the bill of lading. But a security or arrangement is all that he can ask. He may not demand that the whole freight of the shipment should be paid before the consignee has had the opportunity to examine his goods, to see if the obligations of the bill of lading have been fulfilled by the ship-owner. Nor is the ship bound to land an entire shipment in a day, for the proper storage of the goods is the master's care, and he may do it in such a way as may be most advantageous to the ship, taking care that it shall not be done to the injury of the goods, or in such a manner as to produce unreasonable delay in the delivery of them. And when landings of the same shipment are made on different days, if the shipper disregards the notice given to him that such will be the case, and he shall not be present to receive the goods, and has not made an arrangement to secure the payment of the freight, they may be stored for safe keeping at the consignee's expense and risk, in the ship-owner's name, to preserve his lien for the freight. This course was not pursued in this case by the consignee of the ship. He attempts to justify what he did upon the allegation in his answer to the libel, that the bill of lading contained a stipulation, that the freight to be earned on the whole shipment was payable when a portion of it had been landed.

The bill of lading, upon the face of it, is the ordinary one between parties for the transportation of merchandise. The merchandise mentioned in it was to be carried from New York to San Francisco at fixed rates for freight, with primage and average accustomed. There is no other stipulation or condition in it than the undertaking for carrying the goods, and that of the shipper to pay the freight. But the consignee of the ship claimed that the stamp upon the back of the bill of lading was equivalent to one. So his counsel contended in argument. This stamp was in red ink, and was put on the bill of lading by the ship's owner. We will suppose it had been made by Captain Barnaby before he signed the bill of lading. But it was not signed by the parties, nor is there any proof that it was ever recognized by the shipper as a part of his contract. Nothing seems to have been said about it when the bill of lading was signed, nor until it was claimed in San Francisco to be a part of it. It no doubt has a relation to the subject-matter of the bill of lading, and was put there by Captain Barnaby for that purpose; but unless it received the assent of the shipper, it cannot vary the obligations of the contract so as to authorize a demand for freight before the goods were ready for delivery. The question we are now considering is not what effect might be given to such a stamp upon a bill of lading by proof that the parties, at the time it was made, adopted it as a stipulation or agreement that the shipper was to pay the whole freight upon his shipment when a portion of it had been landed from the ship; but the question is, whether such a stamp, of itself, upon a bill of lading, can change the well-known commercial rule in respect to the delivery of goods and the payment of freight. It is that which is asked in this case by the respondent. There is not a word of proof that the shippers in New York, or the consignee in San Francisco, ever regarded it in such a light; none that Captain Barnaby considered the stamp to be a part of the bill of lading assented to by the shipper, until it was asserted by him to be so, in his answer, after the consignee of the ship had attempted to enforce it, as a part of the contract, upon the libelant. It was properly resisted. The personal obligation to pay freight rests upon a bill of lading, when one has been given, and the payment of it is made a condition of delivery. The general rule is, that the delivery of the goods at the place of destination, according to the bill of lading, is necessary to entitle the ship to freight. The conveyance and delivery is a condition precedent, and must be fulfilled. 3 Kent. 218.

Such a stamp cannot be considered a stipulation, according to the legal meaning of that word. All writers upon commercial law use the word stipulation to denote a particular engagement, which may be insisted upon, before it can control the general operation of law, or vary a contract. Such stipulations are not uncommon between ship owners and shippers of merchandise, in charter-parties and in bills of lading. But when done in either, they must be made in words sufficiently intelligible to indicate an agreement that the operation of the law merchant, in respect to those instruments, is not to prevail; and the stipulation must be in writing, and be signed by the parties, before it can be received as an auxiliary to explain how the contract is to be performed. A memorandum or stamp upon the back of a bill of lading is insufficient for such a purpose, though the ship owner may have made it as an intimation of his mode of doing business, or that a practice prevailed in conformity with it at the port to which the goods were to be carried and delivered to a consignee. An attempt was made to assimilate the stamp in this case to a memorandum on a policy of insurance. In the first place, as loose, indefinite, and dangerous, as some of the decisions in the English and American reports are, concerning memorandums of that kind, no case can be found in either, in which effect has been given to any memorandum which was not on the face or in the margin of the policy. But if such a case can be found, we should not feel ourselves at liberty to extend it to a bill of lading for the transportation of merchandise.

Those instruments of commerce are construed by very different principles and usages. The cases cited by counsel to show that the memorandums upon the face of the one were analogous to a stamp put upon a bill of lading, do not apply. Neither do the texts from Duer, 75, 141, do so. The rule in respect to policies of insurance is, that it is not material whether the written words of a policy are inserted in the body of the instrument, or written on its face or on the margin of it; but they must be there in fact; must have been written before the execution of it, or by mutual consent after the execution, and before the commencement of the risk. Thus they then form parts of the contract, it having been determined, from the usages of insurances, that the parties contracted in reference to them, and that the signature and acceptance of the policy was proof that they had done so. All of the other cases cited are agreements, varying, in some particulars, the payment of notes of hand, entered into contemporaneously with the execution of the notes, and which, by proofs, were shown to have been meant by the parties to be a part of them. An attempt was also made to show that a practice prevailed in San Francisco which gave an effect to the stamp upon the bill of lading, so as to control the general rules of commercial law in respect to the payment of freight, and the delivery of merchandise from ships. Whatever may be the practice there, or however general it may be, it is too recent in its use to make an exception, on the ground that it was a custom. The trade of San Francisco is already large; every day develops its resources and the advantages of its position for commerce. No doubt it has not as yet those facilities for the landing of merchandise and loading of ships which our older ports have; but that will not give to any practice there, however general it may have become, the force of custom to release its merchants from the obligation of an ordinary bill of lading. If inconveniences exist in the particular just mentioned, it will be best for the merchants of San Francisco, and those with whom they deal in other parts of the world, that the contract of a bill of lading should have its fixed meaning and obligation, and that it is only alterable by express stipulations made in the way which has been already stated in the decision.

The testimony, however, in this case shows a very uncertain opinion and a fluctuating practice in San Francisco upon the subject of the delivery of shipments of goods and the payment of freight; that such a demand as was made upon the libelant to pay his freight upon all the merchandise mentioned in his bill of lading when only a portion of it had been landed upon the wharf, had only been acquiesced in by many of the merchants there to avoid trouble, to get early possession of their importations, and from an unwillingness to be troubled with lawsuits. There are also differences of opinion as to the efficacy of such a stamp as there was upon the bill of lading in this case, many of them, from their experience and knowledge of trade elsewhere, having a more correct apprehension of the commercial law than the reverse of it, which was attempted to be imposed upon the libelant. Nor can any previous assent to the usage of a particular firm engaged in the shipping business, though acquiesced in by one who had had other dealings with it, be interpreted into an agreement so as to deprive him of a right under an ordinary bill of lading subsequently made.

The view which we have given of this case determines the whole controversy. It comprehends every point raised by the record, or made in the argument of it. The respondent having in the first instance demanded the entire freight called for by the bill of lading, without any right to do so, and having refused to deliver the merchandise belonging to the libelant when the last parcel of it was landed on the wharf, and when the freight due upon the whole of it was tendered, on the ground that there were due charges for cartage and storage, did so without color of law for such refusal. Our judgment is, that those charges must be paid by the respondent, and we shall reverse the decision of the court below, and direct a mandate to be sent to the Circuit Court to order a decree for the libelant for the sum of $4,367.45, with interest from the 2d day of November, 1855. 9th Vol. Stat. at L., 181.

The sum mentioned is proved to have been the value of the libelant's merchandise after freight and primage had been deducted, when it was wrongfully detained by the respondent. The respondent will also be charged with the costs which have been incurred in the prosecution of this libel.

Mr. Justice Daniel dissents to the decision in this case, upon the grounds that the Court of Admiralty in this country, as in England, can take no cognizance of charter-parties or bills of lading, and because this case was within the plain jurisdiction of the courts of the State of California, either at common law or in equity.

THOMAS L. SALISBURY.

(See S. C., 21 How., 426–432.)

New Madrid certificate—located within one year —estoppel by deed.

A holder of a New Madrid certificate had a right to locate it on any of the public lands which had been authorized to be sold.

All New Madrid warrants not located within one year from the 26th of April, 1822, are null and void.

Where a conveyance was made by one not having the legal title, but afterwards under the Act of 1836, the report of the commissioners was confirmed to Bell and his legal representatives, the legal title vested in him; it inured, by way of estoppel to his grantee, and those who claim by deed under him.

Argued Feb. 18, 1859. Decided Mar. 7, 1859.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Missouri.

This case arose upon a petition filed in the St. Louis Court of Common Pleas, by the plaintiff in error, to settle the title to certain lots.

The case was finally submitted to the court on an agreed statement, which is set out in full in the opinion of this court. The court having entered a judgment in favor of the defendant, the plaintiff took an appeal to the Supreme Court of the State of Missouri, which court affirmed the judgment of the court below; whereupon the plaintiff sued out this writ of error.

Mr. H. R. Gamble and C. Gibson, for plaintiff in error:

1. The title under which the plaintiff claims, was good against the United States.

Les Bois v. Bramell, 4 How., 449; Stoddard v. Chambers, 2 How., 284; Mills v. Stoddard, 8 How., 364; Menard v. Massey, 8 How., 310; Delauriere v. Emison, 15 How., 525; Hoffnagle v. Anderson, 7 Wheat., 212.

The survey made by the Surveyor-General, its return by him to the Recorder of land titles, the issuing of a patent certificate by that officer, and of a patent by the President of the United States, were all acts done by the proper officers of the United States; and the question is now for the first time raised in this court, as to the effect of these acts as against the United States.

This question was not only not decided in Mills v. Stoddard, or Stoddard v. Chambers, but the point was not involved in those cases, nor raised by the counsel. On the contrary, in Stoddard v. Chambers, 2 How., 295, the inquiry was, as stated by this court, "whether the defendant (Chambers) had any title as against the plaintiffs."

2. The land was subject to be disposed of by the government during the existence of the bar, from 1829 to 1832, to any person or in any manner, and was then open to entry or location.

And the plaintiff had the right during this time to perfect his title. But had the plaintiff applied for a patent during the bar, he would have been properly answered by the officers of the government, that two patents could never issue by the government for the same land, under the same title, and to the same person; and that, as his patent passed any title the government might have, a second patent could add no strength to his claim.

This case is distinguishable from the one of Mills v. Stoddard in this, that there Mills' title was not complete until after the revival of the reservation; he had a mere equity. Here the title was complete before the passage of the Act of 1832.

The patent was not void as against the government. It continued to claim the land in New Madrid, in lieu of which this patent issued. In all the cases decided in this court on this subject, it is held that if the patent had issued during the bar, it would have passed the title. Yet, where does the President derive his authority to issue a patent upon proceedings utterly void, even as against the government; and if he had any such authority from 1829 to 1832, he surely possessed it in 1827, and we invoke it in this case.

Menard v. Massey, 8 How., 310.

A patent merges all former proceedings.

Bagnell v. Broderick, 13 Pet., 436.

A bona fide transfer of the title in fee to the property by the President, for a valuable consideration, was a sale within the saving clause of the Act of 1836. What is more reasonable or just than to suppose that Congress did not intend that when a title had been completed for a valuable consideration moving to the government, it should not be defeated in favor of claimants, who had very doubtful if any claim at all against the government. This does not conflict with Stoddard v. Chambers, or Mills v. Stoddard; for there the confirmation related back to the passage of the Act of 1832, and Peltier's patent was not then issued. The fee was still in the government.

Mr. T. Ewing, for the defendant in error:

The New Madrid certificate was a gift. The Spanish succession was a right which the United States was bound to respect, both by the treaty stipulation and the law of nations.

Delassus v. U. S., 9 Pet., 133.

The plaintiff has, therefore, no equity as against the defendant, or as against the United States. In order to recover, he must show a title according to law. He must receive the gift subject to all the restrictions imposed by the donor.

The case is well presented in the opinion of the Supreme Court of Missouri (from which the counsel quoted).

The location of their warrant, being against law, was void. In equivalent words, the warrant was unlocated, and in that condition it was an unlocated warrant on the 26th of April, 1828, and on that day all unlocated warrants were, by the Act of Congress of April 26, 1822, ch. 40, declared "null and void." There could be no location of them thereafter. The attention of the court was not called to this provision of the Act of 1822, in the case of Stoddard v. Chambers.

2. The location made on Nov. 16, 1816, being on forbidden ground, was void.

The location being void, was as if it had never been. Having been issued while the saving in favor of the Spanish title, which is an implied prohibition, was in force, the patent as well as the location, was void, because "issued against law."

2 How., 318; 8 How., 332.

The patent then, which was void ab origine, had not become valid on the 28th of May, 1830, when the first series of statutes saving the Spanish claims expired; for a void patent has no more the faculty of creating itself, making itself out of nothing, than a void location. The United States alone can pass the title to its lands. It requires the concurrent Act of the Legislative and Executive Departments. The Legislature forbade the transfer of this title upon this warrant of location. The Executive issued a patent —the act was unauthorized and void. It was not the patent of the United States, for it was issued without authority of law, 9 Cranch, 99; 2 How., 318; 8 How., 332.

Mr. Justice McLean delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a writ of error to the Supreme Court of the State of Missouri.

The parties agreed as to the facts in this case, in order that the points of law might be ruled by the court.

On the 9th of July, 1811, there were confirmed to James Smith, by the commissioners for the adjustment of titles to land in the Territory of Missouri, lots nine and ten (9 and 10), containing two arpents of land, in the Village of Little Prairie, in the County of New Madrid, State of Missouri. Afterwards these lots, while still owned by said Smith, were materially injured by earthquakes, and proof thereof was made before the Recorder of Land Titles at St. Louis, on the 16th of November, 1815; whereupon, there was issued by said recorder, to said James Smith, a certificate of new location (commonly called a New Madrid certificate), numbered 159. On the 22d of October, 1816, said Smith and wife conveyed to Rufus Easton the said two arpents in Little Prairie, and assigned to him the right to locate other lands under said certificate in lieu of the land so injured, and also conveyed to said Easton the land that might be located by means of said certificate. On the 16th of November, 1816, Easton gave notice to the Surveyor-General of said Territory of Missouri of the location of said certificate on a tract of land about two miles west of the City of St. Louis, and demanded a survey thereof. In March, 1818, a survey was made, by direction of the Surveyor-General, in pursuance of said selection, and was duly returned and approved by said Surveyor-General; said survey is numbered 2,491, and the land thereby designated embraces the land in controversy, and is within St. Louis Township, in St. Louis County, Missouri. By virtue of the premises, Easton held said land, claiming the same until 1826, when he conveyed the same to William Russell. On the 28th day of May, 1827, the United States issued a patent on said location for said land to James Smith or his legal representatives. On the 19th of January, 1839, William assigned and conveyed all his interest in said land to J. G. Easton, who, on the 18th of March, 1845, conveyed and assigned the same to plaintiff. Defendant is in possession of the land described in the petition, and the same is within the boundaries indicated by said survey and patent.

On the 20th of January, 1800, a concession was made by the Spanish Lieutenant-Governor, to one Mordecai Bell, of three hundred and fifty arpents of land, including the premises in controversy. The representatives of Mordecai Bell, on the 29th of June, 1808, presented the claim for said land, together with a descriptive plat of survey thereof, to the board of commissioners for the adjustment of land titles in the Territory of Missouri. The documents showing said claim, and the derivative title from Mordecai Bell, were duly recorded in 1808 by the Recorder of Land Titles for the Territory of Missouri. And on the 4th day of July, 1836, the United States confirmed said claim, according to said plat of survey, to the legal representative of M. Bell; a survey of said confirmation was made by authority of the United States in ———, and is numbered 3,026. Said survey embraces the land in dispute; and all the title of the confirmee, by the Act of 1836, is in the defendant. The survey numbered 2,491, and also the patent dated 28th of May, 1827, are in due form of law; but defendant does not admit the authority of the officers of the United States to make the one or issue the other, nor that the same were made or issued under any law. It is admitted that the land in controversy is worth more than $2,000; that if the court should be of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to recover, it is agreed that the damages shall be fixed at one cent, and the monthly value of the premises at $1. Either party is at liberty to turn this case into a bill of exceptions, and thereon prosecute a writ of error, or take an appeal to the Supreme Court of the State of Missouri, or of the United States. It is admitted that survey No. 3,026 was made under the authority of the United States, but the plaintiff may dispute the power of the United States as regards both the confirmation of 1836 and the survey No. 3,026.

It is admitted that the plaintiff had, at the commencement of this suit, all the title that was invested in said James Smith, or his representatives, by the New Madrid location and patent above mentioned.

It will be observed that this controversy arises between a New Madrid title and a Spanish concession. A holder of a New Madrid certificate had a right to locate it on any of the public lands which had been authorized to be sold. This claim came into the hands of Alton R. Easton, the plaintiff in error. It was surveyed in March, 1818, and the 28th of May, 1827, the United States issued a patent to James Smith, or his legal representatives.

From 1808 to the 26th of May, 1829, reservations were made from time to time to satisfy certain claims, but from that time they ceased, until renewed by the Act of the 9th of July, 1832. During this period, it is understood by the plaintiff in error, the "land in question was subject to be disposed of to any person, or in any manner, and was then open to entry or location. And it is urged that the plaintiff had the right during this time to perfect his title."

The President of the United States has no right to issue patents for land, the sale of which is not authorized by law. In the case of Stoddard v. Chambers, 2 How., 318, it is said, "The location of Chambers was made on lands not liable to be thus appropriated, but expressly reserved; and this was the case when his patent was issued." Had the entry been made or the patent issued after the 26th of May, 1829, when the reservation ceased, and before it was revived by the Act of 1832, the title of the defendant could not be contested.

Nothing was done to give Easton's title validity, from the cessation of the reservation, in 1829, until its revival, in 1832. His entry was made in 1818, and on the 28th of May, 1827, his patent was issued. The land located and patented, having been reserved, was not liable to be appropriated by his patent. Whether the withdrawal of the patent might have been procured, or a new one instituted, it is not necessary to inquire. No such attempt was made.

But it seems by the Act of the 26th of April, 1822, it was provided that all warrants under the New Madrid Act of the 15th of February, 1815, which shall not be located within one year, shall be held null and void. This law is decisive upon this point; all New Madrid warrants not located within one year from the 26th of April, 1822, are null and void. Smith's or Easton's certificate for the New Madrid claim was void, and also his patent when issued, under the paramount claim of Bell, whose title was confirmed by the Act of the 4th of July, 1836. Bell made the conveyance to Mackey, not having the legal title; but when, under the Act of 1836, the report of the commissioners was confirmed to Bell and his legal representatives, the legal title vested in him and inured, by way of estoppel, to the grantee and those who claim by deed under him. Stoddard v. Chambers, 2 How., 317.

There was no period from the entry and patent of the New Madrid claim in which that claim was valid. The location was not only voidable, but it was absolutely void, as it was made on land subject to a prior right. And under the Act of 1822, all New Madrid warrants not located within a year from that date, were declared to be void.

Whether we look at the confirmatory Act of 1836, which vested the title in the confirmee, or to the New Madrid title asserted against it, it is clear that the New Madrid title is without validity, and that the fee is vested in the grantee of Bell.

SAMUEL PEARCE, Plff. in Er.,
v.
THE MADISON AND INDIANAPOLIS RAILROAD COMPANY AND THE PERU AND INDIANAPOLIS RAILROAD COMPANY.

Power of consolidated railroad corporation—not to buy steamboat—persons dealing with, must take notice of powers—indorsee must.

Where separate Indiana railroad corporations, created to construct distinct lines of railroad, were consolidated by agreement, and the president of the consolidated company gave notes in its name in payment for a steamboat, to run in connection with the railroads; the rights, duties and obligations of the separate corporations being defined in the laws of Indiana, under which they were organized. Held, that there was no authority of law to consolidate these corporations, and to place both under the same management or to subject the capital of the one to answer for the liabilities of the other.

Also held, that the managers of these corporations had no power to establish a steamboat line to run in connection with the railroads.

Persons dealing with the managers of a corporation must take notice of the limitations imposed upon their authority by the Act of Incorporation.

In suit on notes by an indorsee; held, that the corporation had not the capacity to make the contract, in the fulfillment of which they were executed.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Indiana.

This was an action of assumpsit brought in the court below, by the appellant, as assignee of William McClain, on five promissory notes, for $1,000 each.

The defendants demurred to each of the special counts contained in the declaration. The court below sustained the demurrers, and entered a final judgment for the defendants; whereupon the plaintiff took an appeal to this court.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Charles Fox and O. H. Smith, for the plaintiff in error:

The contract for the purchase of the boat, after it was executed by the delivery of the boat to the appellees, was binding upon them, and it does not lie with them to take advantage of their own wrong, by rescinding their contract and keeping the boat.

16 Eng. Law & Eq., 596.

But even if the contract was void, the boat remained in the hands of the appellees, the property of the payee of these notes, and he could have maintained replevin or detinue for the property before it was sold by the appellees, and converted to their own use.

1 Chit. Pl., title Replevin, p. 162, ed. 1855.

If the possession of the boat was obtained by the appellees under a void contract, and they sold the boat and converted the proceeds to their own use, the payee of the notes could have maintained an action of trover and conversion against the appellees for his damages.

The objection urged in the Circuit Court was, that as the notes were executed by the consolidated Company, they cannot be sued jointly upon them, since the consolidation was dissolved. The answer to this is:

1. That they cannot be send separately, without hazarding a plea in abatement for the non-joinder of the other joint contractor.

Mr. T. A. Hendricks for defendants in error.

Mr. Justice Campbell delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendants are separate Corporations, existing under the laws of Indiana, and were created to construct distinct lines of railroad that connect at Indianapolis, in that State. The plaintiff is the assignee of five promissory notes, that were executed under conditions set forth in the declaration, and of which he had notice. The two Corporations (defendants), some time before the date of the notes, were consolidated by agreement, and assumed the name of the Madison, Indianapolis and Peru Railroad Company, and under that name, and under a common board of management, conducted the business of both lines of road.

While the business of the two Corporations was thus directed and managed, the president of the consolidated Company gave these notes in its name in payment for a steamboat, which was to be employed on the Ohio River, to run in connection with the railroads. After the execution of the notes, and the acquisition of the boat, this relation between the Corporations was dissolved by due course of law, and, at the commencement of the suit, each Corporation was managing its own affairs. The plaintiff claims that the two Corporations are jointly bound for the payment of the notes, but the circuit court sustained a demurrer to the declaration.

The rights, duties and obligations of the defendants are defined in the Acts of the Legislature of Indiana, under which they were organized, and reference must be had to these, to ascertain the validity of their contracts. They empower the defendants respectively to do all that was necessary to construct and put in operation a railroad between the cities which are named in the acts of incorporation. There was no authority of law to consolidate these Corporations, and to place both under the same management, or to subject the capital of the one to answer for the liabilities of the other; and so the courts of Indiana have determined. But in addition to that act of illegality, the managers of these Corporations established a steamboat line to run in connection with the railroads, and thereby diverted their capital from the objects contemplated by their charters, and exposed it to perils, for which they afforded no sanction. Now, persons dealing with the managers of a corporation must take notice of the limitations imposed upon their authority by the act of incorporation. Their powers are conceded in consideration of the advantage the public is to receive from their discreet and intelligent employment, and the public have an interest that neither the managers nor stockholders of the corporation shall transcend their authority. In McGregor v. The Official Manager of the Deal and Dover Railway Co., 16 Eng. L. & Eq., 180, it was considered that a railway company incorporated by Act of Parliament was bound to apply all the funds of the company for the purposes directed and provided for by the Act, and for no other purpose whatever, and that a contract to do something beyond these was a contract to do an illegal act, the illegality of which, appearing by the provisions of a public Act of Parliament, must be taken to be known to the whole world. In Coleman v. The Eastern Counties Railway Co., 10 Beav., 1, Lord Langdale, at the suit of a shareholder, restrained the Corporation from using its funds to establish a steam communication between the terminus of the road (Harwich) and the northern ports of Europe. The directors of the Company vindicated the appropriation as beneficial to the Company, and similar arrangements were not unusual among railway companies. Lord Langdale said: "Ample powers are given for the purpose of constructing and maintaining the railway, and for doing all those things required for its proper use when made. But I apprehend that it has nowhere been stated that a railway company, as such, has power to enter into all sorts of other transactions. Indeed, it has been very properly admitted that railway companies have no right to enter into new trades or businesses not pointed out by the Acts. But it has been contended that they have a right to pledge, without limit, the funds of the company for the encouragement of other transactions, however, various and extensive, provided that the object of that liability is to increase the traffic upon the railway, and thereby to increase the profit to the shareholders.

There is, however, no authority for anything of that kind. It has been stated that these things, to a small extent, have been frequently done since the establishment of railways; but unless the acts so done can be proved to be in conformity with the powers given by the special Acts of Parliament, under which these acts are done, they furnish no authority whatever. In The East Ang. Railway Company v. The Eastern Counties Railway Company, 11 C. B. (73 Eng.), 803, the court say the statute incorporating the defendants' Company gives no authority respecting the bills in Parliament promoted by the plaintiffs, and we are therefore bound to say that any contract relating to such bills is not justified by the Act of Parliament, is not within the scope of the authority of the Company as a Corporation, and is therefore void."

We have selected these cases to illustrate the principle upon which the decision of this case has been made. It is not a new principle in the jurisprudence of this court. It was declared in the early case of Head v. Providence Insurance Company, 2 Cranch, 127, and has been reaffirmed in a number of others that followed it. Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 13 Pet., 519; Perrine v. Ches. & Del. Can. Co., 9 How., 172.

It is contended, that because the steamboat was delivered to the defendants, and has been converted to their use, they are responsible. It is enough to say, in reply to this, that the plaintiff was not the owner of the boat, nor does he claim under an assignment of the owner's interest. His suit is instituted on the note, as an indorsee; and the only question is, had the Corporation the capacity to make the contract, in the fulfillment of which they were executed? The opinion of the court is, that it was a departure from the business of the Corporation, and that their officers exceeded their authority.

Judgment affirmed.

Practice—order of cases—after mandate to court below, no appeal till final decision.

No case can be taken up out of its order on the docket, where private interests only are concerned.

The only cases where this rule does not apply, are those in which the question in dispute will embarrass the Government while it remains unsettled.

court, no case can be taken up out of its order on the docket, where private interests only are concerned. The only cases in which they will depart from this rule, are those where the question in dispute will embarrass the operations of the Government while it remains unsettled. But when a case is sent to the court below by a mandate from this court, no appeal will lie from any order or decision of the court until it has passed its final decree in the case. And if the court does not proceed to execute the mandate, or disobeys and mistakes its meaning, the party aggrieved may, by motion for a mandamus, at any time, bring the errors or omissions of the inferior court before this court for correction. Upon looking into the record in the case of United States v. Fossatt, the court doubt whether there has been a final decision under the mandate, and whether the present appeal ought not to be dismissed on that ground. If there is no final decree, the proceedings of the court below cannot be interrupted by an appeal from interlocutory proceedings.

The court, therefore, desire to hear the counsel upon the question, whether the decree in question is final, upon motion to dismiss, and will hear the argument on Monday, March 7th.

THE UNITED STATES, Appts.,

v.

CHARLES FOSSATT.

Second appeal cannot be had, till first decree complied with.

After the authenticity of a grant of land in California is ascertained in this court, and a reference has been made to the District Court, to determine the external bounds of the grant, in order that the final confirmation may be made, another appeal cannot be claimed until the whole of the directions of this court are complied with, and that decree made.

Argued Mar. 8, 1859. Decided Mar. 11, 1859.

ON MOTION to dismiss on the ground that the decree of the District Court is not final.

Mr. Justice Campbell delivered the opinion of the court:

This cause came before this court by appeal from the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of California, and was decided at the last term, and is reported in U. S. v. Fossatt, 20 How., 413.

The court determined:

"That a grant under which the plaintiff claimed land in California was valid for one league, to be taken within the southern, western and eastern boundaries designated therein, at the election of the grantee and his assigns, under the restrictions established for the location and survey of private land claims in California by the Executive Department of the Government. The external boundaries of the grant may be declared by the District Court from the evidence on file, and such other evidence as may be produced before it; and the claim of an interest equal to three fourths of the land granted is confirmed to the appellee."

The District Court, in conformity with the directions of the decree, declared the external lines on three sides of the tract claimed, leaving the other line to be completed by a survey to be made. From the decree, in this form, the United States have appealed.

A motion has been submitted to the court for the dismissal of the appeal, because the decree of the District Court is interlocutory, not final.

This motion is resisted, because the inquiries and decrees of the Board of Commissioners for the settlement of private land claims in California, by the Act of 3d March, 1851 (9 Stat. at L., 632), in the first instance, and of the courts of the United States on appeal, relate only to the question of the validity of the claim—and by validity is meant its authenticity, legality, and in some cases interpretation, but does not include any question of location, extent, or boundary—and that the District Court has gone to the full limit of its jurisdiction in the decree under consideration, if it has not already exceeded it.

The matter submitted by Congress to the inquiry and determination of the Board of Commissioners, by the Act of 3d March, 1851 (9 Stat. at L., 632, sec. 8), and to the courts of the United States on appeal, by that Act and the Act of 31st August, 1852 (10 Stat. at L., 99, sec. 12), are the claims "of each and every person in California, by virtue of any right or title derived from the Spanish or Mexican Government." And it will be at once understood that these comprehend all private claims to land in California.

The effect of the inquiry and decision of these tribunals upon the matter submitted is final and conclusive. If unfavorable to the claimant, the land "shall be deemed, held, and considered, as a part of the public domain of the United States;" but if favorable, the decrees rendered by the Commissioners or the courts "shall be conclusive between the United States and the claimants."

These Acts of Congress do not create a voluntary jurisdiction, that the claimant may seek or decline. All claims to land that are withheld from the Board of Commissioner during the legal term for presentation, are treated as non-existent, and the land as belonging to the public domain.

Thus it appears that the right and title of the inhabitants of California, at the date of the Treaty of Guadaloupe Hidalgo, to land within its limits, with the exception of some within the limits of a pueblo or corporation described in the 14th section of the Act of 3d March, 1851, must undergo the scrutiny of this Board, and that its decisions are subject to review in the District and Supreme Courts. This jurisdiction comprehends every species of title or right, whether inchoate or complete; whether resting in contract or evinced by authentic act and judicial possession.

The object of this inquiry was not to discover forfeitures or to enforce rigorous conditions. The declared purpose was to authenticate titles, and to afford the solid guarantee to rights which ensues from their full acknowledgment by the supreme authority. The tribunals were therefore enjoined to proceed promptly, and to render judgment upon the pleadings and evidence; and in deciding, they were to be governed by the laws of nations, the stipulations of the Treaty of Guadaloupe Hidalgo, the laws, usages and customs of the Government from which the claim is derived, the principles of equity, and the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States in similar cases.

What are the questions involved in the inquiry into the validity of a claim to land?

It is obvious that the answer to this question must depend, in a great measure, upon the state and condition of the evidence. It may present questions of the genuineness and authenticity of the title, and whether the evidence is forged or fraudulent; or, it may involve an inquiry into the authority of the officer to make a grant, or whether he was in the exercise of the faculties of his office when it was made; or, it may disclose questions of the capacity of the grantee to take, or whether the claim has been abandoned or is a subsisting title, or has been forfeited for a breach of conditions. Questions of each kind here mentioned have been considered by the court in cases arising under this law.

But, in addition to these questions upon the vitality of the title, there may arise questions of extent, quantity, location, boundary, and legal operation, that are equally essential in determining the validity of the claim.

In affirming a claim to land under a Spanish or Mexican grant, to be valid within the law of nations, the stipulations of the Treaty of Guadaloupe Hidalgo, and the usages of those governments, we imply something more than that certain papers are genuine, legal, and translative of property. We affirm that ownership and possession of land of definite boundaries rightfully attach to the grantee.

In the case of The United States v. Arredondo, 6 Pet., 691, the inquiries of this court, beside those affirming the legality of the grant, extended to questions of forfeiture for the nonfulfillment of conditions, the inalienability of lands in possession of an Indian tribe, and fraud. The Superior Court of Florida in that suit directed that the land should be surveyed, in the form of a square, with a designated monument as the center. This court annulled that decree, and ascertained another as the central point. The appeal in Mitchell v. United States, 15 Pet., 52, was taken in a case that had been decided here, and in which an issue upon the decree that succeeded the mandate of this court, and made in execution of it, subsequently arose. Certain property about Fort St. Mark's was excepted in the original decree of confirmation, and reserved to the United States, and the Superior Court in that decree was directed to ascertain the extent and boundaries of the land reserved. This was done, and the land specifically described, and on appeal this decree was affirmed.

These questions arose upon an Act of Congress that required the courts, "by a final decree, to settle and determine the question of the validity of the title according to the law of nations, the stipulations of any treaty and proceedings under the same, the several Acts of Congress in relation thereto, and the laws and ordinances of the Government from which it is alleged to have been derived." This Act enumerates as proper to be heard and decided, preliminary to such a decree, questions of extent, location, and boundary. 4 Stat. at L., 52, sec. 2.

It is asserted on the part of the appellants that the District Court has no means to ascertain the specific boundaries of a confirmed claim, and no power to enforce the execution of its decree, and consequently cannot proceed further in the cause than it has done.

The 13th section of the Act of 3d March, 1851, makes it the duty of the Surveyor General to cause all private claims which shall be finally confirmed to be accurate surveyed, and to furnish plats of the same. It was the practice under the Acts of 1824 and 1828, 4 Stat. at L., 52, 284, for the court to direct their mandates specifically to the Surveyor designated in those Acts. And in the case Ex parte Sibbald v. United States, 12 Pet., 488, the duty of the Surveyor to fulfill the decree of the court and the power of the court to enforce the discharge of that duty, are declared and maintained. The duties of the Surveyor begin under the same conditions, and are declared in similar language, in the Acts of 1824, 1828, and of 1851.

The opinion of the court is, that the power of the District Court over the cause, under the Acts of Congress, does not terminate until the issue of a patent, conformably to the decree.

In the exercise of the jurisdiction conferred by this Act, and Acts of a similar character, this court has habitually revised decrees of the District Court, which were not final decrees under the Judiciary Act of 1789. The court has uniformly accepted, in the first instance, as a final decree, one that ascertained the authenticity of the claimant's title, and declared, in general terms, its operation, leaving the questions of boundary and location to be settled subsequently. This practice was approved in the case last cited. The peculiar nature of these cases rendered such a relaxation, of the rules of proceeding of the court, appropriate. The United States did not appear in the courts as a contentious litigant; but as a great nation, acknowledging their obligation to recognize as valid every authentic title, and soliciting exact information to direct their executive Government to comply with that obligation.

They had instrumentalities adequate to the fulfillment of their engagements without delay, whenever their existence was duly ascertained. There was no occasion for the strict rules of proceeding that experience has suggested, to secure a speedy and exact administration between suitors of a different character. And it has rarely occurred that the same case has reappeared in the court after the first decree. If the litigation had been other than it was, the rule of proceeding would have varied with it.

But, after the authenticity of the grant is ascertained in this court, and a reference has been made to the District Court, to determine the external bounds of the grant, in order that the final confirmation may be made, we cannot understand upon what principle an appeal can be claimed until the whole of the directions of this court are complied with, and that decree made.

It would lead to vexatious and unjust delays to sanction such a practice. It is the opinion of the court that this appeal was improvidently taken and allowed, and must be dismissed; and that the District Court proceed to ascertain the external lines of the land confirmed to the appellees, and enter a final decree of confirmation of the land.

RUSSELL STURGIS, Libt. Appt.,

v.

JOHN CLOUGH, ROBERT L. MABEY AND HENRY M. WEED, Claimants of the Steamboat R. L. MABEY, her Tackle, &c.

(See S. C., 21 How., 451–456.)

Collision—steam tugs—rule.

Two steam-tugs two or three miles apart, looking out for employment, each started for a brig, in different directions, to tender their services.

According to the established rules for navigating boats under such circumstances, the steam-tug, which was following in the wake of the brig, should come up on her starboard quarter, and slack her engine, so as not to pass the brig.

The steam-tug which was coming down in the opposite direction, ought to round to, either to windward or leeward, so as to head the same way as the brig.

The evidence clearly shows that this collision was occasioned wholly through the fault of the master and pilot, of the latter.

Argued Feb. 22, 1859. Decided Mar. 11, 1859.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York.

The libel in the case was filed in the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York, by the appellant, to recover damages resulting from a collision.

The court entered a decree dismissing the libel, without costs. The Circuit Court, on appeal, affirmed this decree; whereupon the libelant took an appeal to this court.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Mr. E. C. Benedict, for appellant.

Mr. D. McMahon, for appellees.

The arguments of counsel, being almost entirely confined to the facts, are not here given.

Mr. Justice Grier delivered the opinion of the court:

The libelant in this case is owner of a steam-tug called The Zachary Taylor, or Hector.

The claimants are owners of the steam-tug Mabey.

At the time of this collision, on the 11th of August, 1854, they were both engaged in the business of towing vessels into the port of New York, from the neighborhood of Sandy Hook.

The Hector was an old, heavy boat, some one hundred and eighty or one hundred and ninety feet long: The Mabey a new, light boat, of about one hundred feet in length, and much the swifter of the two, in the ratio of about fourteen to eight.

They were each looking out for employment about noon of that day, when the brig Wanderer was passing in, by Sandy Hook, sailing slowly in a northwest course. The two steam-tugs must have been some two or three miles apart, when they each started for the brig in different directions, in order to tender their services. Each boat put all its steam, as the first who could hail the brig would be entitled to the job.

The Hector, being in the rear, came up in the wake of the brig and nearly on her course. The Mabey came in S. S. E. course, meeting the brig in an acute angle to its course. As they came together near the starboard quarter of the brig, their respective distances from her at the time of starting must have been in the ratio of their velocities. The Mabey, being much the fastest boat, no doubt expected to make up for this difference in distance by her superior fleetness.

According to the established rules for navigating boats under such circumstances, The Hector, which was following in the wake of the brig, should come up on her starboard quarter, and slack her engine, so as not to pass the brig. The Mabey, which was coming down in the opposite direction, ought to round to, either to windward or leeward, so as to head the same way as the brig. Had these well-known rules been observed, no collision would have occurred in consequence of the race for precedence.

Cases may occur in which two steamboats engaged in unlawful racing may recklessly or willfully dash against each other; and the courts, treating them both as criminals, may refuse to sustain an action or decide which was most to blame, leaving each to suffer the consequences of his own folly and recklessness.

We do not think that the testimony shows this to be such a case. Each of these boats had a right to move as fast as it could in order to obtain precedence, and each had a right to expect that the other would pursue the customary and proper course in navigating their vessels, in such circumstances, by the observance of which there would be no danger of collision.

Have both these boats, in their anxiety for precedence, disregarded the proper precautions to avoid a collision, or is the fault wholly to be attributed to the mismanagement of The Mabey?

The defense set up in the answer, that The Mabey "got to the brig first, slacked her speed, slowed and stopped, and that The Hector attempted to pass under the bows of The Mabey, and in executing that maneuver, with the covetous desire of getting the right to tow the brig, she ran against The Mabey, obliquely," &c., is clearly and satisfactorily proven to be not true. The fact that the stem of The Mabey, the lighter and swifter boat, was driven into the starboard bow of The Hector, stripping her guards down to the wheel, shows conclusively that The Mabey was not stopped, but was under nearly full headway.

If the collision had occurred as stated in the answer, the great momentum of the larger boat would most probably have sunk the smaller.

The witnesses on The Hector all concur that, though the engineer was directed to proceed with his utmost dispatch, The Hector followed in the wake of the brig, and when near to her had slacked her speed and stopped her wheel, so as to lap on the stern of the brig as she came alongside of her starboard quarter, and within twenty feet of her; and that she was nearly at rest when The Mabey ran, with all her force, into the starboard bow of The Hector. As these witnesses are all confirmed by the pilot of the brig, who was an impartial observer of the whole transaction, his statement may be fairly taken as a correct representation of it.

NOTE.—Collision. Rules for avoiding steamer meeting steamer. See note to Williamson v. Barrett, 54 U. S. (13 How.), 101.

He states that he first saw The Hector about a mile distant, heading towards the brig, about northwest; that she came up to the brig in about ten minutes, stopped her engine when she came within one hundred to two hundred yards of the brig, and then came alongside with the way she had on; and the captain spoke to the witness. That the brig was going at the rate of about a mile an hour, and The Hector was dropping astern, if anything, when The Mabey ran into her.

That, when he first observed The Mabey, she was about half a mile off, coming southwest or west-southwest; that she was about an eighth of a mile from the brig when The Hector let her steam off; that she continued her course till she struck the starboard bow of The Hector, and ran into her forward of the wheelhouse; that, when the pilot of The Mabey discovered that he had run his boat so as to render a collision inevitable, he ran out of the pilot house and went aft; that the wheels of The Mabey were in motion till the time of the collision; that The Hector could do nothing to avoid the collision, because she had stopped her engine and was falling behind the brig.

The master of The Hector acted on the supposition that The Mabey, according to custom, would round to, and could not anticipate that, contrary to all rule, she would run into The Hector, as she lay nearly at rest, lapping on the stern of the brig, when a single turn of her wheel, with her great headway, would have run her entirely clear of any danger of collision. Hence, when his pilot told him The Mabey was coming in a direction to run into him, he said, "No, she will go under our stern." He presumed, and had a right to presume, that the pilot of The Mabey knew his duty, and intended to round to, behind the stern of the brig and tug, and not make the reckless attempt to run between them.

The testimony of the pilot of The Mabey, in fact, confirms this view of the case, and shows the collision to have been occasioned entirely by his own fault, or that of the master who directed him. He says, "My instruction was to run close to the brig's stern." The master says, "he expected The Hector would get out of his way;" and the pilot says, "I supposed she would go on the other quarter, or else steer outside of me." In other words, he proceeded in a direction which he knew must produce a collision unless The Hector would get out of his way. It is clear that his intention was to drive The Hector away from the brig, or compel her to take the consequences. The pilot admits, also, that he knew the proper way to approach the brig was by rounding to; which would not have brought him within three hundred feet of the point of collision. He admits, also, that he could have gone on either side of the brig, and "knew it was nautical and customary to come up on the weather quarter, and to round to for a tow, but he had instructions from the captain to go for the brig, and to get there before The Hector if he could."

We are of opinion, therefore, that the evidence clearly shows that this collision was occasioned wholly through the fault of the master and pilot of The Mabey.

The decree of the Circuit Court is, therefore, reversed, with costs, and the record remitted with instructions to enter a decree in favor of libelant, and have such further proceedings as to justice and right may appertain.

THE WESTERN TELEGRAPH COMPANY, Appt.,

v.

THE MAGNETIC TELEGRAPH COMPANY, AND ARUMAH S. ABEL AND ZENUS BARNUM.

(See S. C., 21 How., 456-460.)

Telegraph contract—circuitous line.

Where the Western Telegraph Company had the exclusive right to use the Morse patent on lines from Baltimore to Wheeling, with branches to Washington and Pittsburg, respectively.

The complaint that at the points where the operations of the Western Telegraph cease, whether it be east, north, or west, the messages are not forwarded by the Western Telegraph Co., but they are diverted from those lines, and sent by circuitous routes, or at least by lines of increased length: as no contract, express or implied, is shown, entitles the complainant to no relief.

A choice of lines may well be exercised, if there be no violation of the patent, although the circuitous line passes over a greater distance, as this can be no ground of complaint.

Argued Mar. 3, 1859. Decided Mar. 11, 1859.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Maryland.

The bill in this case was filed in the court below, by the appellant, for an injunction and accounting, etc., for an alleged breach of certain patent privileges.

The court having entered a decree dismissing the bill, the complainant took an appeal to this court.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Cornelius McLean, for appellant:

1. The complainant claims that under its assignment it is entitled to all the business between Wheeling and Pittsburg, and Washington and Baltimore.

The defendants could not have set up a parallel line of telegraph between those points, and the question is, simply, whether they could do indirectly and by combination, what they could not do directly.

Lee v. Lee, 8 Pet., 44; U. S. v. Quincy, 6 Pet., 466; The William King, 2 Wheat., 148; see, also, Feigley v. Feigley, 7 Md., 561.

2. The complainant, being entitled to carry telegraphic messages between those points, has also the right to carry all messages reaching those points and destined for other points on its line, or other points to which its line is the shortest and most direct route; and the defendants cannot lawfully combine with others to divert them from the complainant's line.

Mr. R. J. Brent, for appellees.

Mr. Justice McLean delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Maryland.

On the 30th of April, 1849, a contract was entered into between Amos Kendall, as attorney in fact for Samuel F. B. Morse, and Alfred Vail, of the first part, and the Western Telegraph Company of the second part.

In the agreement, it was stated that the United States had heretofore granted to Samuel F. B. Morse letters patent for the magnetic telegraph, known as Morse's Telegraph; and that the said Morse subsequently assigned a portion of his interest in the said letters patent to Alfred and Leonard V. Gale; and the said Morse, Gale, and Vail, subsequently, by letters of attorney, recorded among the transfers of patent rights, constituted Amos Kendall their true and lawful attorney, for them and in their behalf, &c. And whereas, the said Western Telegraph Company are desirious to obtain, in due form, the privileges of said letters patent for lines of telegraph belonging to them between Baltimore and Wheeling, with a branch therefrom to Washington City, and a branch from Brownsville to the City of Pittsburg:

Now, the said Amos Kendall, in consideration of $36,000 paid to him in the stock certificates of the Western Telegraph Company, hath, as far as he possesses legal authority, by virtue of the power of attorney aforesaid, or otherwise, granted, assigned, and conveyed, to the Western Telegraph Company, the full and exclusive right to use the invention of the said Morse, secured by letters patent on the said lines from Baltimore to Wheeling, with branches to Washington and Pittsburg, respectively, for the remainder of the time yet to come in the said letters patent, with the benefit of any extensions and renewals thereof, it being understood that the right granted is to be for one wire only, unless with the consent of the patentee.

And Francis O. J. Smith conveyed his right to the Western Telegraph Company's existing lines from Baltimore, in the State of Maryland, to Wheeling, in the State of Virginia, and in branches to Washington and Pittsburg cities, in full right, on the 27th of March, 1857.

These conveyances vested in the Western Telegraph Company all the right which the patentee had, on the conditions stated, to use and enjoy the lines designated for the transmission of telegraphic messages, in as full and ample a manner as the patentee could himself have enjoyed, had no assignment of his right been made.

But it is alleged that another assignment of Morse's patent was made to a company from Pittsburg to Philadelphia, and to another company from Harrisburg to Baltimore, and that, by conspiring with those companies, the Magnetic Company has taken messages at Philadelphia, sent from Pittsburg and Wheeling, directed to Baltimore and Washington, and other similar messages from the Harrisburg line directed to Washington; and also messages from Washington and Baltimore, by Philadelphia and Harrisburg, to Wheeling and Pittsburg, and through those points to points further west; and that this was done by uniting the lines or working them together, under a contract, in order that they might get, in conjunction with the other Companies, the whole of the business between those points.

The complainants do not seem to be well advised as to what means of combination, conspiracy, or contract, the injury complained of has been done; but they charge that, by the means alleged, their lines have, in a degree, been destroyed. They are only able to say that the business on their lines has been diverted by the magnetic lines. And the equitable powers of the court are invoked against the injuries complained of.

The bill does not allege any direct infringement of the patent, owned by the Western Telegraph Company, by the Magnetic Company. Those lines are free to transmit any messages that may be forwarded on them. But the complaint seems to be, that at the points where the operations of the Western Telegraph cease, whether it be east, north, or west, the messages are not forwarded by the Western Telegraph, but they are, by the means used, diverted from those lines, and sent by circuitous routes, or at least by lines of increased length.

It must be expected that great competition will exist in the transmission of intelligence, where telegraphic lines have been established throughout the country. But it would be difficult to find a remedy for these evils, whether real or supposed, which are not founded on contract. It was in the power of the Western Telegraph Company to form connections with other lines, so as to secure uninterrupted communications. But if these precautions have not been observed, and a supposed convenience or dispatch has been deemed a sufficient security for the cooperation of the lines connected with the Western Telegraph Company, and no contract, express or implied, is shown, the complainant is without remedy.

Men, unless legally bound to certain duties, may, from whim or caprice, indulge their supposed interests or resentments without responsibility. Unless certain rates of transmitting intelligence have been established, a reduction of such rates, whether done secretly or publicly, will affect the profits on other lines.

Nothing set up in the bill, in the form of a contract, entitles the complainant to relief. A choice of lines may well be exercised, if there be no violation of the patent, although the circuitous line passes over a greater distance, as this can be no ground of complaint. It violates no contract, and almost necessarily grows out of the competition in this branch of business.

From the facts stated in the bill, there seems to be ground for relief.

THE WESTERN TELEGRAPH COMPANY, Appt.,

v.

GEORGE C. PENNIMAN AND JOHN KING.

(See S. C., 21 How., 460-463.)

Telegraph message—obligation to send by particular line.

The Western Telegraph Company filed their bill as the sole proprietors of the right to construct and use Morse's electro-magnetic telegraph between Baltimore and New York and Harrisburg, and pray for an injunction.

The principal ground of complaint in the bill is, that the business of the Western Telegraph Company has been diverted from it, upon other lines, greatly to its injury, and it would seem that circuitous routes have been selected, rather than the more direct one. This affords no ground for relief.

There is no obligation on a person sending a telegraphic message to select the shortest or the longest line, unless he has entered into a contract to forward all such messages on a particular line.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Maryland.

The history and facts of this case are substantially the same as of the preceding case. The argument of counsel there given also applies to this case.

The case is further stated by the court.

Mr. Cornelius McLean, for appellant.

Mr. R. J. Brent, for appellees.

Mr. Justice McLean delivered the opinion of the court:

This case is before us by an appeal from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Maryland.

The Western Telegraph Company, a corporation incorporated by the States of Maryland, Virginia and Pennsylvania, have filed their bill against George C. Penniman and John King, citizens of Maryland, and charges them with the violation of the patented rights of the Western Telegraph Company, under a contract made with Morse, Vail and Smith, dated the 8th of March, 1840. The above-named persons are alleged to be the sole proprietors of the right to construct and use Morse's electro-magnetic telegraph, by him invented and patented, on the route between Baltimore, in the State of Maryland, and New York, and Harrisburg, in the State of Pennsylvania, for and in consideration of $30 per miles, by the route on which the telegraph has been or may be constructed, between the points or places aforesaid. And said right, through their agent, Amos Kendall, was conveyed unto John C. Penniman and his assigns, to construct between the points or places aforesaid the said telegraph, with one or more wires, with the apparatus for working the same and the improvements therein. And the said Morse & Co. covenant not to grant to any other person or persons the right to construct any other line of telegraph under the patent aforesaid, within the aforesaid limits, either in a direct or indirect line.

The contract between Kendall, as attorney of Morse and Vail, with the Western Telegraph Company, granted to it in due form the privileges of said letters patent for lines of telegraph belonging to it, between Baltimore and Wheeling, with a branch therefrom to Washington City, and a branch from Brownsville to the City of Pittsburg, &c.; and the right of Francis O. J. Smith, which was also conveyed, was limited to the Western Telegraph Company's existing lines from Baltimore, in the State of Maryland, to Wheeling, in the State of Virginia, and in branches to Washington and Pittsburg cities; the right herein conveyed and so limited by said territorial termini being one fourth part of said invention and letters patent, &c.

The complainants pray for an injunction, and that an account may be taken, for a breach of its patent privileges.

The defendants procured an assignment of Morse's patented electro-telegraph between the Cities of Baltimore and Harrisburg, and afterwards a like assignment from him between Baltimore and Wheeling, with the right of a branch to Pittsburg and Washington; and it is alleged that complainants claim the right to telegraphic business on the Morse plan between those points; not only all that commence and end at these several points, but all that, starting at remote points, has to reach either of those points by coming through either of the others.

There can be no doubt that the right of transmitting on the lines conveyed to the Western Telegraph Company are as full and ample as would have been the rights of the patentee, had he never assigned them.

The assignment of Morse's to a Company from Pittsburg to Philadelphia, and from Washington to Baltimore, Philadelphia and New York, it is alleged, has enabled the defendants to take messages at Harrisburg from Wheeling, directed to Baltimore and Washington, and other southern points; and has also, in like manner, taken messages from the Magnetic Company between Washington and New York at Baltimore, and transmit them to Pittsburg, and to points west, through Pittsburg. And this was done, it is said, in conjunction with the said companies, in order to get the business which, but for said combination, would and ought to have come by the complainants' line.

The charges against Penniman and King are, substantially, the same combinations as charged against the agents of the Magnetic Company; and we can only say, as was said in the other case, the assignees may claim a protection in all the rights assigned to them; and if, in any respect, their patent has been infringed, a remedy is open to them. But it does not appear that the defendants were limited as to the use of the lines owned by the Western Telegraph Company, although the points on their lines were shortest. Each person, in using a telegraph line, is free to select his own conveyance. There are several things which recommend telegraphic lines. The machinery should be kept in proper order; strict attention should be given to the transmission of messages, and competent persons engaged in the office. Where there is much competition, great energy is required. And if this be wanting, success may not be expected.

The principal ground of complaint in the bill is, that the business of the Western Telegraph Company has been diverted from it, and thrown upon other lines, greatly to its injury, and it would seem that circuitous routes have been selected, rather than the more direct ones. If this be so, does it afford a ground for relief? There is no obligation on a person sending a telegraphic message to select the shortest or the longest line. He may consult his own interest or choice in such a matter, and he incurs no responsibility to anyone, unless he has entered into a contract to forward all such messages on a particular line. No such allegation is contained in the bill, and there is no charge that the Western Telegraph Company has been molested in the exercise of its patented rights, except by the transfer of its business to other lines; and it is not alleged that these lines are prohibited from carrying messages by reason of their contiguity to the plaintiffs' lines.

Judgment affirmed.

JAMES C. CONVERSE, Administrator of PHILIP GREELY, JR., Deceased, Plff. in Er.,

v.

THE UNITED STATES.

Agent to make purchases for light-house service—revenue officer may be—compensation—law forbidding, not applicable.

Notwithstanding the Act of May 7, 1822, sec 18 which provides that "no collector shall ever receive more than $400 annually, exclusive of his compensation as collector, for any service he may render in any other office or capacity, and the Act of 1839, embracing all persons holding office with a fixed salary, precisely similar in its principles and subsequent legislation on this subject, the secretary had a right to employ an agent, instead of the collector or, collectors of the several districts to make purchases for the light house service: and if he did employ one, the law fixed the compensation and appropriated the money to pay it.

He was not forbidden to employ a revenue officer for this purpose; and, so far as his services were performed for other districts, he stood in the same relation to the government as any other agent.

The law forbidding compensation or reducing it to a small amount, did not apply to this service.

The agency was entirely foreign to his official duties, and far beyond the limits of the district to which the law confined his official duties and power.

And as the department appointed him to perform a duty required by law, for which the compensation was fixed by law, and the money appropriated to pay it, he is entitled to the compensation if he has performed the duty.

Court erred in refusing to admit the testimony in regard to such services and commissions of the collector.

Argued Mar. 4, 1859. Decided Mar. 11, 1859.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Massachusetts.

The history of the case, and a statement of the facts involved, appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. C. T. Russell and C. Cushing, for the plaintiff in error.

Messrs. J. S. Black, Atty-Gen., and Edwin M. Stanton, for defendant in error:

This case arose from a set-off pleaded to a suit of the United States against Greely, late Collector of the port of Boston, and his securities.

The set-off was for $17,684.92, as commissions upon disbursements made by him in the purchase of oil, &c., for the light-house service of the United States. It is admitted that the disbursements were made by order of the Treasury Department, and that the amount claimed is correct, if defendant is entitled to commissions at all. It is also admitted that the defendant was superintendent of lights and disbursing agent for the district of Boston, and that as Collector he received a salary of $6,000 per annum, and also the sum of $400 allowed by law.

The question turns wholly on the Statutes of the United States.

By Act of May 7, 1822 (sec. 18, 3 Stat. at L., 696), it is enacted: "That no Collector, surveyor or naval officer shall ever receive more than four hundred dollars annually, exclusive of his compensation as Collector, surveyor, or naval officer, and the fines and forfeitures allowed by law, for any services he may perform for the United States in any other office or capacity."

This Act concludes the question, as it has never been repealed, except to forbid the payment even of the $400.

After citing other statutes, mentioned in the opinion of the court, counsel concluded that Mr. Greely has already received more than the law allows, as the salary of $400 was stopped by the Act of Sept. 30, 1850, if not before.

Mr. Chief Justice Taney delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a writ of error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Massachusetts.

The pleadings and facts in the case, and the points in controversy, are briefly yet clearly stated in the exception and opinion of the court, as set forth in the transcript, in the following words:

"Be it remembered, that at a term of the Circuit Court of the United States, holden at Boston, within and for the District of Massachusetts, on the 15th day of May, 1857, by the Honorable Benjamin R. Curtis, Circuit Judge, and the Honorable Peleg Sprague, District Judge, came the United States of America, and by an action of assumpsit declared against James C. Converse, of Boston, in said district, as he is administrator of the goods and estate of Philip Greely, Jr., late of said Boston, deceased, and late Collector of Customs at said Boston, in said district, as by the writ and declaration of record will appear; to which the defendant pleaded the general issue, and filed certain claims in set-off, as by said set-off of record will appear; and the plaintiffs joined in said issue, and thereupon said cause came for trial before the said Circuit Court, at said May Term, before a jury impaneled for that purpose, and the said defendant then and there claimed to be allowed, among other things, in set-off against the plaintiff's claim, the sum of seventeen thousand six hundred and eighty-four dollars and ninety-two cents ($17,684.92), as commission due him from the plaintiffs upon certain contracts, purchases and disbursements made by him for oil and other articles for the light house service of the United States, under direction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

"At the trial it appeared by the transcript from the Treasury Department of the plaintiffs introduced by them in evidence, that said claims had been duly and properly presented by the defendant's intestate, Mr. Greely, at the Treasury Department, for credit and allowance, and had there been disallowed, and no objection was made by the plaintiff to the defendant's right to recover of the plaintiff upon this ground.

It also apeared that the defendant's intestate, as collector, had, during each year he was collector, received the compensation of $6,000, and and also the sum of $400 allowed by law.

No question was made as to the amount of commissions claimed. The plaintiffs, in their transcripts, admit that the sum of $17,684.92 is two and a half per cent. commission upon the defendant's disbursements for light-house purposes during his term of office, and no objection was made that that is not the proper commission, if the defendant is entitled to any.

It was further admitted that the defendant was, from May 1st, 1849, to April 1st, 1853, superintendent of lights and disbursing agent for the district of Boston.

The duties of this office, it was offered to prove, were the charge and superintendence of all light houses between Eastham and Plum Island, Newburyport, including the making of all necessary disbursements for the payment of the keeper's salaries, wages of men, repairs, and the necessary supplies, in the same manner as other superintendents and disbursing agents in their respective districts.

The defendant then offered to prove the following facts in regard to these disbursements upon which the aforesaid commission was claimed:

The Secretary of the Treasury, or the proper officer under him, during the whole term of the defendant's office, was accustomed, from time to time, to send specific orders to him to advertise for proposals, make contracts for and purchase all the oil, lamps, wicks, and supplies of every kind, required for the whole light-house service of the United States, as well that of the sea coasts as the lakes and rivers.

Agreeably to such orders or requests, the defendant did, from time to time, make all these contracts and purchases, draw the necessary contracts, and all payments and disbursements thereunder and therefor, take charge of the property when purchased, and distributed the same in such quantities and to such points, all over the United States, as were required or directed by the Treasury Department. These services involved much time, labor and responsibility on the part of the defendant, and were performed at the request and upon the order of the Treasury Department. The defendant paid out no moneys which have not been allowed.

And it was upon all disbursements thus made that he claimed the aforesaid two and a half per cent. commissions, amounting to $17,684.92.

The plaintiffs objected to this evidence, because they said, admitting all that was thus proposed to be proved, it gave the defendant no claim whatever to the commissions claimed.

The court thereupon, after consideration, ruled and decided that, admitting all that the defendant thus offered to prove to be true and as alleged, yet the defendant had no rightful claim against the plaintiffs to the said commissions, or any part thereof, and could not recover the same in set-off, but that the defendant, being the Collector of Customs, and, as such, having received the aforesaid compensation of $6,000 and of $400 each year, could not recover any sum whatever for the commissions claimed as aforesaid; and the court thereupon refused to admit the evidence offered, and instructed the jury, in accordance with said ruling, and for the reasons therein stated, that the defendant could not recover for said commission.

To which ruling, decision and instruction, the defendant then and there excepted."

The question to be decided on this exception is undoubtedly one of some difficulty. But the difficulty arises not so much from ambiguity of language in any one of the Acts of Congress as from the great number of Acts passed from time to time on this subject, which have been referred to in the argument. They, for the most part, differ in language in some degree from one another, and are generally introduced in some clause or proviso of the usual annual appropriation law, or an appropriation to provide for previous expenditures, and yet all bear, with more or less force, on the question before us.

The Acts referred to are: 1822, 3 Stat., 696; 1839, 3 Stat., 439; 1841, 5 Stat., 432; 1842, 5 Stat., 510; 1845, 5 Stat., 736; 1848, 9 Stat., 297; 1849, 9 Stat., 365, 367; 1850, 9 Stat., 504, 542, 543; 1851, 9 Stat., 629; 1852, 10 Stat., 97, 100; 1852, 10 Stat., 119, 120.

It is obvious, therefore, that in order to carry into execution the intention of the Legislative Department of the Government, these various laws on the same subject-matter must be taken together and construed in connection with each other. And we should defeat instead of carrying into execution the will of the law-making power, if we selected one or two of these Acts, and founded our judgment upon the language they contained, without comparing and considering them in association with other laws passed upon the same subject.

It would extend this opinion to an unreasonable length to quote at large the language of the various Acts and provisos above mentioned; nor, indeed, do we deem it necessary, because the object and policy of this whole legislation, when taken together, will be made evident by looking to the state of the law before and at the time the different laws were passed, and the defects which then existed, and which they were intended to remedy. A particular reference to a few of them, in chronological order, will be sufficient for this purpose, and we shall refer to those which have been mainly relied on by the circuit court, or by the counsel for the United States, in order to support the judgment of the court below.

The first law upon this subject is the Act of May 7, 1822, section 18, which provides that "no Collector, surveyor or naval officer shall ever receive more than $400 annually, exclusive of his compensation as Collector, surveyor or naval officer, and the fines and forfeitures allowed by law for any service he may render in any other office or capacity."

At the time this law was passed, the collectors, surveyors and naval officers were, in certain contingencies mentioned in the Act of March 2, 1799, required to do the duties of the offices of each other; and, without any special law upon the subject, it was the settled practice and usage of the Government to require collectors to superintend lights and light-houses in their respective districts, and to disburse money for marine hospitals and the revenue-cutter service, for which, by the practice and regulations of the Treasury Department, they were allowed certain commissions. But there was no Act of Congress imposing these duties on the collector, or fixing his commissions for these services and disbursements. They were charged as extra services—that is, as not belonging to the office of collector, and the amount of his compensation depended altogether upon the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury for the time being. These extra allowances in some instances amounted to very large sums; and it appears that the attention of Congress was at length attracted to this subject, and it was deemed right, and more consistent with the nature and character of our institutions, to fix by law the compensation for these services, and not leave it in every case to depend upon the discretion of the Secretary; and the Act of 1822 was accordingly passed for that purpose, and for that purpose only. The language is clear, precise and appropriate, and no multiplication of words could more plainly indicate its object. The words "any other office" were evidently used with reference to the contingencies in which one of these officers might be required to perform the duties imposed by law on one of the others. And the words "or other capacity" were equally essential, in order to embrace the extra allowances made for the agency of which we have spoken, as they were not the duties of an office created by law, but a mere agency of one of the departments of the Government. The law does not forbid compensation for extra services which have no affinity or connection with the duties of the office he holds. On the contrary, it recognizes his right, and gives the collector or other of these revenue officers an additional sum, over and above their salaries as officers, for extra services rendered as agents, which had no legal connection with their respective offices.

The duties for which this certain compensation was fixed were well known in the usages and practice of the Government, and Congress could, therefore, act advisedly and with knowledge, and judge what amount of money would be a fair compensation. But it will hardly be supposed that Congress, by this law, intended to fix this amount for every unforeseen and possible service, or the duties of every possible office which one of these revenue officers should be directed or requested by the Secretary in some emergency to fill; for, as Congress could not foresee what might be the character and importance of such a duty, there was no basis on which a judgment of its value could be formed. Nor can it be supposed that they intended to regulate in advance its compensation or value without some data to act upon.

Besides, no other salaried officer is mentioned in this law but Collectors, surveyors and naval officers; and it would hardly be just to the legislative body to impute to it the design of dealing more harshly with these revenue officers than any other officers of the Government who have certain salaries, or to suppose they would deny to them compensation in cases where every other salaried officer was allowed to claim and receive it.

We have dwelt more particularly on this Act of Congress, because the principles and policy on which it was passed form the basis of all the subsequent legislation on this subject, and will be found, with some modification, in every law. The great object has been to establish, by law, the compensation for public services, whether in offices or agencies, where the nature and character of the duties to be performed were sufficiently known and definite to enable Congress to form an estimate of its value, and not leave it to the discretion of the head of an executive department.

After this Act of 1822, there is no Act of Congress bearing upon this question until 1839. In the meantime, about the year 1838, and subsequently to that time, several cases came before the Supreme Court, in which officers who were not named in the Act of 1822, but who received a fixed salary as a clerk in a department, or a fixed compensation as an officer in the army, or in some other office, claimed the right to set off against the United States compensation for extra services undertaken by the direction of the Secretary, and for which there was no fixed compensation by law. And in these cases this court held that such compensation might be claimed and set off under the Act of Congress allowing set-offs against the United States; and that, where the extra service had been required by the head of the proper department, the officer was entitled to a reasonable compensation, to be allowed by the jury upon the evidence, even if there was no law expressly requiring the service or fixing compensation for it; and that it might be ascertained and allowed ed by the jury in proper cases, under the direction of the court, even if the head of the department had fixed no compensation, and refused to allow the claim.

Under these decisions, claims of this description were frequently made, and the United States involved in inconvenient controversies in court. These controversies again attracted the attention of Congress to the subject of compensation for extra services; and in 1839 they passed an Act, embracing all persons holding office with a fixed salary, precisely similar in its principles with the Act in relation to custom-house officers—that is to say, they took away from the heads of departments, and from courts and juries, the right to fix the compensation in any case where it was not fixed by law; and if there was no law ascertaining the compensation or allowance for the particular service, the party was entitled to none. It carries out the principle and policy of the Act of 1822, and provides that there shall be no compensation in addition to the salary, "unless said extra allowance or compensation be authorized by law."

Nor does the Act of August 23, 1842 (5 Stat., 510) go further than the Act of 1839, except only in declaring that, in order to entitle the party to demand compensation, it must not only be fixed by law, but that the law appropriating it shall explicitly set forth that it is for such additional pay, extra allowance, or compensation. Now, these words, added to the provisions in the Act of 1839, only show that the Legislature contemplated duties imposed by superior authority upon the officer as a part of his duty, and which the superior authority had in the emergency a right to impose, and the officer was bound to obey, although they were extra and additional to what had previously been required. But they can by no fair interpretation be held to embrace an employment which has no affinity or connection, either in its character or by law or usage, with the line of his official duty, and where the service to be performed is of a different character, and for a different place, and the amount of compensation regulated by law.

This provision is introduced in the annual Appropriation Law for the support of the Army and Military Academy. And although the words are general, and undoubtedly include officers in every branch of the public service, yet, from the general character and objects of this law, it is manifest that the attention of Congress must have been mainly directed to officers in the military service, who, from the position in which unforeseen events often place them, are called upon and required to perform duties not specified by law or regulation, but which grow out of, and are associated with, military service.

We pass on to the Acts of 1848 and 1849, which are the more important because they were passed about the time this collector came into office, and apply particularly to the revenue officers of which we are speaking. The clauses which bear upon this question in each of these laws is inserted in the annual civil and diplomatic appropriation law, by way of proviso to the clause making appropriations to the maintenance of the light house service. The Act of 1848 appropriates $11,640.35, being a commission of two and a half per cent. on the whole amount appropriated for that service, with a proviso that no part of the sum thereby appropriated should be paid to any person who received a salary as an officer of the customs; and that from and after the 1st day of July, 1849, the disbursements should be made by the collector of the customs, without compensation. And if this law still remained in force, it is very clear that the agency of which we are speaking would not have been authorized by law, and the set-off claimed by the plaintiff in error could not be allowed.

But this proviso in the Act of 1848 is recited at large in the appropriation of 1849, and repealed without any saving or qualification; and this repealing clause is immediately preceded by an appropriation for superintendents' commissions of $11,673.25, being two and a half per cent. on the whole amount appropriated for light house purposes. There is no restriction in these commissions in relation to revenue officers. The commissions are to be paid on the whole amount, without any reference to the person or officer who performs the service; consequently, under this law the revenue officer who performed this duty within his own district was entitled to two and a half per cent. commission on the amount disbursed; and previous Acts of Congress restricting this allowance were repugnant to this law, and thereby repealed. The repeal of the Act of 1848 could not, upon any sound principle of law, revive any previous Act which was repugnant to the provisions contained in the repealing Act of 1849. And this Act allowed the commission of two and a half per cent. in all cases, and appropriated the money to pay it, leaving it to the Secretary of the Treasury to select as agent each collector for his collection district, or any other agent that he might deem more suitable for the trust.

The Act of September 28th, 1850, however, restored the provisions contained in the first Act referred to—that is, the Act of 1822—and provides that no collector shall receive for his services as superintendant of light-houses over the sum of $400 per annum. But this Act was followed by the civil and diplomatic appropriation law, passed at the same session, September 30th, 1850, only two days after the law above mentioned, in which the compensation is again modified in amount, and collectors whose salary exceeds $2,500 can receive no compensation as superintendent of lights or disbursing agent. Yet this law, like the preceding appropriation laws, appropriates a sum equal to two and a half per cent. commission upon the whole amount appropriated for light-house service, and the Secretary might therefore employ any agent he pleased; and if he was not the collector, he would be entitled to full commissions. The same provisions are contained in the appropriation Acts of 1851 (9 Stat., 608), 1852 (10 Stat., 86), and 1853 (10 Stat., 200).

It will be seen, from this history of the complicated legislation on this subject, that, however varying the provisions may be in some particulars, they are yet all founded on the principles and policy of the Acts of 1822 and 1839, and that all the provisos respecting the commissions to a revenue officer are confined to his collection district, and its extra customary duties therein as agent.

The just and fair inference from these Acts of Congress, taken together, is, that no discretion is left to the head of a department to allow an officer who has a fixed compensation any credit beyond his salary, unless the service he has performed is required by existing laws, and the remuneration for them fixed by law. It was undoubtedly within the power of the department to order this collector, and every other collector in the Union, to purchase the articles required for light house purposes in their respective districts, and to make the necessary disbursements therefor. And for such services he would be entitled to no compensation beyond his salary as collector, if that salary exceeded $2,500.

But the Secretary was not bound to intrust this service to the several collectors. He had a right, if he supposed the public interest required it, to have the whole service performed by a single agent; for while the law authorizes him to exact this service from the several collectors, it at the same time evidently authorizes him to commit the whole to an agent or agents other than the collectors, by regulating the commission which an agent shall receive, and appropriating money for payment of commissions of two and a half per cent. upon the whole amount authorized to be expended in this service. And as the collectors would by law be entitled in some cases to nothing, and in others to the small sum above mentioned, if the service was performed by them in their respective districts, it is very clear, from the commissions allowed, and the appropriation to pay them, that he was at liberty to employ a different agency, and pay the commissions given by the law whenever he supposed the public would be better served by this arrangement.

And the case as assumed in the record is precisely that case. The Secretary had no right, under the laws upon this subject, to order this or any other collector to perform this duty for all the light-house and collection districts. The law has divided it among them, and the Executive Department had no right to impose it upon one. But he had a right, as we have said, to employ an agent, instead of the collector or collectors of the several districts; and if he did employ one, the law fixed the compensation, and appropriated the money to pay it. He was not forbidden to employ a revenue officer for this purpose; and, so far as his services were performed for other districts, he stood in the same relation to the Government as any other agent. The law forbidding compensation, or reducing it to a small amount, did not apply to this service. The agency was entirely foreign to his official duties, and far beyond the limits of the district to which the law confined his official duties and power. And as the department appointed him to perform a duty required by law, for which the compensation was fixed by law, and the money appropriated to pay it, he is entitled to the compensation given by law, if he has performed the duty; for the Secretary has no more discretionary power to withhold what the law gives, than he has to give what the law does not authorize. The agency and services performed in this instance had no more connection with his official duties and position than the purchase of a supply of shoes for the troops in Mexico, in the late war would have been, in the absence of any other person authorized to make such a purchase. And if such a duty was requested or required of him by the head of the proper department, and performed, nobody would deny his right to compensation, if the law authorized and required the service to be done, and fixed the compensation for it.

Upon the case, therefore, as the plaintiff in error offered to prove it, we think the court erred in refusing to admit the testimony.

Undoubtedly, Congress have the power to prohibit the Secretary from demanding or receiving of a public officer any service in any other office or capacity, and to prohibit the same person from accepting or executing the duties of any agency for the Government, of any description, while he is in office, and to deny compensation altogether, if the officer chooses to perform the services; or they may require an officer holding an office with a certain salary, however small, to perform any duty directed by the head of the department, however onerous or hazardous, without additional compensation. But the Legislative Department of the Government have never acted upon such principles, nor is there any law which looks to such a policy, or to such unlimited power in the head of an Executive Department over its subordinate officers.

No explanation is given of the principle upon which the $400 additional compensation was allowed. If the services were regarded as extra and additional, and within the prohibition of the law, then he was not entitled to this additional allowance, because his salary exceeded $2,500, and nothing more than the salary fixed ought to have been allowed him. But if they were not within the prohibition, but for services in a different agency, then he was entitled, not merely $400, but to the commissions fixed by law. This sum could not have been allowed for supplies in his own district, excluding those for other districts, because, as regards his own district, there is an express prohibition as above stated. We, however, express no opinion upon that particular item; and whether it is a proper allowance or not, must be determined by the Circuit Court, when it hears the evidence at the trial.

For the reasons above stated, the judgment of the Circuit Court must be reversed.

Dissenting, Mr. Justice Campbell, Mr. Justice Grier, and Mr. Justice Catron.

Mr. Justice Campbell, dissenting:

I dissent from the opinion and judgment of the court in this case. The opinion of the presiding Judge of the Circuit Court, in my judgment, contains an exact exposition of the law of the case. Justices Catron and Grier authorize me to say they concur in this dissent, and we adopt that opinion as our opinion, which is in the following words:

This is an action for money had and received to the use of the United States, by Philip Greely, Jr., the defendant's intestate, while Collector of the Customs for the port of Boston and Charlestown.

A number of items were in question when the case was opened, but in the progress of the trial all were disposed of to the satisfaction of both parties, save a charge made by the intestate, of $17,968.92, as commissions on disbursements made by him under the orders of the Secretary of the Treasury, in the purchase of oil and other materials for light houses. The question is, whether the collector was entitled, by law, to make this charge against the United States for that service. Mr. Greely held the office of collector from May 1, 1849, to May 1, 1853.

By the Act of March 3, 1841, sec. 5 (5 Stat. at L., 432), it was enacted that "no Collector shall, on any pretense whatever, hereafter receive, hold, or retain for himself, in the aggregate, more than $6,000 per year, including all commissions for duties, and all fees for storage, or fees or emoluments, or any other commissions, or salaries, which are now allowed by law."

The Act of August 23, 1842, sec. 2 (5 Stat. at L., 510), is as follows: "That no officer in any branch of the public service, or any other person, whose salary, pay, or emoluments, is or are fixed by law or regulations, shall receive any additional pay, extra allowance, or compensation, in any form whatever, for the disbursement of public money, or for any other service or duty whatsoever, unless the same shall be authorized by law, and the appropriation therefor explicitly set forth, that it is for such additional pay, extra allowance, or compensation."

It being admitted that Mr. Greely was an officer whose salary, pay, or emoluments, was or were fixed by the law, and that he had received its full amount of $6,000, independent of the charge in question, it is incumbent on the defendant to show, not only that the service was authorized by law, but also that the appropriation for that service explicitly sets forth that it is for such additional pay, extra allowance, or compensation. It is not enough to find an Act of Congress authorizing a service, and making an appropriation to pay for it. This would be sufficient, provided the person rendering the service were not an officer, or other person, entitled to a fixed compensation. If he be, and he claims an extra compensation for an extra service, he must produce an appropriation which explicitly sets forth that it is made for such additional compensation; that is, he must show not only that Congress contemplated and provided for a service, and payment therefor, but that they contemplated and explicitly provided that if it should be rendered by one already entitled to a fixed compensation, he should, nevertheless, receive, in addition thereto, the compensation provided for such service. And the addition of such compensation to a fixed compensation is not to be inferred from any equitable considerations, but must be found explicitly declared in the law itself.

Such, in my judgment, is the fair interpretation of the language of this Act; and the history of the legislation of Congress upon this subject of the extra compensation of officers makes the interpretration, if possible, still more plain and necessary.

The defendant relies on the following clause in the Appropriation Act of March 3, 1849 (9 Stat. at L., 367): "For superintendents' commissions, at two and one half per cent. on the $466,930.08 appropriated above for light-house purposes, $11,673.25. And the proviso contained in the Act making appropriation for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government, for the year ending the 30th day of June, 1849, and for other purposes, approved, &c., which proviso is in the following words: 'Provided, that no part of the sum hereby appropriated shall be paid to any person who receives a salary as an officer of the customs; and from and after the 1st day of July, 1849, 1849, the said disbursement shall be made by the Collectors of the Customs without compensation, is hereby repealed.'"

The argument of the defendant's counsel is, that the express repeal of this proviso is equivalent to an explicit declaration that parts of the sum appropriated by this Act might be paid to persons who received salaries as officers of the customs, and that it was not to be disbursed by collectors without compensation.

But, certainly, this appropriation does not "explicitly set forth that it is for additional pay, extra allowance, or compensation." If this appears at all, it is only inferentially; and the inquiry is, whether it be a necessary inference that some part of this sum was appropriated as additional pay or extra compensation to collectors who should perform the service of superintendents of lights.

Now, the proviso which was repealed consisted of two parts. The first related exclusively to commissions in the disbursement of the appropriation for light house expenses made for the fiscal year ending on the 30th day of June, 1849; and it prohibited the payment of any commissions out of the sum thus appropriated, to any officer of the customs who received a salary.

The second part of the proviso positively required the service of making disbursements as superintendents of lights to be performed by collectors of customs, after July 1, 1849, without compensation. It left no discretion with the Secretary of the Treasury to appoint any other person to discharge this duty.

The repeal of the proviso left the right of officers of the customs to participate in the commissions for disbursing the appropriation made for the year ending June 31, 1849, to stand upon the law as elsewhere found; and restored to the Secretary of the Treasury the power to appoint persons other than collectors to make the disbursements; and if collectors should be appointed, it left their right to commissions to depend on the law as elsewhere found.

It must be admitted that this repeal might, under some circumstances, indicate an intention to have collectors participate in these commissions. If they have been for the first time deprived of them by the proviso, its repeal would quite clearly show that their former title was restored. But the contrary is true. Independent of the proviso, they had no title to this or any other extra compensation, and, by force of the Act of August 2, 1842, could have none, unless explicitly granted by the Act making the appropriation; so that, unless I can say that the repeal of the proviso either repeals the 2d section of the Act of 1842, or satisfies its requirements by an explicit appropriation to pay an extra compensation for an extra service, the defendant has no title to the commission. That the 2d section of the Act of 1842 is not repealed by implication, by the repeal of the proviso, is clear. There is no repugnance between this repeal and the Act of 1842. The reasons for repealing the entire proviso may have been that the Act of 1842 was broad enough to cover the cases of extra compensation contemplated by the proviso, and so it was not necessary, in so far as its object was to provide for those cases; and in so far as it required the service to be performed by collectors only, that it was inexpedient. But to amount to a compliance with the 2d section of the Act of 1842, it should have superadded to the repeal of the proviso, an explicit declaration that the appropriation was intended as extra compensation to those officers, having fixed salaries, who might be selected to render the service.

There are two other views of this subject, either of which would, in my judgment, be sufficient to show that there is no lawful claim to these commissions.

The first is, that although Mr. Greely was superintendent of lights within a certain district, extending round the Massachusetts Bay, yet these commissions are charged on disbursements made by him in the purchase, under the orders of the Secretary of the Treasury, of oil and some other materials for the whole light-house service of the United States. Now, the appropriation made is for "superintendents' commissions." If he did not render this service as superintendent, but, aside from that employment, acted under the orders of the Secretary of the Treasury in making large purchases for this service, no appropriation is made for paying him. It was, no doubt, an onerous and responsible duty, imposed upon him because he happened to be at a place favorable for making these purchases; and this may constitute a claim on the equitable consideration of Congress, especially if the imposition of this onerous duty on him, instead of distributing it among all or most of the superintendents of lights, was advantageous to the Government. But this is for the consideration of Congress. It does not enable me to say an appropriation to pay commissions by way of extra compensation was actually made.

Besides, if the repeal of the proviso in the Act of 1848 were held to amount to an explicit declaration that collectors might participate in the commissions of superintendents; by way of extra compensation, the inquiry would still remain, to what extent may they receive such extra compensation? And this seems to me to be answered by the Act of May 7, 1822, sec. 18 (3 Stat. L., 696), "That no collector, surveyor, or naval officer, shall ever receive more than four hundred dollars annually, exclusive of his compensation as collector, surveyor, or naval officer, and the fines and forfeitures allowed by law, for any services he may perform for the United States in any other office or capacity." In the case of Hoyt v. United States, 10 How., 141, the Supreme Court considered this section in force, and applied it to the case of a collector who held office from March, 1838, to March, 1841, and I am not aware of its having been since repealed. It was admitted that, aside from the charge now in question, Mr. Greely had received extra compensation to the extent of $400 annually, for services performed for the United States in a capacity other than that of collector. It follows, that for services performed in making these contracts and disbursements, which were not within his duties as collector, he can made no further charge.

What has thus been said relates exclusively to the defendant's claims under the Act of 1849. The subsequent Acts are so much more unfavorable to these claims, that I do not deem it necessary to enter into a particular discussion of them. They are the Acts of Sept. 30, 1850 (9 Stat. at L., 533), March 3, 1851 (9 Stat. at L. 608), and Aug. 31, 1852 (10 Stat. at L., 86). I have examined these Acts, and am satisfied each of them deprives every collector, whose compensation exceeds $2,500, of all participation in these commissions, though they are required to render the service of superintendents of lights or disbursing agents in procuring supplies for them.

WILLIAM FENN, Plff. in Er.,

v.

PETER H. HOLME.

(See S. C., 21 How., 481–488.)

In ejectment, plaintiff must show legal title—equitable title not sufficient—documentary evidence or possession—distinction between legal and equitable remedies—until patent issues, fee is in government—Missouri practice.

The plaintiff in ejectment must in all cases prove a legal title to the premises, in himself, at the time of the demise laid in the declaration; and evidence of an equitable estate will not be sufficient for a recovery.

This legal title the plaintiff must establish, either upon a connected documentary chain of evidence, or upon proofs of possession of sufficient duration to warant the legal conclusion of the existence of such written title.

The Constitution of the United States, in creating and defining the judicial power of the General Government, establishes the distinction between law and equity; and a party who claims a legal title must proceed at law, and may proceed according to the forms of practice in the state court.

But if the claim be an equitable one, he must proceed according to the rules which this court has prescribed, regulating proceedings in equity in the courts of the United States.

The authorities are decisive against the right of the plaintiff in the court below to a recovery upon the facts disclosed in this record, which show that the action in that court was instituted upon an equitable and not upon a legal title.

The legal title to the land in question remains in the original owner, the government, until it is invested by the government in its grantee.

The patent is the superior and conclusive evidence of the legal title.

Until it issues, the fee is in the government, which by the patent passes to the grantee, and he is then entitled to enforce the possession in ejectment.

A practice which has prevailed in some of the States, and amongst them the State of Missouri, of permitting the action of ejectment to be maintained upon warrants for land, and upon other titles not complete or legal in their character, can in nowise affect the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, which, both by the Constitution and by Acts of Congress, are reqired to observe the distinction between legal and equitable rights, and to enforce the rules and principles of decision appropriate to each.

Argued Feb. 18, 1859. Decided Mar. 11, 1859.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Missouri.

The history of the case, and a statement of the facts involved, appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. H. R. Gamble and C. Gibson, for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. A. Leonard and S. T. Glover, for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice Daniel delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant in error, as a citizen of the State of Illinois, instituted an action of ejectment against the plaintiff in the court above mentioned, and obtained a verdict and judgment against him for a tract of land, described in the declaration as a tract of land situated in St. Louis County, being the same tract of land known as United States survey No. 2,489, and located by virtue of a New Madrid certificate No. 105, and containing six hundred and forty acres.

Both the plaintiff and defendant in the circuit court trace the origin of their titles to the settlement claim of one James Y. O'Carroll, who, it is stated, obtained permission as early as the 6th of September, 1803, from the Spanish authorities, to settle on the vacant lands in Upper Louisiana, and who, in virtue of that permission, and on proof by one Ruddell of actual inhabitancy and cultivation prior to the 20th of December, 1803, claimed the quantity of one thousand arpents of land near the Mississippi, in the District of New Madrid. Upon this application, the Land Commissioners, on the 13th of March, 1806, made a decision by which they granted to the claimants one thousand arpents of land, situated as aforesaid, provided so much be found vacant there.

On the 14th of December, 1810, the Commissioners, acting again on the claim of O'Carroll for one thousand arpents, declare that the Board grant to James Y. O'Carroll three hundred and fifty acres of land, and order that the same be surveyed as nearly in a square as may be, so as to include his improvements. The claim thus allowed by the Commissioners was, by the operation of the 4th section of the Act of Congress approved March 3, 1813, enlarged and extended to the quantity of six hundred and forty acres. Vide Stat. at L., p. 813, Vol. II.

In the year 1812, a portion of the lands in the County of New Madrid having been injured by earthquakes, Congress, by an Act approved on the 17th of February, 1815, provided that any person or persons owning lands in the County of New Madrid, in the Missouri Territory, with the extent the said county had on the 10th day of November, 1812, and whose lands have been materially injured by earthquakes, shall be, and there hereby are authorized to locate the like quantity of land on any of the public lands of the said Territory, the sale of which is authorized by law." Stat. at L., Vol. III., p. 211.

On the 30th of November, 1815, the Recorder of Land Titles for Missouri, upon evidence produced to him that the six hundred and forty acre grant to James Y. O'Carroll had been materially injured by earthquakes, in virtue of the Act of Congress of 1815, granted to said O'Carroll New Madrid certificate No. 105, by which the grantee was authorized to locate six hundred and forty acres of land on any of the public lands in the Territory of Missouri, the sale of which was authorized by law. Upon the conflicting claims asserted under this New Madrid certificate, and upon the ascertainment of the locations attempted in virtue of its authority, this controversy has arisen.

Each party to this controversy professes to deduce title from the settlement right of O'Carroll, through mesne conveyances proceeding from him. With respect to the construction of these conveyances, several prayers have been presented by both plaintiff and defendant, and opinions as to their effect have been expressed by the circuit court; but as to the rights really conferred, or intended to be conferred, by these transactions, it would, according to the view of this cause taken by this court, be not merely useless, but premature and irregular to discuss, and much more so to undertake to determine them.

This is an attempt to assert at law, and by a legal remedy, a right to real property—an action of ejectment to establish the right of possession in land.

That the plaintiff in ejectment must in all cases prove a legal title to the premises in himself, at the time of the demise laid in the declaration, and that evidence of an equitable estate will not be sufficient for a recovery, are principles so elementary and so familiar to the profession as to render unnecessary the citation of authority in support of them. Such authority may, however, be seen in the cases of Goodtitle v. Jones, 7 T. R., 49; of Doe v. Wroot, 5 East., 132; and of Roe v. Reade, 8 T. R., 118. This legal title the plaintiff must establish either upon a connected documentary chain of evidence, or upon proofs of possession of sufficient duration to warrant the legal conclusion of the existence of such written title.

By the Constitution of the United States, and by the Acts of Congress organizing the federal courts, and defining and investing the jurisdiction of these tribunals, the distinction between common law and equity jurisdiction has been explicitly declared and carefully defined and established. Thus, in sec. 2, art. 3, of the Constitution, it is declared that "the judicial power of the United States shall extend to all cases in law and equity arising under this Constitution, the laws of the United States," &c.

In the Act of Congress "to establish the judicial courts of the United States, "this distribution of law and equity powers is frequently referred to; and by the 16th section of that Act, as if to place the distinction between those powers beyond misapprehension, it is provided "that suits in equity shall not be maintained in either of the courts of the United States in any case where plain, adequate, and complete remedy may be had at law," at the same time affirming and separating the two classes or sources of judicial authority. In every instance in which this court has expounded the phrases, proceedings at the common law and proceedings in equity, with reference to the exercise of the judicial powers of the courts of the United States, they will be found to have interpreted the former as signifying the application of the definitions and principles and rules of the common law to rights and obligations essentially legal; and the latter, as meaning the administration with reference to equitable as contradistinguished from legal rights, of the equity law as defined and enforced by the Court of Chancery in England.

In the case of Robinson v. Campbell, 3 Wheat., on page 221, this court have said: "By the laws of the United States, the Circuit Courts have cognizance of all suits of a civil nature at common law and in equity, in cases which fall within the limits prescribed by those laws. By the 24th section of the Judiciary Act of 1789 it is provided, that the laws of the several States, except where the Constitution, treaties or statutes of the United States shall otherwise provide, shall be regarded as rules of decision in trials at common law in the courts of the United States, in cases where they apply. The Act of May, 1792, confirms the modes of proceeding then used at common law in the courts of the United States, and declares that the modes of proceeding in suits in equity shall be according to the principles, rules and usages, which belong to courts of equity, as contradistinguished from courts of common law, except so far as may have been provided for by the Act to establish the judicial courts of the United States. It is material to consider whether it was the intention of Congress by these provisions to confine the courts of the United States in their mode of administering relief, to the same remedies, and those only, with all their incidents, which existed in the courts of the respective States; in other words, whether it was their intention to give the party relief at law. where the practice of the state courts would give it, and relief in equity only when, according to such practice, a plain, adequate and complete remedy could not be had at law? In some States in the Union no court of chancery exists to administer equitable relief. In some of those States, courts of law recognize and enforce in suits at law all equitable rights and claims which a court of equity would recognize and enforce; in others, all relief is denied, and such equitable claims and rights are to be considered as mere nullities at law. A construction, therefore, that would adopt the state practice in all its extent, would at once extinguish in such States the exercise of equitable jurisdiction. The Acts of Congress have distinguished between remedies at common law and equity, yet this construction would confound them. The court therefore think that to effectuate the purposes of the Legislature, the remedies in the courts of the United States are to be at common law or in equity—not according to the practice in the state courts, but according to the principles of common law and equity, as distinguished and defined in that country from which we derive our knowledge of those principles."

In the case of Parsons v. Bedford et al., 3 Pet., on pp. 446, 447, this court, in speaking of the seventh amendment of the Constitution, and of the state of public sentiment which demanded and produced that amendment, say:

"The Constitution had declared, in the 3d article, that the judicial power should extend to all cases in law and equity arising under this Constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made, or which shall be made under their authority, &c. It is well known that in civil suits, in courts of equity and admiralty, juries do not intervene, and that courts of equity use the trial by jury only in extraordinary cases. When, therefore, we find that the amendment requires that the right of trial by jury shall be preserved in suits at common law, the natural conclusion is, that the distinction was present in the minds of the framers of the amendment. By common law, they meant what the Constitution denominated in the 3d article LAW, not merely suits which the common law recognized among its old and settled proceedings, but suits in which legal rights were to be ascertained and determined, in contradistinction to those where equitable rights alone were recognized and equitable remedies administered."

The same doctrine is recognized in the case of Strother v. Lucas, in 6 Pet., pp. 768, 769 of the volume, and in the case of Parish v. Ellis, 16 Pet., pp., 453, 454. So, too, as late as the year 1850, in the case of Bennett v. Butterworth, reported in the 11th of Howard, 669, the Chief Justice thus states the law as applicable to the question before us:

"The common law has been adopted in Texas, but the forms and rules of pleading in common law cases have been abolished, and the parties are at liberty to set out their respective claims and defenses in any form that will bring them before the court; and as there is no distinction in its courts between cases at law and in equity, it hasbeen insisted in this case, on behalf of the defendant in error, that this court may regard the plaintiff's petition either as a declaration at law or a bill in equity. Whatever may be the laws of Texas in this respect, they do not govern the proceedings in the courts of the United States; and, although the forms of proceedings and practice in the state courts have been adopted in the district court, yet the adoption of the state practice must not be understood as confounding the principles of law and equity, nor as authorizing legal and equitable claims to be blended together in one suit. The Constitution of the United States, in creating and defining the judicial power of the General Government, establishes this distinction between law and equity, and a party who claims a legal title must proceed at law, and may, undoubtedly, proceed according to the forms of practice in such cases in the state court. But if the claim be an equitable one, he must proceed according to the rules which this court has prescribed, regulating proceedings in equity in the courts of the United States."

The authorities above cited are deemed decisive against the right of the plaintiff in the court below, to a recovery upon the facts disclosed in this record, which show that the action in that court was instituted upon an equitable and not upon a legal title. With the attempt to locate O'Carroll's New Madrid warrant No. 150, in addition to its interference with what was called the St. Louis common, there were opposed five conflicting surveys. In consequence of this state of facts, the Commissioner of the General Land Office, on the 19th of March, 1847, addressed to the Surveyor-General of Missouri the following instructions: "If, on examination, it should satisfactorily appear to you that the lands embraced by said surveys were at the date of O'Carroll's location reserved for said claims, the O'Carroll location must yield to them, because such land is interdicted under the New Madrid Act of the 17th of February, 1815; but if, at the time of location, either of the tracts was not reserved, but was such land as was authorized by the New Madrid Act to be located, the New Madrid claim No. 105 will of course hold valid against either tract in this category. The fact on this point can be best determined by the Surveyor-General from the records of his office, aided by those of the Recorder. If there be no valid claim to any portion of the residue of the O'Carroll claim, and such residue was such land as was allowed by the New Madrid Act of 17th of February, 1815, to be located, on the return here of a proper plat and patent certificate for said residue, a patent will issue."

At this point the entire action of the Land Department of the Government terminated. No act is shown by which the extent of the St.

Louis common, said to be paramount, was ascertained; no information supplied with respect to the validity or extent of the conflicting surveys, as called for by the Commissioner; no plat or patent certificate, either for the whole of the warrant or for any residue to be claimed thereupon, ever returned to the General Land Office, and no patent issued. The plaintiff in the Circuit Court founded his claim exclusively and solely upon the New Madrid warrant.

The inquiry then presents itself, as to who hold the legal title to the land in question. The answer to this question is, that the title remains in the original owner, the Government, until it is invested by the Government in its grantee. This results from the nature of the case, and is the rule affirmed by this court in the case of Bagnell v. Broderick, in which it is declared, that "Congress has the sole power to declare the dignity and effect of titles emanating from the United States; and the whole lesiglation of the Government in reference to the public lands declares the patent to be the superior and conclusive evidence of the legal title. Until it issues, the fee is in the Government, which by the patent passes to the grantee, and he is entitled to enforce the possession in ejectment." 13 Pet., p. 436.

A practice has prevailed in some of the States (and amongst them the State of Missouri) of permitting the action of ejectment to be maintained upon warrants for land, and upon other titles not complete or legal in their character; but this practice, as was so explicitly ruled in the case of Bennett v. Butterworth, 11 How., can in nowise affect the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, who, both by the Constitution and by the Acts of Congress, are required to observe the distinction between legal and equitable rights, and to enforce the rules and principles of decision appropriate to each.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is to be reversed, with costs.

HIRAM CLEARWATER, Plff. in Er.,

v.

SOLOMON MEREDITH, PLEASANT JOHNSON AND THOMAS TYNER.

(See S. C., 21 How., 489–493.)

Defendant in State may be sued, though others in other States, interested—latter not prejudiced—defendant citizen of same State with plaintiff—demurrer to counts on guaranty.

Where one or more defendants sued were citizens of the State, and were jointly bound with citizens of other States who did not appear, the plaintiff had a right to prosecute his suit to judgment against those served.

But such judgment not to prejudice parties not served or who do not voluntarily appear.

The plaintiff may sue in the circuit court any of the defendants, although others may be jointly bound by the contract, who are citizens of other States.

Defendants who are citizens of other States are not prejudiced by this procedure, but only those on whom process has been served.

If one of the defendants be a citizen of the same State with the plaintiff, no jurisdiction can be exercised as between them, and no prejudice to the rights of either can be done.

A demurrer, filed to counts on a guaranty, does not bring up the validity of that instrument for decision. It must be specially pleaded, with suitable averments.

Argued Mar. 3, 1859. Decided Mar. 11, 1859.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Indiana.

This action was brought in the court below, by the plaintiff in error, to enforce a certain contract of guaranty in writing.

The defendants having demurred to the declaration, the court below sustained the demurrer and entered a judgment in their favor; whereupon the plaintiff sued out this writ of error.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Mr. G. E. Pugh, for plaintiff in error:

The first cause of demurrer is not well taken. The declaration declares that the plaintiff is a citizen of Ohio, and that the defendants are citizens of Indiana. No question could arise except in regard to the non-joinder of Caleb B. Smith, as defendant, but that is excused by the 1st section of the Act approved Feb. 28, 1839. 5 U. S. Stat. at L., 321, 322; Commercial Bank v. Slocomb, 14 Pet., 60.

Besides, the non-joinder of a party defendant must be pleaded in abatement.

1 Chit. Pl., 46.

It cannot be objected by demurrer.

Again; if this non-joinder were fatal to the jurisdiction of the court, as the demurrer, alleges there should have been no judgment for costs. That is palpably erroneous.

Mr. R. W. Thompson, for defendants in error:

This action is brought upon a joint contract executed by the defendants in error and Caleb B. Smith. But three of these parties are sued —Smith not being joined. This omission is fatal, inasmuch as the declaration does not show a case of which the circuit court had jurisdiction.

The rule is this: When there are two or more joint plaintiffs or defendants, each of the plaintiffs must be capable of suing, and each of the defendants of being sued, in order to support the jurisdiction. Bank of Vicksburg v. Slocomb, 14 Pet., 64, where this interpretation is given to Act of Feb. 28, 1839 (5 Stat. at L., 321). The declaration here should show that Smith is a citizen of a different State from the plaintiff; for, in the federal courts, jurisdiction must be shown. If it is not shown, the objection is fatal at any stage of the case. It needs no plea. And this is the ground, evidently, upon which the demurrer was sustained below.

Mr. Justice McLean delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a writ of error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Indiana.

The plaintiff, who is averred to be a citizen of the State of Ohio, brought his action against Solomon Meredith and Thomas Tyner, citizens of Indiana, on the 12th July, 1853, together with Caleb B. Smith, who, at the time of the commencement of this suit, was not a citizen of the State of Indiana, and is therefore not joined as a defendant herein, &c.

The declaration has three counts, one of which contains the following guaranty:

"Whereas Hiram Clearwater, of the City of Cincinnati, on the 6th of May, 1853, contracted with the Cincinnati, Cambridge and Chicago Short Line Railway Company for the sale of a tract of land situate in Wayne County, Indiana, lying on the national road, about four miles east of Cambridge City, and adjoining the lands of John Jacobs and others, containing three hundred and twenty acres, for the consideration of $10.000, to be paid in the capital stock of said Company at par; and whereas, in such contract of sale, it was agreed that said Company should furnish to said Clearwater a guaranty that the capital stock of said Railway Company should be at par within one year from the completion of the entire line of said road: Now, in consideration that the said H. Clearwater has, with the consent of the said Company, and at our request, executed a deed of conveyance to Solomon Meredith for said land, to whom the same has been sold by the said Company, we, the undersigned, hereby guaranty that the said stock of said Company, which has been issued to said Clearwater in pursuance of said contract, shall be worth par in the City of Cincinnati within one year from the time the said railroad shall be completed from Cincinnati to Newcastle, Indiana, and that said road shall be completed within two years from the 1st day of October, 1853, and signed by Pleasant Johnson, S. Meredith, Caleb B. Smith and Thomas Tyner."

The defendants, by counsel, come and say the declaration of the said plaintiff, and the counts therein contained, are severally insufficient in law to enable said plaintiff to have and maintain his action against said defendants; and for cause of demurrer shows to the court the following:

1. The jurisdiction of the court is not shown by proper averment.

2 No consideration is shown for the undertaking.

3. The several counts do not contain facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; wherefore the defendants pray judgment, &c.

If this be regarded as a plea to the jurisdiction of the court, it is argued that the suit is brought on a joint contract executed by the defendants in error, when only two of them were served with process, and the third one, Caleb B. Smith, who, at the time of the commencement of the suit, was not a citizen of the State of Indiana, and is therefore not joined as a defendant herein, &c.

The 1st section of the Act of February 28th, 1839, provides that "where, in any suit at law or in equity commenced in any court of the United States, there shall be several defendants, any one or more of whom shall not be inhabitants of or found within the district where the suit is brought, or shall not voluntarily appear thereto, it shall be lawful for the court to entertain jurisdiction, and proceed to the trial and adjudication of such suit between the parties who may be properly before it; but the judgment or decree rendered therein shall not conclude or prejudice other parties not regularly served with process, or not voluntarily appearing to answer."

In the case of The Bank of Vicksburg v. Slocomb, 14 Pet., 65, it is said the 11th section of the Judiciary Act declares that no civil suit shall be brought, before either of said courts, against an inhabitant of the United States, by any original process, in any other district than that whereof he is an inhabitant, or in which he shall be found at the time of serving the writ.

It has been held that this is a personal privilege of not being sued out of the district in which the defendant may live, or in which he shall be found on serving the writ, and that it may be waived by the defendant. And it is said, in the above opinion, "that it did not contemplate a change in the jurisdiction of the courts, as it regards the character of the parties, as prescribed by the Judiciary Act, and expounded by this court—that is, that each of the plaintiffs must be capable of suing, and each of the defendants capable of being sued; which is not the case in this suit, some of the defendants being citizens of the same State with the plaintiffs."

It is well known that the Act of 1839 was intended so to modify the jurisdiction of the circuit court as to make it more practical and effective. Where one or more of the defendants sued were citizens of the State, and were jointly bound with those who were citizens of other States, and who did not voluntarily appear, the plaintiff had a right to prosecute his suit to judgment against those who were served with process; but such judgment or decree shall not prejudice other parties not served with process, or who do not voluntarily appear.

Now, it is too clear for controversy, that the Act of 1839 did intend to change the character of the parties to the suit. The plaintiff may sue in the circuit court any part of the defendants, although others may be jointly bound by the contract, who are citizens of other States. The defendants who are citizens of other States are not prejudiced by this procedure, but those on whom process has been served, and who are made amenable to the jurisdiction of the court.

And in regard to those whose rights are in no respect affected by the judgment or decree, it can be of no importance of what States they are citizens. If one of the defendants should be a citizen of the same State with the plaintiff, no jurisdiction could be exercised as between them, and no prejudice to the rights of either could be done.

The plea to the jurisdiction seems not to be well taken, and it cannot be sustained.

In the case of Hill v. Smith et al., decided at the present term, this court held that the demurrer filed to the counts on the guaranty did not bring up the validity of that instrument for the action of the court, and that it must be specially pleaded, with suitable averments. And the court reversed the judgment, and remanded it to the circuit court, with leave, on the payment of costs, to move to amend the pleadings, so as to raise the questions on the guaranty. The same order is made in the present case.

Judgment reversed.

WILLIAM P. LEA, Appt.,

v.

THE POLK COUNTY COPPER COMPANY ET. AL.

(See S. C., 21 How., 493-506.)

Imperfect acknowledgment—alteration in instrument, not sufficient to put purchaser on inquiry—presumption of performance of official duty—where important rights have grown up under legal title, it will not be interfered with—innocent purchasers protected.

Where, in the certificate of proof of deed, the subscribing witness does not say that the grantor acknowledged the same on the day it bears date; but the deed shows the date the probate is covered by the provisions of Tennessee Act of 1846.

The letters "ark," crowded after the letter P, in William Park Lea's name, at the various places where this alteration is found in the patent, are not sufficient to put the purchasers on inquiry.

When the register put those letters there, the presumption is that he did so in the course of his official duty. He who impeaches the act as illegal, must prove it to be so.

All the incipient steps, authorizing the register to issue the grant, the Governor to sign it, and the Secretary to attach the great seal, are presumed to have been regular; nor is the purchaser required to look behind the patent.

Where the legal title was vested by the grant, and has thus stood for a number of years, and important rights have grown up under it, a court of equity will not interfere, on general principles of justice.

If the equity conferred by the entry was in William Pinkney Lea, the complainant, and the patent issued in the name of William Park Lea, and the Mining Company, or those under whom they claim, innocently and ignorantly purchased from the latter and paid for the property, and took legal conveyances for it from him, with an honest belief that they were acquiring a legal title from the true owner, then the complainant cannot be heard to set up his equity behind the grant to overthrow the purchase.

And the respondents, the Mining Company, might buy in the legal title after they had notice, if they were innocent purchasers, holding under others.

Although the deed was not registered, adverse possession was in itself notice that the grantee held the land under a title, the character of which the complainant was bound to ascertain.

By the settled construction of the Tennessee Act of Limitations, an unregistered deed is a sufficient title on which the bar can be founded.

If two possessions were continuous for the whole term required by the Act of Limitation, then the bar was formed, and the defense complete.

The Tennessee Act of Limitation was intended to protect and confirm void deeds purporting to convey an estate in fee simple, where seven years' adverse possession had been held under them.

Argued Mar. 3, 1859. Decided, Mar. 11, 1859.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Tennessee.

The bill in this case was filed in the court below, by the appellant, to recover 80 acres of land, which he claims as general enterer from the State of Tennessee.

The court below having dismissed the bill, with costs, the complainant took an appeal to this court.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

NOTE.—Requisites of Adverse possession. See note to Ricard v. Williams, 20 U. S. (7 Wheat.), 59

Occupancy necessary to constitute adverse possession. See note to Ewing v. Burnett, 36 U. S. (11 Pet.), 41.

Messrs. J. M. Campbell, Chas. Ready, S. S. Baxter and F. P. Stanton, for the appellant:

1. As to the Satute of Limitations. The only color of title that can be set up, is the deed of Park Lea to John Davis of June 18, 1846. But if William Pinkney Lea was in fact the grantee of the land in dispute, and if the grant was made to him and not to Park Lea, it will be shown then by force of the grant that Pinkney was in possession and seised at the time the deed was executed, and the deed is void in Tennessee as champertous.

U. S. v. Arredondo, 6 Pet., 691, 743; Jackson v. Sellick, 8 Johns., 269.

It is void on the same ground, because of Nelson Carter's possession at the time of the date of the deed of the upper part or northern 40 acres claimed by the trustees of the Mary's Company. The writing claimed to be color of title, must be supposed by the party holding it to communicate title.

Dyche v. Gass, 3 Yerg., 399; Gregg v. Sayre, 8 Pet., 253; Wright v. Mattison, 18 How., 50.

The circumstances make it very doubtful if Davis supposed this deed gave him title.

Counsel then examined the proof of seven years' continuous adverse possession subsequent to the deed, and argued that the evidence did not sustain the claim.

2. As to the defense that the appellees are purchasers for a valuable consideration without notice. The grant from the State of Tennessee to William Park Lea, is admitted to bear on its face conclusive evidence that it had been tampered with in a vital part. Parties taking a title upon the face of which such a material alteration appears, cannot claim to be innocent purchasers.

Markham v. Gonaston, Cro. Eliz., 626; Chew v. Barnet, 11 Serg. & R., 389; Polk v. Wendell 5 Wheat., 309.

Moreover, the defense of Park for consideration without notice, is misconceived in its application to this case. The party setting up the defense, claimed under an alleged grant to William Park Lea. The grant was to William P. Lea, and was by alteration made to read to William Park Lea. If, however, the William P. Lea was William Pinkney Lea, then a conveyance by William Park Lea, not only does not convey the legal title, but does not convey the equitable title. The case, therefore, comes within the scope of Vattier v. Hinde, 7 Pet., 252.

See, also, Hallett v. Collins, 10 How., 174.

It is quite certain that the defendants were not innocent purchasers. The interpolated grant put them on inquiry.

Kennedy v. Green, 3 Myl. & K., 719.

Counsel then reviewed the evidence in the case, and endeavored to show that the William P. Lea of the deed was William Pinkney Lea, and concluded. The above conclusively shows that the complainant entered the land in dispute, and that the grant was made to him, and knowledge of this fact is to be imputed to the defendants, for reasons already set forth.

Messrs. R. H. Smith, Thomas C. Lyon and Horace Maynard, for the appellees:

1. The proof, it is respectfully submitted, does not by any means support the main fact relied on by the complainant, namely: that he entered the land.

2. The title aside, the defendants are fully protected by the Statute of Limitations of 1819, ch. 28, sections 1 and 2, C. & N., 442.

The evidence shows adverse possession for seven years and upwards. That the deed from Park Lea to John Davis is genuine and bears on its face the true date, admits of no doubt.

1. In addition to its probate by the subscribing witnesses, it is proved in common law form to be genuine, by several unimpeachable witnesses. It is exhibited and has no erasures or alterations. The answers of the respondent are responsive to the bill. They each and all say it was genuine, and was executed, as they believe, at the time it bears date.

3. The deed being proved to be unquestionably genuine, the small consideration is most pregnant proof that it was executed previous to the discovery of copper ore in that vicinity. As to the validity of this defense, it is not in the least degree material that there should be subscribing witnesses or probate and registration. It may be forged, invalid or void, yet possession under it for seven years, vests the title in the holder to the extent of the boundaries described in it.

Wallace v. Hannum, 1 Humph., 450; Jones v. Perry, 10 Yerg., 81, 83; Whiteside v. Singleton, Meigs, 224; Williams v. Wilson, M. & Yerg., 248, 254.

The complainant is not within any saving clause of the Statute of 1819, and is therefore barred, if he had even proved his entry and equitable right. This defense, then, everything else aside, is, by an unbroken series of adjudications in Tennessee, absolute and complete.

Love v. Love, 2 Yerg., 288; Wallace v. Hannum, 1 Humph., 448; Vance v. Johnson, 10 Humph., 214; Blantin v. Whittaker, 11 Humph., 313; Marr v. Chester, 1 Swan., 416; Keaton v. Thomasson, 2 Swan., 138; Norris v. Ellis, 7 Humph., 463.

3. It is a well-established principle of equity jurisprudence, that when one has purchased under an apparently legal title for a full, valuable consideration actually paid, without notice, either actual or constructive, of any outstanding equity, his title shall not by such equity be defeated. The equities being equal, the legal title shall prevail.

1 Story, Eq. Jur., 7th ed., sec. 64, ch. 108, 165; Warrick v. Warrick, 3 Atk., 290; Malden v. Mennill, 2 Atk., 13; West v. Errissey, 2 P. Wms., 349; Powell v. Price, 2 P. Wms., 533.

Admitting, for the sake of argument, that the respondents were put on their inquiry by the face of the original grant, to what would that inquiry have led? If they had gone to the Register, he would have informed them that he made the alteration at the instance and request of the parties in interest. He would have shown them alterations of other grants in favor of the complainant, accepted by him. If they had gone to the entry taker's office, they would have discovered that the location was made in the name of William P. Lea, and that this designation was equally applicable to William Park Lea as to complainant. They would have found in books B and C, that William Park Lea was the true enterer. If they had inquired of complainant himself, what answer could he have returned?

Mr. Justice Catron delivered the opinion of the court:

There stood on the record book an entry for 80 acres, in the name of William P. Lea, No. 5446, dated April 5, 1842.

A patent issued, founded on this entry, dated 21st August, 1842, No. 5744.

This patent is in the name of William Park Lea. It was signed by the Governor, countersigned by the Secretary of State, and sealed with the great seal of the State.

As originally filled up, it was in the name of William P. Lea, and was altered to William Park Lea, by adding the letters "ark" to the P. This was done by the Register of the Land Office, whose duty it was to prepare the patent for the signatures of the Governor and Secretary; and the Act of affixing the great seal, which gave it validity as against the State, vested her title, and vested it in the grantee, the patent thus executed being delivered to him.

William Park Lea and William P. Lea wrote their names alike, William P. the latter always, and the former [illegible] although he often signed his name William Lea. The Register added the letters "ark" to the middle name, to distinguish between the two as both had entered lands in the land office, and confusion prevailed as to who was the proper owner. This is admitted in the Register's evidence. In filling patents Nos. 6260, 6258, and 5764, they were issued in the name of William Park Lea. The Register scraped out the letters "ark" and made the patents in the name of William P. Lea, because the lands had been entered by William Pinkney Lea.

No. 5764 of these patents was issued on the same day (21st August, 1842) as the patent (No. 5744) here in dispute was issued, and the letters "ark" added to the name in the other two (Nos. 6260 and 6258) were on December 8th, 1842. Five other patents were filled up properly in the name of William P. Lea. This was all done in the month of August of 1842, and the grants were formally issued and made in April of that year, in the Land Office. The respective claims of the parties to each other, and familiarly known to the Register. The entries had all been made and recorded in the name, "William P. Lea."

That this was honestly done by the Register is not open to dispute. He has made a deposition in great detail, and accounts for the course of proceeding entirely to his satisfaction, so far as his integrity is concerned.

This patent (No. 5744) the bill prays may be reformed so as to stand in the name of William P. Lea, the complainant, and to be the subject of action of ejectment pending in the Circuit Court by the complainant, against the respondents; and second, if said grant shall be found to have been issued to the person not entitled to the land, that then the court will devest the title to the respondents, and vest it in the complainant, so that he may use the decree on the trial of his action of ejectment.

3. The bill also prays, that the court may remove impending clouds from the complainant's title by declaring all the alleged titles of the respondents, or either of them void, and direct the possession of said lands to be surrendered to the complainant, together with a prayer for further and general relief.

To the relief sought, among other defenses (set up in their answers), the respondents rely on the fact that they claim under one John Davis, who purchased from William Park Lea, and took title by a deed in fee with a general warranty of title for the land in dispute, and that Davis, their vendor, purchased and paid for the land to said William Park Lea, without any notice or knowledge that the complainant had any equity in the land, or set up claim thereto.

This deed is produced, dated June 18th, 1846, and appears to have been duly executed by William Park Lea, and the consideration money was paid to him by John Davis. It is not pretended that John Davis had any notice of the complainant's claim when the deed was executed; the complainant had then no knowledge himself that he had any interest in the land.

One objection to this deed is, that it was not duly proved, and could not be lawfully registered according to the laws of Tennessee. In the certificate of probate of Elias Davis, one of the subscribing witnesses, the clerk does not say the witness swore that the grantor acknowledged the same on the day it bears date. The other witness so proves. Now, as the deed shows the date, and the certificate of probate says the grantor acknowledged it for the purposes therein contained, the probate is covered by the provisions of the Act of 1846 (ch. 78, Nicholson's Statute Laws, 242).

Caldwell, Keith & Mastin, purchased from John Davis in the year 1852, paid the purchase money ($6,000), and took a deed in fee simple, with a covenant of general warranty of title for the land in dispute; and they also rely on the plea that they were bona fide purchasers of the legal title, or what purported to be so; and this allegation is established by the proof, unless it be true that the letters "ark," crowded after the letter P, in William Park Lea's name, at the various places that this alteration is found in the patent, was sufficient to put the purchasers on inquiry. Now, if they had inquired of the Register, he could only have told them that he put the letters there in the course of his official duty; but when, he could not say, this being what he proves here. Then the presumption comes in, that, as a public officer, the Register did his duty, and he who impeaches the act as illegal must prove the allegation. On this assumption, the Register filled up the patent as it is now found, before the Governor signed it, and the seal of State was attached—that is to say, when the patent bears date.

Then, again, all the incipient steps authorizing the Register to issue the grant, the Governor to sign it, and the Secretary to attach the great seal, are presumed as having been regular; nor was the purchaser required to look behind the patent. Bagnell v. Broderick, 13 Pet., 448.

The bill, of necessity, admits that the legal title was vested in William Park Lea by the grant as it now stands; as, on any other assumption, the complainant would have his remedy at law, and must be turned out of court. The title has thus stood since 1842; important rights have grown up under it, with which a court of equity cannot interfere, on general principles of justice. 1 Story's Com. on Eq., sec. 64, ch. 64 d. We mean to say, that if the equity conferred by the entry was in William Pinkney Lea, and the patent issued in the name of William Park Lea, and the Mining Company, or those under whom they claim, have innocently and ignorantly purchased and paid for the property, and look legal conveyances for it, with an honest belief that they were dealing for and acquiring a legal title from the true owner, then the complainant cannot be heard to set up his equity behind the grant to overthrow the purchase. 1 Story's Eq., 454. And so the respondents, the Mining Company, might buy in the legal title of William Park Lea, after they had notice, if they were innocent purchasers, holding under John Davis, and Mastin, Keith & Caldwell. 1 Story Eq., sec. 411.

But it is insisted that the deed from Lea to Davis was not registered, and fraudulently concealed from the complainant, so that he could not proceed to assert his rights. Davis had possession of the land when he took William Park Lea's deed, claiming for himself, and adversely to all others; and he so continued in possession till he sold the land in December, 1852. This adverse possession was in itself notice that he held the land under a title, the character of which the complainant was bound to ascertain. Landis v. Brant, 10 How., 375.

Furthermore, Caldwell, Keith & Mastin, purchased from Davis in December, 1852; they caused the deed from William Park Lea to Davis, and the one from the latter to them, to be duly registered, without having any knowledge of the complainant's claim, and without the existence of any circumstance to put them on inquiry respecting it. They were clearly bona fide purchasers of a legal title, that the complainant cannot assail in equity.

2. The respondents rely on the Act of Limitations of the State of Tennessee as a protection to their title and possession. The Act declares "that where any person shall have had seven years' possession of any lands which have been granted by this State, holding or claiming the same by virtue of a deed of conveyance or other assurance, purporting to convey an estate in fee simple, and no claim by suit in law or equity, effectually prosecuted, shall have been set up or made to said lands within the aforesaid time, then, and in that case, the person or persons, their heirs or assigns, so holding possession, shall be entitled to keep and hold possession of such quantity of land as shall be specified and described in the deed, &c., in preference to, and against all, and all manner of person or persons whatever."

By the settled construction of the foregoing Act, an unregistered deed is a sufficient title on which the bar can be founded; and when John Davis' deed from William Park Lea was recorded, it related to its date, and was good to draw the better title to it by force of the Statute.

The possessions of John Davis, and Caldwell, Keith & Mastin, made one possession; and if the two were continuous for the whole term of seven years, then the bar was formed, and the defense complete. This brings us to the fact of actual possession held by Davis, for after he sold to Caldwell, Keith & Mastin, no one disputes their actual possession.

Davis purchased the improvements on the land from Wallace, 25th February, 1842, for the sum of $40; and by the agreement, Wallace was to hold under Davis and occupy the premises for three years, which Wallace proves he did. He then left the place, and Wilson Abercrombie went into possession under Davis, and occupied the cabin one year. It being in the midst of a small field which was annually cultivated in grain crops, Davis removed the cabin beyond the field, and put it up again on the forty-acre lot, and Abercrombie occupied it another year. He was succeeded by Bailey McCoy as tenant of the cabin under Davis; McCoy occupied it for a year or more. Wallace's field could not have included more than some three acres, and had an orchard of peach trees on it. After the cabin was removed, Davis enlarged the field, and extended it across the southern line of the forty-acre lot, and also enlarged it, from time to time, by small clearings at the other end (which were made for turnip patches), until the field included about twelve acres, and which was annually cultivated by Davis, whose residence was within a few hundred yards of the field, on the adjoining section of land. This field was obviously an important part of his plantation. That portion of the twelve-acre field lying on the forty-acre lot embraced, when this suit was brought, about five acres. Mann, the County Surveyor, who run the lines of the forty-acre lot, in September, 1855, so states. He proves that the debris and ground plan of the cabin Wallace built and occupied were quite apparent; that the peach trees were there, and that the old and worn land was plainly distinguishable from that more recently cleared up, and which was on its different sides.

To overcome the evidence of continued possession on the part of Davis, two witnesses were produced by the complainant, to wit: Crawford Braswell and Jesse Shubird. The former swears that he resided in Ducktown from June, 1845, to October, 1850; that he knew John Davis, and the place Wallace improved. "I at one time (says he) purposed purchasing that eighty acres where the Wallace improvement was. Davis told me that he had only the occupant of Luther Wallace; that he did not own the land, and that he had moved the improvements off to another place; and having asked him who owned the land, he stated it was entered by a man by the name of Lea. He stated he had moved off the house and fruit trees, and I think he also named the time." Says he thinks the conversation took place in July, 1848.

In answer to another question, the witness says: "Mr. Davis showed me where he had moved the house from, and I understood he had moved all the improvements off that place, and the stock was running on the land that had been inclosed, and if any of the fencing was left, I did not notice it. The place was grown up very much with bushes. There might have been some rotten rails scattered where the fence was put, lying among the bushes and saplings."

This is represented, also, as having taken place in July, 1848; and the witness swears that in the succeeding August, Davis showed him where the Wallace house had stood. He was interrogated, on the part of the complainant, as follows:

Please state whether or not you afterwards heard John Davis set up claim to the Wallace eighty-acre tract; and if so, state when it was, and fully what he said to you on the subject.

Answer. In the winter of 1849, there was a man there from Bradley County, looking at Davis' land, and talking of buying him out. I happened at Davis' at the time, and he requested me not to mention the conversation to any person, that had passed between us, about the land; that if he sold his land to that man, he should sell the Wallace place also.

Question by same. Please state whether that was the first time you heard him assume to own the eighty-acre Wallace tract.

Answer. He did not profess to own it then, but said he should sell it with the balance, if he sold at all.

Interrogatory by same. State whether or not John Davis had the Luther Wallace place inclosed at any time; and if so, state when he had it done.

Answer. If he had it inclosed at any time, it was since I left that country.

To the cross-interrogatories, the witness stated:

Do you say there was no land on the Wallace tract inclosed and in cultivation during the years 1848, 1849, and 1850?

Answer. None in 1848, and none afterwards that I know of.

Are you acquainted with the boundaries of the Wallace land, and can you say, positively, that there was no land on said tract in cultivation during the aforesaid years?

Answer. I was not acquainted with the lines of the tract, and, if there was any in cultivation on the tract, I did not know it.

Can you, then, say positively that no part of the field, about where the old Wallace house stood, was in cultivation during the time mentioned?

Answer. No part of it was in cultivation during the time I lived there.

In your answer to complainant's sixth question, you say he (John Davis) stated that Lea had entered the land. State where that conversation took place, when; and if any person was present, give the name or names.

Answer. This conversation took place at Davis' mill, in the month of July, 1848, and there was no person present.

In your answer to complainant's third question, you say that John Davis told you he had only the occupant right, which he had purchased from Wallace, and that he did not own the land; state exactly what he told you, and at what time.

Answer. In the month of July, 1848, he made the statements I have made in that answer, that he had only bought the improvements from Wallace, and that he did not own the land, and would not sell it, and make a title to it.

Shubird swears that he went to Ducktown to reside in 1848, and lived there about three years; says he knew John Davis, and the Luther Wallace improvement.

The succeeding questions propounded for the complainant, and the answers to them, will best present the material statements of this witness:

State whether or not the Luther Wallace improvement was moved from the place where he first put it up; and if so, state who had it moved, and where it was moved to.

Answer. The houses, fencing, and peach trees, were moved from the place they were first put on the Luther Wallace place. They were moved by John Davis, and put on his own land.

How far were these improvements taken from where Luther Wallace had put them up?

Answer. I can't exactly say, but suppose a half mile or three quarters.

Please state why John Davis removed these improvements. Tell all you may have heard John Davis say on that subject.

Answer. He (John Davis) stated to me that the reason he moved them was, that he was afraid he would lose his labor, as he had understood a man by the name of Lea had entered the land, and stated that he did not own the land.

State whether or not you ever heard John Davis claim the land where the Luther Wallace improvement was, at any time while you lived with him.

Answer. The Luther Wallace place is now called Copper Hill. I think in about the year 1849, after the copper property came into notice, John Davis set up a claim, and said it.

Do you know whether or not the Luther Wallace improvement or property was left vacant and turned out at the time Davis removed the fencing, &c., away? And if so, state how long it was left vacant.

Answer. The property was left vacant—how long I can't say, but until Davis set up his claim; he then commenced fixing up the fencing again.

On cross-examination, the witness states that he went to Ducktown in March, 1848; that the Wallace house had been removed before; nor was there any inclosed land on the Copper Hill tract when he went there.

He is then further interrogated, and answers:

How can you say, then, as in your answer to complainant's third interrogatory, that the house, fencing, and peach trees, were removed by John Davis, and put upon his own land?

Answer. I heard John Davis say so.

At what time did Davis tell you this, and how did he happen to speak to you on this subject?

Answer. Shortly after I went there—I can't say exactly what time. John Davis and myself, after passing through his farm, passed upon the vacant place of Luther Wallace. He mentioned the subject himself, and told what I have heretofore stated.

On which side of Davis's mill creek was the improvement of which you have been speaking situated?

Answer. It was situated on the left hand when going up the creek.

Was there not, at that time, a small field inclosed between the mill creek and the Copper Hill?

Answer. Not to my knowledge, as I don't know whether there was or not, as I know nothing about it, only as Davis told me that he had taken all off.

Was there any person present when this conversation occurred between you and Davis? If so, state who it was.

Answer. There was no person present.

If the evidence of these two witnesses be true, then there was no continuous adverse holding; and the question is, whether it is entitled to credit. Braswell swears that the entire improvements were removed, including the fruit trees; and that the land where the Wallace improvement had been made was grown up and overrun with bushes and saplings; that this was the condition of the place in 1848. Shubird proves the same, with the exception that he says nothing as respects the undergrowth. So far as conversations with John Davis are given, they may be dismissed, with the remark, that he had obtained William Park Lea's deed for the land in June, 1846, and was not at all likely to carefully disavow all title, and say the land belonged to one Lea.

In 1856, when these depositions were taken, John Davis was dead, and courts of justice lend a very unwilling ear to statements of what dead men had said.

Many witnesses have been examined to prove that Braswell and Shubird are not entitled to credit on oath as witnesses, and many prove the reverse. That they are men of no substantial worth, and of little respectability, is manifest enough, and confidence in their integrity is certainly impaired. But in this case, as in most others, the integrity of the witnesses is easily ascertained. If the land was grown up in bushes and saplings in 1848, it must have been thrown out as a waste place six or eight years before that time. Davis purchased Wallace's possession in February, 1842. Wallace remained there three years, by agreement with Davis. Then Abercrombie came in, and occupied the house one year whilst it stood in the field. It was then removed beyond the field, and had no connection with it. Davis himself took possession of the cleared land, and cultivated it. It was rented by Davis to Dugger, either in 1849 or 1850, and he raised a crop on it. The orchard was there then, and continued there till 1855, after this suit was brought, as Mann, the County Surveyor, proves, who traced the lines of the Copper Hill tract, and examined the cleared land in the twelve-acre field, and especially that part north of the southern line of the forty-acre lot. Mann states that that the marks of the old house built by Wallace were plainly visible, and so was the old worn land cleared by Wallace, and that the peach trees were there. Substantially the same facts are proved by nearly all of the witnesses examined on part of the respondents. It is the most familiar fact in the cause.

That the Wallace field and orchard were constantly under fence from the time Davis purchased of Wallace, and certainly never abandoned nor overrun with brushwood and saplings, is fully established.

And our opinion is, that when Braswell and Shubird deposed to the reverse, they stated what was untrue.

The complainant in his amended bill does not controvert the fact that adverse possession, for more than seven years, had been holden of the land in dispute, but relies on the following allegations to avoid the bar, to wit:

Your orator shows the defendants, in their answers on file, charge that the said John Davis and those claiming under him had seven years' peaceable, uninterrupted, adverse possession of the land in dispute, previous to the filing of the original bill, and previous to the suit at law; as to which facts no answer is asked herein from defendants; but if any such possession existed, your orator charges, and which charge your orator does require to be answered, that it was a fraudulent possession, under a fraudulent grant and fraudulent deed, the registration of which was postponed until within about the last two years; that the possession of your orator's grant, first by the said William Park Lea, and then by the said John Davis, was fraudulently concealed from him by them; that he never had any knowledge or information thereof until about the time stated in his original bill, and within the last twelve months; and that, as his cause of action was thus fraudulently concealed, the Statute of Limitations cannot apply.

These allegations are specially denied by the answer of the respondents, except as to the fact that the deed from William Park Lea to John Davis was not registered, which is admitted. Of the other allegations there is no proof, and of course they are not in the case.

Whether Lea had title or not at the time he conveyed to Davis is altogether immaterial, as the Tennessee Act of Limitation intended to protect and confirm void deeds purporting to convey an estate in fee simple, where seven years' adverse possession had been held under them. Nor was Davis bound to register his deed from Lea; between them, as grantor and grantee, it was valid without registration. Neither can the complainant be heard to say that he had no notice of the fact that Davis claimed title to the land. His possession and adverse holding was notice to the world, as will be seen by the case of Landis v. Brant, above cited.

On the two grounds above stated, we order that the decree of the Circuit Court dismissing the bill be affirmed.

Appeal dismissed, cannot be heard

Where the appeal was dismissed 27th February, 1857, the appellants filed the record and docketed the case, 3d April, 1857, and there is no statement of any other appeal; and this seems to be the appeal that was docketed and dismissed; held, that this appeal cannot be sustained.

Argued and held under advisement May 18, 1858. Reargued Mar. 4, 1759. Decided Mar. 11, 1859.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Columbia. On motion to dismiss.

The case is stated by the court.

Messrs. R. S. Coxe and T. P. Scott, for appellants.

Mr. R. J. Brent, for appellee.

Mr. Justice McLean delivered the opinion of the court:

The facts, as they appear of record, on the motion to dismiss this appeal, are as follows:

The decree of the circuit court was pronounced 21st January, 1856. An appeal was prayed from said decree, and granted the same day, 21st, January, 1856. This appeal was docketed and dismissed under the 63d rule of this court, at December Term, 1856, to wit: 27th February, 1857; and a writ of procedendo was issued 19th May, 1857.

The appellants filed this record and docketed the case 3d April, 1857. The record in this case stated that an appeal had been prayed and allowed, but does not give any date. There is no statement of any prior appeal in this record. The appeal bond is dated 4th February, 1856. There is no citation in this record.

The appellants filed the citation and bond, 30th April, 1857, and directed the clerk to docket this case, to transfer the record filed in the last case to this, to attach said citation and bond to said record, and to print all the papers in this case. There is no statement of any other appeal than that set out; and this seems to be the appeal that was docketed and dismissed 27th February, 1857.

As the record now stands, it is not perceived how this appeal can be sustained.

THE BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS OF THE COUNTY OF KNOX, Plffs. in Er.,

v.

WILLIAM H. ASPINWALL, JOSEPH W. ALSOP, HENRY CHAUNCEY, CHAS. GOULD AND SAM'L. L. M. BARLOW.

(See S. C., 21 How., 539-546.)

County bonds—prerequisites of, question for commissioners—innocent holders—if bonds import validity, purchaser protected—suit on coupons detached.

Where bonds of a county were issued in pursuance of a public statute of a State, any person dealing in them is chargeable with a knowledge of it.

When full power is conferred upon the board of commissioners to subscribe for the stock and issue the bonds, when a majority of the voters of the county have determined in favor of the subscription, after due notice of the time and place of the election; whether or not the election has been properly held, and a majority of the votes of the county cast in favor of the subscription, is a question for the board.

After the authority has been executed, the stock subscribed, and the bonds issued, and in the hands of innocent holders, it is too late, even in a direct proceeding, to call in question the decision of the board.

Much less can it be called in question in a collateral way to the prejudice of a bona fide holder of the bonds.

Where the bonds on their face import a compliance with the law under which they were issued, the purchaser is not bound to look further for evidence of of a compliance with the conditions to the grant of the power.

A suit can be maintained upon the coupons, without the production of the bonds to which they had been attached.

Argued Feb. 24, 1859. Decided Mar. 11, 1859.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Indiana.

This was an action of assumpsit brought in the court below, by the defendants in error, to enforce payment of certain coupons.

The trial in the court below resulted in a verdict and judgment in behalf of the plaintiffs, for $17,832.36, with costs; whereupon the defendants sued out this writ of error.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court:

Messrs. McDonald & Porter, R. W. Thompson, and Reverdy Johnson, for plaintiffs in error.

Messrs. J. P. Benjamin, S. Judah and S. F. Vernon, for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice Nelson delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a writ of error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Indiana.

The suit was brought in the court below against the Board of Commissionors of Knox County, to recover the amount due upon two hundred and eighty-four coupons, each for the sum of $60, the whole amounts to the sum of $17,400. The coupons were payable at the North River Bank, in the City of New York—one hundred and forty-two of them on the 1st of March, 1856, and the remaining number on the 1st of March, 1857. These coupons were originally attached to one hundred and forty-two bonds issued by the defendants, for $1,000 each, the bonds payable at the bank above mentioned, twenty-five years from date, to the Ohio and Mississippi Railroad Company, or bearer, with interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum, payable annually on the 1st of March, at the bank, upon presentation and delivery of the proper coupons hereto attached, by the auditor of said county.

The coupons declared upon and sought to be recovered are those which were attached to these one hundred and forty-two bonds, and represented the interest due thereon on the 1st of March, 1856 and 1857. The plaintiffs are the holders and owners of these coupons.

The main ground of the defense set up and relied on to defeat the recovery is, that the defendant, the Board of Commissioners, possessed no authority to execute, or to authorize to be executed, the bonds or coupons in question; and hence, that they are obligations not binding upon the County of Knox, which this Board represents. Our chief inquiry, therefore, will be, whether or not these several obligations were executed and put into circulation, as evidences of indebtedness, by competent and legal authority.

The defendant is a body corporate, under the laws of the State of Indiana, by the name of the Board of Commissioners of the County, and very large powers are conferred upon it in matters relating to the police and fiscal concerns of the county. The auditor of the county is to act as its clerk, and the sheriff was to attend its meetings and execute its orders. It has a common seal, and copies of its proceedings, signed and sealed by the clerk, are evidence in courts of justice. It has power to dispose of the property of the county; to adjust accounts against it; to raise revenue, and examine accounts of disbursing officers; and an appeal lies from its decisions to the circuit court. 1 R. S. of Indiana, 180, 187.

On the 14th February, 1848, the Legislature of Indiana incorporated the Ohio and Mississippi Railroad Company, and by the 12th section of the Charter provided as follows:

"It shall be lawful for the County Commissioners of any county in the State of Indiana through which said railroad passes, for and in behalf of said county, to authorize, by order on their records, so much of the said stock to be taken in said railroad as they may deem proper, at any time within five years after opening the books of subscription to said stock: Provided, however, that it shall be, and is hereby made, the duty of said County Commissioners, in any county through which said railroad may pass in the State of Indiana, to subscribe for stock for and on behalf of said county, if a majority of the qualified voters of said county, at any annual election within five years after said books are opened, shall vote for the same." Sess. Laws, 1848, page 619.

This Act was amended on the 15th of January, 1849, and in the 2d section it was declared to be the duty of the sheriffs of the counties—and among others, Knox County, the one in question—forthwith give notice of an election to be held on the first Monday in March then next, to determine whether said county would subscribe for the stock of the Ohio and Mississippi Railroad Company, &c.; and if a majority of the votes shall be given in favor of the subscription, the County Board of Commissioners shall subscribe to said stock, &c., for the county, to an amount not less $100,000. Provided, that the County Board of any of said counties may, within one week prior to the said election, increase or lessen the amount to be subscribed, of which notice shall be given at the different precincts of said county on the day of the election, &c.

The 3d section provided that the county subscription shall be payable in county bonds, bearing interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum, payable annually on the first day of March, redeemable at such time and place as the directors of the Company may determine, within thirty years of the date of the subscription. The section then provides for the levying of a tax annually upon the county by the Board of Commissioners, to meet the accruing interest on the bonds.

The plaintiff gave in evidence, on the trial, that at a meeting of the Board of Commissioners of the County of Knox, on the 26th February, 1849, it ordered, under the power given in the 2d section above referred to, that the county subscribe $200,000 of the capital stock of the Ohio & Mississippi Railroad Company. And, also, that at a meeting on the 25th October, 1850, after reciting that, in accordance with the wishes of the voters of the county, as expressed at the election held for that purpose in the several townships on the first Monday of March, 1849. it is ordered that the auditor, in the name and for the County of Knox, subscribe to the capital stock of the Ohio & Mississippi Railroad Company four thousand shares of $50 each, or the sum of $200,000; and that the auditor be authorized to vote at all elections and meetings of stockholders, or to appoint a proxy in his stead. And that, in pursuance of this direction, the auditor subscribed the four thousand shares, and received certificates in the name of the Board of Commissioners of the county for the same; and also executed and delivered the bonds of the county as provided for in the 3d section of the Act of 1839, attaching thereto coupons for the interest. The bonds and coupons in question were issued under this authority.

This is the substance of the case, as presented on the record.

The ground upon which the want of authority to excute the bond in question is placed, is the alleged omission to comply with the requisition of the Statute of 1849, in respect to the notices to be given of the election to be held on the first Monday of March, at which a vote was to be taken for or against a subscription of stock to the railroad company.

It is insisted that an irregularity or omission in these notices had the effect to deprive the Board of this authority, or rather furnish evidence that the power had never vested in it under the Act; and further, that the plaintiffs are chargeable with a knowledge of all substantial defects or irregularities in these notices of the election, and not, therefore, entitled to the character of bona fide holders of the securities.

The Act, in pursuance of which the bonds were issued, is a public statute of a State, and it is undoubtedly true that any person dealing in them is chargeable with a knowledge of it; and as this Board was acting under delegated authority, he must show that the authority has been properly conferred. The court must, therefore, look into the Statute for the purpose of determining this question; and upon looking into it, we see that full power is conferred upon the Board to subscribe for the stock and issue the bonds, when a majority of the voters of the county have determined in favor of the subscription, after due notice of the time and place of the election. The case assumes that the requisite notices were not given of the election, and hence that the vote has not been in conformity with the law.

This view would seem to be decisive against the authority on the part of the Board to issue the bonds, were it not for a question that underlies it; and that is, who is to determine whether or not the election has been properly held, and a majority of the votes of the county cast in favor of the subscription. Is it to be determined by the court, in this collateral way, in every suit upon the bond, or coupon attached, or by the Board of Commissioners, as a duty imposed upon it before making the subscription?.

The court is of opinion that the question belonged to this Board. The Act makes it the duty of the sheriff to give the notices of the election for the mentioned, and then declares, if a majority of the votes given shall be in favor of the subscription, the County Board shall subscribe the stock. The right of the Board to act in an execution of the authority is placed upon the fact that a majority of the votes had been cast in favor of the subscription; and to have acted without first ascertaining it, would have been a clear violation of duty; and the ascertainment of the fact was necessarily left to the injuiry and judgment of the Board itself, as no other tribunal was provided for the purpose. This Board was one, from its organization and general duties, fit and competent to be the depositary of the trust thus confided to it. The persons composing it were elected by the county, and it was already invested with the highest functions concerning its general police and fiscal interests.

We do not say that the decision of the Board would be conclusive in a direct proceeding to inquire into the facts previously to the execution of the power, and before the rights and interests of third parties had attached; but, after the authority has been executed, the stock subscribed, and the bonds issued, and in the hands of innocent holders, it would be too late, even in a direct proceeding, to call it in question. Much less can it be called in question to the prejudice of a bona fide holder of the bonds in this collateral way.

Another answer to this ground of defense is, that the purchaser of the bonds had a right to assume that the vote of the county, which was made a condition to the grant of the power, had been obtained, from the fact of the subscription, by the Board, to the stock of the railroad company, and the issuing of the bonds.

The bonds, on their face, import a compliance with the law under which they were issued "This bond," we quote, "is issued in part payment of a subscription of $200,000, by the said Knox County, to the capital stock, &c., by order of the Board of Commissioners," in pursuance of the 3d section of Act, &c., passed by the General Assembly of the State of Indiana, and approved 15th January, 1849.

The purchaser was not bound to look further for evidence of a compliance with the conditions to the grant of the power. This principle was recently applied in a case in the Court of Exchequer in England. 6 Ellis & Blackburn, 827, The Royal British Bank v. Turquand. It was an action upon a bond against the defendant, as the manager of a joint stock company. The defense was a want of power under the deed of settlement or charter to give the bond. One of the clauses in the charter provided that the directors might borrow money on bonds in such sums as should, from time to time, by a general resolution of the company, be authorized to be borrowed. The resolution passed was considered defective. Jervis, Ch. B., in delivering the judgment of the court, observed: "We may now take it for granted that the dealings with these companies are not like dealings with other partnerships, and that the parties dealing with them are bound to read the statute and the deed of settlement. But they are not bound to do more. And the party here, on reading the deed of settlement, would find, not a prohibition from borrowing, but a permission to do so on certain conditions. Finding that the authority might be made complete by a resolution, he would have a right to infer the fact of a resolution authorizing that which, on the face of the document, appeared to be legitimately done." See, also, S. C., 5 Ellis & Bl., p. 245, and 25 Eng. L. & Eq., p. 114, Maclae v. Sutherland. The principle we think sound, and is entirely applicable to the question before us.

A question was made upon the argument, that the suit could not be maintained upon the coupons without the production of the bonds to which they had been attached. But the answer is, that these coupons or warrants for the interest were drawn and executed in a form and mode for the very purpose of separating them from the bond, and thereby dispensing with the necessity of its production at the time of the accruing of each installment of interest, and at the same time to furnish complete evidence of the payment of the interest to the makers of the obligation.

Some other minor points were made in the case upon the argument, which we have considered, but which it is not important should be particularly noticed.

We are satisfied the judgment below is right, and should be affirmed.

Mr. Justice Daniel, dissenting:

In the case of The Knox County Commissioners v. Aspinwall et al., it is my opinion, in the first place, that the Circuit Court had not jurisdiction of the cause, one of the parties being a Corporation; and second, I think, moreover, that the Comissioners being known to be mere agents, it was the duty of those who dealt with them to ascertain the extent of their powers.

The facts disclosed upon the trial of this case were substantially the same, mutatis mutandis, as those which were proved or admitted in the case of Commissioners of Knox County v. Argued Feb. 28, 1859. Decided Mar. 11, 1859.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Indiana.

This was an action of assumpsit brought in the court below by the defendant in error, on certain coupons for installments of interest. The trial below resulted in a verdict and judgment in favor of the plaintiff, for $4,287.05, with costs; whereupon the defendants sued out this writ of error.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. McDonald & Porter and R. W. Thompson, for plaintiff in error.

Mr. N. C. McLean, for defendant in error:

The Board of Commissioners had power to issue the bonds. The county record authorizes the issue of the bonds in accordance with the 3d section of the Act of Jan. 15, 1849, and that provides for bonds bearing interest payable annually. The coupons or interest warrants were attached to the bonds in the usual and ordinary way for the convenience of all parties, and were merely the evidence of the payment of the interest authorized by the bonds themselves under the law. The power is not extended, but is simply exercised in the manner which has become the settled custom in such securities.

Graham v. Maddox, 6 Am. Law Reg., 615; State of Ohio v. Commissioners of Clinton Co., 6 O. St., 280.

Mr. Justice Nelson delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a writ of error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Indiana.

The suit was brought by Wallace against the Board, upon several coupons, for installments of interest which had been attached to certain bonds issued by the defendants to the Ohio and Mississippi R.R. Co. The coupons were owned by the plaintiff, and had been duly presented for payment, which was refused. The defendants pleaded the general issue, and six special pleas, to which there were replications, except the second and sixth pleas, to which there were demurrers.

The court sustained the demurrers. There were afterwards amendments and demurrers to pleadings not very intelligible in the record, and seem not to have been relied on by either party. The case was tried upon the general issue, and the facts disclosed upon the trial was substantially the same, mutatis mutandis, as those which were proved or admitted in the previous case of Aspinwall and others against these same defendants. After the evidence was closed, the defendants presented ten prayers to the court, upon each of which instructions were given. It is unnecessary to go through them; the questions involved have already been examined in the case above mentioned, and the result there arrived at affirms the judgment in this case.

Judgment affirmed.

PHILO CHAMBERLAIN AND JOHN H. CRAWFORD, Claimants of the Propeller OGDENSBURGH, Appts.,

v.

EBER B. WARD AND STEPHEN CLEMENT, Survivor of SAMUEL WARD, Deceased.

(See S. C., 21 How., 548-572.)

NOTE.—Collision; rules for avoiding steamer meeting steamer. See note to Williamson v. Barrett, 54 U. S. (13 How.), 101.

Collision—incompetent officers—owners and vessel responsible—signal lights, when insufficient—neglect of officer—requirements as to lights—neglect of other vessel, mutual fault—Damages.

In case of collision on Lake Erie, propellor held in fault, because she did not have a competent and skillful officer in charge of her deck, and because it appears that his want of qualifications and unskillfulness contributed to the collision.

Owners of vessels must see to it that the masters and other officers intrusted with their control and management, are skillful and competent to the discharge of their duties; as, in case of a disaster like the present, both the owners and the vessel are responsible for their acts, and must answer for the consequences of their want of skill and negligence.

The propeller also held in fault, because she did not have signal lights properly displayed, as required by law.

Signal lights are required by the Act of Congress, and when they are extinguished, or burning so dimly as not to fulfill the purpose and object for which they are required, they do not and cannot constitute a compliance with such Act of Congress.

The propeller also held in fault, for the reason that the officer in charge of her deck neglected seasonably and effectually to change the course of the vessel, after he discovered the signal lights of the steamer.

Steamboats and propellers navigating the lakes are required by the 5th section of the Act of March 3, 1849, to carry a triangular light, shaded green on the starboard side, and red on the larboard side, with reflectors, and to be of a size to insure a good and sufficient light; and the owners of such vessels, neglecting to comply with the regulation, are declared liable to the injured party for all loss or damage resulting from such neglect.

But the neglect on the part of one vessel, to show signal lights as they approach, does not discharge the other, from the obligation to adopt all reasonable and practical precautions to prevent a collision.

The steamer also held chargeable with fault, because the officer in charge of her deck did not exercise proper vigilance to ascertain the character of the approaching vessel, after he discovered the white lights which subsequently proved to be the white lights of the propeller.

The steamer also held chargeable with fault, because the officer in charge of her deck did not seasonably, and effectually change the course of the vessel, or slow or stop her engine, so as to avoid collision, after he discovered the white lights of the approaching vessel.

The steamer also held in fault, because she did not have a vigilant and sufficient lookout.

In a case of mutual fault, the decree of the circuit court, apportioning the damages, was correct.

Argued Feb. 15, 1859. Decided Mar. 11, 1859.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Ohio.

The libel in this case was filed in the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of Ohio, by the appellees, to recover damages sustained by a collision. The decree of the said court dismissed the libel and further ordered, adjudged and decreed, that the libelants pay to the respondents the sum of $3,000, with interest, as damages which they sustained by the collision.

The circuit court, on appeal, reversed this decree, and decreed that the damages occasioned by the collision, with costs in both courts, be equally divided between the parties, whereupon both parties appealed to this court, and the appeals have been separately docketed, in conformity to the agreement of the parties, that the answer of the respondents should operate as a cross libel for the damage sustained by the propeller.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

See, also, the next succeeding case.

Messrs. R. P. Spalding and H. Stanbery, for appellants:

1. The propeller Ogdensburgh was on her true course, N. E. by E., when she first made the steamer's light.

2. She did not change her course.

3. It was the duty of the propeller, under existing circumstances, to keep her course. To have thrown her helm "a-port," with the steamer from two to three points of the compass on her starboard bow, would have been a gross violation of the rules of navigation.

4. The light of The Atlantic, as first made from the propeller, was by no means a "red signal light. It was an ordinary white light. The Atlantic was only three or four times her length off, and was consequently swinging under "a port helm," when she showed her "red light" to the propeller.

5. At the instant of collision, and when it was inevitable, the helm of the propeller was ordered "a-starboard." But the testimony shows that the object was solely to lessen the amount of damage by receiving a glancing stroke upon the bows, rather than a direct blow upon the broadside of the propeller.

The steamboat had no right to place the propeller in such jeopardy, that the error of a moment might cause her destruction. If an error was committed in giving the order to "starboard," it could not, under the circumstances, be deemed a "fault."

The Genesee Chief v. Fitzhugh, 12 How., 461; Shute v. Goslee, 3 Am. Law Reg., 476.

6. The propeller displayed proper lights.

The steamer Atlantic was wholly in fault:

First. She had no sufficient "lookout" on the night in question. The inside of the pilot house was not the proper place from whence to keep watch for approaching vessels. "A competent and vigilent 'lookout' should have been stationed at the forward part of the steamer, in the position best adapted to descry vessels at the earliest moment."

Second. The master and chief mate were in bed while the steamboat was running at a rapid rate, in a locality much frequented by vessels, through an atmosphere so smoky that the character and course of the propeller could not be determined at the distance of half a mile. Under such circumstances, the safety of more than four hundred human lives was intrusted to a second mate, who lacked the experience of a single summer, as "an officer of the deck."

This shows, on the part of the two first-named officers, an indifference to their responsibility perfectly unjustifiable, and tends very much to cast the blame for the collision upon The Atlantic.

The Iron Duke, 2 W. Rob., 385; Shute v. Goslee, 3 Am. Law Reg., 474.

Third. The steamboat was greatly in fault in not diminishing her speed, when she found herself in close proximity with another vessel, of whose character and course she was ignorant.

Law Reg., 340; Shute v. Goslee, Justice Campbell, 3 Am. Law Reg., 475; The Europa, 2 Eng. L. & Eq., 559.

In the case of The N. Y. and Va. Steamship Co. v. Calderwood, 19 How., 241, Mr. Justice Campbell says (p. 246): "In the present instance, the steamer had notice that a vessel was before her and was near her track, and under the circumstances she was bound to take efficient measures to avoid the schooner."

Fourth. Having neglected to "ease her engine," which would have been, to say the least, a proper precautionary measure under the circumstances, the burthen rests upon The Atlantic to show that the collision was not owing to that neglect, but would have equally happened if she had performed her duty.

Schooner Lion, Judge Sprague, 6 Law Rep., 117; The Anita v. The Anglo Norman, McCaleb, Judge, Eastern Dist. of Louisiana, Newb. Adm., 494.

Fifth. The steamboat committed an unpardonable fault, when she threw her helm "a port" and attempted to cross the bows of the propeller. In fact, the collision was brought about by this rash and unskillful maneuver.

Dig. 171, note 98; The Oregon v. Rocca, 18 How., 572.

Sixth. After the collision, The Atlantic was blamable in not having attempted to ascertain whether The Ogdensburgh required assistance.

The Celt, 3 Hagg., 327.

Finally. If in any possible contingency this high tribunal shall be brought to the determination, that the propeller Ogdensburgh contributed to the terrible disaster revealed in the testimony, in such a manner as to incur liability for damages, then in behalf of her owners, Chamberlain & Crawford, I shall claim the benefit of the Act of Congress of March 3d, 1851, entitled "An Act to limit the liability of ship owners and for other purposes."

Messrs. John S. Newberry and N. H. Swayne, for appellees.

Mr. Justice Clifford delivered the opinion of the court:

This was a suit in personam, and comes before the court by appeal from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Ohio, sitting in admiralty. It was commenced by the present appellees, as owners of the steamer Atlantic, against the appellants, as owners of the propeller Ogdensburgh, and grew out of a collision which occurred on Lake Erie between those vessels on the 20th day of August, 1852, whereby the propeller received damage, and the steamer was run down and lost. Some change was made in the nature and character of the proceeding after the suit was instituted, making it necessary that a brief explanation should be given, in order that the present state of the pleadings may not be misunderstood. According to the transcript, the original libel was filed in the clerk's office of the district court on the 27th day of October, 1852, and on the same day a process of attachment against the propeller, and monition to her owners, was taken out, and subsequently served, pursuant to its mandate, by attaching the vessel, publishing notices to those interested, and summoning the respondents. On the 11th day of November following, an amended libel was filed in court, setting forth more in detail the circumstances of the collision and the grounds of the claim as made by the libelants. As amended, however, the libel still retained, in some of its aspects, the the form of a proceeding in rem against the vessel, and a suit in personam against her owners.

In the answer, which was not filed till after the process was served, the appellants, as claimants of the propeller and respondents in this suit, excepted to the form of a libel, alleging that the two modes of proceeding were improperly joined, and prayed that the libel should be dismissed on that account. At the hearing in the district court, the exception of the respondents for a misjoinder was sustained, and thereupon the libelants, on motion for leave, were permitted to amend and change the proceeding to the form of a suit in personam against the appellants as owners of the propeller, and the cause was allowed to progress, and in that form of proceeding, the parties were uitimately heard upon the merits of the controversy. Another explanation is also necessary, connected with the answer of the respondents, as without it the subsequent proceedings in the cause would appear to have been irregular, and certainly would be incomprehensible. On the 26th day of April, 1853, the parties entered into an agreement to the effect that the answer of the respondents in this suit should operate as a cross libel for the damage sustained by the propeller, and that the claims of both parties to damage should be considered by the court in weighing the evidence, and be adjudicated upon in the final decree; and in order to facilitate the investigation, it was admitted in the case that the damage sustained by the propeller amounted to the sum of $8,000, and that the value of the steamer was $75,000. Other interlocutory proceedings were had in the cause which it is not important to notice, and testimony was taken on both sides, and at the final hearing on the 10th day of May following, a decree was entered, that the libel be dismissed with costs; and under the authority conferred by the agreement that the answer should operate as a cross libel, it was further ordered, adjudged and decreed, that the libelants pay to the respondents, within thirty days, the sum of $3,000, with interest, as the damage which the propeller sustained by the collision.

From that decree the libelants appealed to the circuit court. Much additional testimony was taken in the circuit court, and after a full hearing on the 12th of November, 1856, upon the pleadings as modified, and the proofs adduced by the respective parties, it was ordered, adjudged and decreed, that the decree of the district court be in all things reversed, and a final decree was entered, to the effect that the damages occasioned by the collision, together with the costs in both courts, be equally divided, and that each party bear a moiety of the same; and that the respondents, pursuant to the admissions of the parties as to the amount of the damage, pay to the libelants the sum of $36,000. Whereupon the parties respectively appealed to this court, and the appeals have been separately docketed in conformity to the agreement of the parties, that the answer of the respondents should operate as a cross libel for the damage sustained by the propeller.

Some reference to the pleadings touching the merits of the controversy now becomes necessary, before we proceed to the consideration of the matters of fact in dispute between the parties in this suit.

According to the allegations of the libel, the steamer Atlantic was duly enrolled and licensed, and was regularly employed in transporting passengers and freight, making semi-weekly trips each way, to and from Detroit, in the State of Michigan, and Buffalo, in the State of New York. She left Buffalo at the usual hour in the evening of the 19th of August, 1852, with freight and a large number of passengers on board, bound on her regular trip to the port of Detroit. And the libelants allege that she was a tight, strong vessel, and in every respect well manned, equipped and appointed for the voyage, with a full complement of officers and men; and that those to whom the duty properly belonged were at the time of the disaster on the lookout for the safety and protection of the vessel. They also allege that after leaving Buffalo she proceeded on her voyage in the usual route across the lake, with all her signal lights displayed as required by law; that while she was so proceeding, at about half past two o'clock in the morning of the following day, and when she was off Long Point, on the Canada shore, the propeller Ogdensburgh, then being on her way from Cleveland to the entrance of the Welland Canal, came upon the steamer, and with great force and violence ran into her, the bow of the propeller striking the larboard side of the steamer near the forward gangway, breaking and crushing by the force and violence of the collision into and through the guard and hull of the vessel, so that she filled with water and sunk, and became wholly lost to the libelants.

Other matters of fact, material to the issue, are also set forth in the libel, and among the number are the following: that the propeller, before and at the time of the collision, did not have burning, and properly displayed, the signal lights required by law; that she was not then proceeding in the usual route from Cleveland to the entrance of the canal, and that those in charge of her when she came in sight of the lights of the steamer neither stopped her engines, nor slackened her speed, nor altered her course, nor took any other precaution to prevent or avoid a collision; and the libelants aver that it was otherwise with those in charge of the steamer; that as soon as they perceived the lights of the propeller approaching, they put the wheel of the steamer first a-port, and then hard a-port, turning her course to the right, away from the propeller, as by law it was their duty to do, and that they made every effort in their power to avoid a collision; and finally, that the persons in charge of the propeller, though they saw the lights of the steamer at a great distance, and in ample time to have prevented the disaster, did not put the wheel of the propeller a-port, or turn their vessel to the right, away from the steamer, as they were bound to do; nor did they stop or slow the engine, or display lawful signal lights, but so negligently, improperly and unskillfully navigated their vessel that she ran directly and almost at right angles into and against the steamer, and thereby occasioned the disaster. Many of the affirmative facts alleged in the libel are expressly controverted in the answer filed by the respondents. They deny that the steamer was a tight, strong vessel, or that she was well manned and appointed for the voyage; and they also deny that the proper persons were on the lookout for the protection and safety of the vessel, or that those in charge of the steamer took any precautionary measures to prevent the collision.

In addition to these denials, they allege, as matter of defense, that the propeller, a vessel of three hundred and fifty-three tons burthen, left Cleveland on the day preceding the disaster at about twenty minutes past twelve o'clock, deeply laden, and proceeded on her voyage, by the way of Fairmount, toward Ogdensburgh, her place of destination, which was to be reached through the canal before mentioned; that about two o'clock the next morning, and when she was steering northeast by east, on her proper course to the entrance of the canal, the wind being light and the weather somewhat hazy, the watch on her deck discovered the light of a steamer from two to three points off her larboard bow, which was supposed to be three miles distant; that the propeller kept on her course, running at a speed of about seven miles an hour, until the mate, who had the watch, ascertaining that the light was fast approaching the propeller, gave the signal to slow, which was obeyed; and soon after, on discovering that the light was coming still nearer, signaled to stop; and then, finding that the vessels were likely to come in contact, he directed the engine to be reversed, and gave the order to back; but in spite of all these precautionary measures, the collision ensued.

Respecting the immediate cause of the collision, the theory of the respondents is, that the steamer, if she had held her course southwest by west, would have passed the propeller nearly a mile on her starboard quarter; and they accordingly allege, that by putting her helm a-port her course was turned to the right, so as to bring her across the bows of the propeller. And they also allege, in this connection, that the steamer was running with unabated speed at the rate of fifteen miles an hour, when she fell with all her momentum upon the stem of the propeller, wrenching it out of its place, and carrying the propeller half round as she ran on her course.

And they finally allege that the persons in charge of the propeller, from the moment they first discovered the light of the steamer to the time of the collision, managed their vessel according to the most approved rules of navigation; and that the collision was wholly owing to the fault, neglect and unskillfulness of the officers and crew of the steamer, in changing her course across the path of the propeller, and in their culpable omission to stop the steamer, after it was found that such change of course increased the danger, by bringing the two vessels closer together. And, in accordance with the theory that the steamer was wholly in fault, they pray that their answer may be taken as a cross libel in their behalf, to recover the damage sustained by the propeller, and that such sum may be decreed to them, by reason of the collision, as in justice they are entitled to receive.

Such is the substance of the pleadings, so far as respects the circumstances of the collision, and all the matters of fact to be determined by the court.

Since the suit was commenced, the parties have examined more than one hundred witnesses; and their testimony, as exhibited, fills nearly four hundred pages of the transcript. In that state of the case, a particular analysis of the testimony of each witness, and a comparison of their respective statements, will not be attempted, as its effect would be to extend the investigation beyond all reasonable limits, without any practical benefit to either party. All that can be done, under the circumstances, will be to state the material facts proved, and to refer to such brief portions of the evidence as seems to be necessary to confirm our conclusions. Conflicting testimony we have indeavored to reconcile, where it was possible; and when not so, we have drawn our conclusions from the weight of the evidence and the probabilities of the case.

With these explanations, we will proceed to state the material facts, so far as respects the steamer Atlantic.

She left Buffalo between nine and ten o'clock in the evening of the day preceding the disaster, having on board, in addition to her freight, nearly five hundred passengers, of whom more than one hundred were lost. At the time of her departure, she was in every respect seaworthy, and was well manned and appointed for the voyage, with a competent master and a sufficient and competent crew. Steamers, on leaving Buffalo for Detroit, usually steer southwest by west; and The Atlantic, following her accustomed route, pursued that general course during the night, until she made Long Point light, on the Canada shore, when the officer in charge of her deck changed her course one fourth of a point to the southward, in order to give the light a wider berth. When abreast of that light, and about two miles distant from it, the steamer resumed her former course, about southwest by west, and continued on her voyage, without any other change, until the second mate, who had charge of the deck, discovered two white lights three fourths of a point off her larboard bow, when he ordered the wheelsman to port her helm, and the order was obeyed.

Nothing additional occurred during the voyage, of any importance in this investigation, up to the time those lights were discovered by the second mate. His watch, which commenced shortly after the steamer was outside, had not then closed and of course he was properly in charge of the deck. He testifies, that at first he saw only one light, and then another, and that they appeared like glimmering stars, and at first view he was unable to determine whether they were stars or the lights of a vessel; but upon further observation he supposed they were the lights of a sail vessel, and accordingly gave the order to port the helm. That order was given while the officer who issued it was standing in the pilot house, which was situated on the forward part of the hurricane deck, at the usual elevation in steamers of that description, above the water line of the vessel. She was a first-class steamer, of eight hundred tons burthen, and was moving through the water at the rate of sixteen miles an hour, and the officer in charge of the deck, and who gave the order to port the helm, was the only lookout stationed on any part of the vessel; and it is not pretended that either officer or seamen, other than the officer of the deck, had been assigned to that duty during the voyage.

Two other persons, the wheelsman and a passenger, were in the pilot house with the second mate, both when he discovered the lights and when he gave the order to port the helm; and the evidence shows that he went there for a purpose connected with his duty as officer of the deck; and he testifies that he had not been inside more than two minutes when he first saw the light. After having giving the order to port the helm, he immediately left the position where he had been standing, and went on to the top of the pilot house, and then he says the signal lights of The Atlantic, which were properly displayed, and were burning brightly, shone on to the approaching vessel, and enabled him to see that she was a steamer, and that the two vessels were very close together. His own account of what followed shows conclusively that the knowledge he then for the first time obtained, as to the character of the approaching vessel, was too late to enable him to adopt the necessary precautions to avoid the impending peril. On seeing the propeller, and ascertaining the danger of his situation, arising from the closeness of her approach, he ordered the helm of the steamer hard a-port, and, without waiting to know whether the order was obeyed, put his hand on to the telegraph, with a view to give the signal to stop; but perceiving that the collision was almost certain, he omitted to signal, concluding that the only chance of safety was to rely upon the velocity of the steamer, and the operation of her helm under the order already given, which, it seems, was promptly obeyed. Precautionary measures could not then be effectually adopted, as the time and opportunity to render them available had passed, and the two vessels almost immediately came together, the propeller striking the larboard side of the steamer near the forward gangway, crushing through the guard and hull of the steamer, and otherwise damaging her, so that before she had run a mile she filled with water and sunk in the lake. These facts are drawn from the testimony of the witnesses who were on the deck of the steamer or in her pilot house, and are believed to be substantially correct, and to correspond with the events as they occurred. They all concur in saying that they did not see any signal lights on the propeller as she approached, and supposed she was a sail vessel till it was too late to stop the engine, and affirm, most confidently, that if good signal lights had been shown, they would have seen them. Those shown by the steamer were seen by the mate of the propeller when the vessels were three miles apart, and several witnesses testify that such lights, if properly shown, as required by law, could be seen at the distance of four or five miles; and in view of the evidence as to the state of the weather and the character of the night, we have no doubt they might have seen, if burning brightly, in ample time to have prevented the disaster. All the witnesses agree that the wind was light, and the surface of the lake smooth, and they generally admit that there was some mist or haze on the water; but assert in the most positive terms that it was starlight overhead, and no one pretends that it was unusually dark. Good signal lights, under such circumstances, if burning brightly, could readily be seen, notwithstanding the haze on the water, at a sufficient distance to enable steamers approaching each other to adopt every necessary precaution to avoid a collision.

Having stated the principal facts proved, as they appear to the court, so far as respects the steamer, we will now proceed to the examination of those of a corresponding character which relate to the propeller. More difficulty attends this branch of the inquiry, on account of the conflicting state of the testimony, and the consequent uncertainty in which the facts are involved. Some of the facts, however, are fully proved, and to those we will first invite attention. As alleged in the answer, the propeller left Cleveland, on the day preceding the disaster, on her downward trip from Chicago to Ogdensburgh, which was to be reached through the Welland Canal. No doubt is entertained that she was a good, strong vessel, and there is nothing in the testimony to call in question either the competency of her master or the sufficiency of her crew. It appears, by the testimony of her master, that she left Cleveland about noon, and ran down opposite Grand River by daylight; that after arriving there she steered, for about an hour, east-northeast, and then turned to northeast by east till the vessels came together. This last statement, however, is obviously mere hearsay, as the watch of the mate commenced at twelve o'clock at night, and he continued in charge of the deck until half past two in the morning, when the collision occurred; and the master admits, what it is important to observe, that it was usual when they got down off Long Point, and found themselves out of the way, "to steer accordingly," by which we understand him to mean that it was usual, when they got down there, to regulate the course of the propeller with respect to the well-known position of Long Point, and perhaps with a view to make that light, in the further progress of the voyage, which is proved to be the most prominent light on the route. At twelve o'clock the mate took charge of the deck, and he says he kept the propeller on a course of east-northeast until two o'clock, and then hauled her off from the southern shore, to northeast by east, and that soon after he saw a light two points or two and a half points off her starboard bow. Could this statement of the mate, in regard to the course of the propeller, be regarded as correct, we should be obliged to acquit both vessels, upon the ground that the alleged collision never took place, as obviously it could not, assuming that the course of the steamer has been correctly ascertained. His testimony in this particular, therefore, must be considered as founded in mistake; and it is proper to remark that he is contradicted in so many particulars, and is proved to have made so many contradictory statements in respect to the circumstances of the collision, that we deem it unsafe to give full credence to his statements, especially in regard to such matters in controversy as obviously involve the vindication of his own conduct in the management of the vessel. Rejecting his statement as incredible, because inconsistent with the admitted and well-established facts in the case, we are left without any satisfactory testimony in the record from which the precise course of the propeller, for one or two hours before the collision, can be ascertained with any reasonable degree of certainty.

Looking at the other facts and circumstances in the case, there is much reason to conclude that the inexperience and ignorance of the mate led him, in the early part of his watch, to adopt a route somewhat to the southern shore than had been usual, until he got down off Long Point; and finding, on arriving there, that he was too far to the southward, he then changed the course of the propeller to the one she was pursuing when the lights of the steamer were first discovered; and this view of the case finds support in the fact proved by the master, that it was usual to correct any irregularity in the course at that stage of the voyage. That the propeller was south of The Atlantic when her mate discovered the signal lights of the latter vessel, is proved beyond all reasonable doubt and is, in effect, admitted by the mate in that part of his testimony where he says that the bearing of her lights, when he first saw them, was two or two and a half points off the starboard bow of the propeller. Her course then was in an easterly direction, and it is equally well established that her white lights were first seen on the steamer, whose course was westerly off her larboard bow. Assuming these two facts to be true, of which there is no doubt whatever, and it necessarily follows that the propeller was south of The Atlantic, and such, it is believed, was the real fact. Both vessels were injured by the collision, and additional light is shed upon this inquiry by the evidence in the case as to the localities in the respective vessels where the damage was received. All, or nearly all, the damage received by the propeller was in her starboard bow, near the stem, and it was the larboard side of the steamer, near the forward gangway, that was so crushed and broken in as to cause her to fill with water and sink. These circumstances, taken in connection with the well-established fact that the mate of the propeller, who had charge of her deck, persistently maintained that he had a right to keep his course, and that it was the duty of the steamer to adopt the necessary precautions to keep out of the way, furnish strong grounds of presumption that no considerable change was made by the propeller until the peril was impending and the collision inevitable. Any change of course, if made under such circumstances, whether to the starboard or larboard, would not constitute a compliance with the rules of navigation, because it would be too late to accomplish the purpose for which precautions are enjoined.

Much discussion also took place at the bar upon the question whether the propeller, at the time of the collision, had proper signal lights displayed, as required by law. On that point, the evidence shows that her signal lights were seasonably set and properly displayed at the usual hour, and were burning brightly throughout the early part of the night; and no doubt is entertained that they continued to burn, so as to answer the purpose for which they are required, till after twelve o'clock, when the watch of the mate commenced. It is, however, clearly proved that it was usual and necessary to clean and trim them, and perhaps supply them with additional oil, about the middle of the night; and the steward, who was assigned to that service, and whose duty it was to see that it was properly performed, testifies that her signal lights were neglected in that particular on the night of the collision, and consequently, were burning so dimly when it occurred that they could not be seen at a distance beyond twice the length of the vessel; and in confirmation of this statement, he says that, shortly after the vessels came in contact, he took down the signal lights of the propeller, by order of the master, and brushed off the crust from the wicks and trimmed them, and testifies positively that they were dim.

1. Our conclusions upon this state of the evidence will now be briefly stated, commencing with the propeller; and we find that she was in fault, because she did not have a competent and skillful officer in charge of her deck, and because it appears that his want of qualifications and unskillfulness contributed to the collision. Owners of vessels, and especially those who own and employ steamships, whether propellers or side-wheel steamers, must see to it that the master and other officers intrusted with their control and management are skillful and competent to the discharge of their duties, as, in case of a disaster like the present, both the owners and the vessel are responsible for their acts, and must answer for the consequences of their want of skill and negligence; and this remark is just as applicable to the under officers, whether the mate or second mate, as to the master, during all the time they have charge of the deck. That the mate in this case was substantially without experience in navigating steamers, and utterly destitute of the requisite information to fit him to determine the proper courses of the voyage, are facts so fully proved that it is difficult to regard them as the proper subjects of dispute; and what is more, the master knew his unfitness when he started on the voyage, and stated, before the vessel left Cleveland, to the effect that he was afraid that he was going to be sick, and that he had no confidence in the mate. Some of the owners also distrusted his fitness when they employed him, and made an effort to engage another person in his stead; and one of them, after having heard of the disaster, expressed his regret that the person to whom he first applied had not taken his place. We forbear to pursue this branch of the subject, only remarking, in addition to what has already been stated, that the evidence to establish his unfitness and incompetency for the place is full and conclusive.

2. The propeller is also in fault because she did not have signal lights properly displayed, as required by law; and this conclusion is intended to apply to the entire period after the steamer came in sight, the weight of the testimony tending strongly to show that they were little better than if they had been actually extinguished. At all events, it is satisfactorily shown that they were burning so dimly as not to fulfill the purpose and object for which they are required. There is some conflict in the statements of the witnesses on this point; but the testimony of the steward, whose duty it was to repair them, and who, by the command of the master, attended to the service shortly after the collision, appears to be entitled to belief, and when considered in connection with the positive affirmations of the witnesses for the libelants, that they looked for signal lights on the propeller as she approached, and saw none, seems to be decisive of the question. Signal lights are required by the Act of Congress, in order that they may be seen by an approaching vessel in season to enable those in charge of her to ascertain and adopt the necessary precautions to prevent a collision with the vessel whose lights are so displayed; and when they are extinguished, or burning so dimly as not to fulfill the purpose and object for which they are required, they do not and cannot constitute a compliance with the Act of Congress.

3. The propeller is also in fault, for the reason that the officer in charge of her deck neglected seasonably and effectually to change the course of the vessel, and persistently kept her on her course after he discovered the signal lights of the steamer, rendering it highly probable that it was this error, no less than the former, which contributed to the collision. Many circumstances tend to show that if he had adopted the usual precaution the disaster might have been avoided. Comment upon this proposition is unnecessary, as in its legal aspect it imputes to the propeller a palpable violation of the rules of navigation, and the theory of fact on which it rests is substantially supported by the testimony of all the witnesses on both vessels, and by no one more fully than by the mate of the propeller, who had charge of her deck. He admits that he saw the signal light of the steamer when she was three miles distant, and he expressly states that the propeller was kept precisely on her course, until he saw that the steamer was very near, and then he says he gave the signals to stop and back; and at the same time that he signalled to stop, he told the man at the wheel to put the helm hard a-starboard, and he says the order was obeyed.

Full damages are claimed by the libelants, not only on the ground that the evidence shows that the steamer was without fault, but upon the further ground that the propeller, under the circumstances of this case, is made liable by the 5th section of the Act of the 3d of March, 1849, for all the loss or damage which the steamer sustained. A brief reference, however, to the provision referred to, will show that the construction cannot be supported. Steamboats and propellers navigating the lakes are required by that section to carry a triangular light shaded green on the starboard side, and red on the larboard side, with reflectors, and to be of a size to insure a good and sufficient light; and the owners of such vessels, neglecting to comply with the regulation, are declared liable to the injured party for all loss or damage resulting from such neglect. It is insisted by the libelants that the owners of the propeller, inasmuch as she did not show good and sufficient signal lights, are liable to them in this case, under a proper construction of that provision, for all the damage occasioned to the steamer by the collision. Such is not the language of the section, and we think the construction contended for would be both unwarranted and unreasonable. Owners of the vessels named in that section are made liable for the consequences resulting from their own acts, or from the acts of those intrusted with the control and management of their own vessel, and not for any damage resulting from the misconduct, incompetency, or negligence, of the master or owners of the other vessel. They are made liable for their own neglect, and not for the neglect of the other party. Failure to comply with the regulation, in case a collision ensues, is declared to be a fault, and the offending party is made responsible for all loss or damage resulting from the neglect; but it is not declared by that section, or by any other rule of admiralty law in the jurisprudence of the United States, that the neglect to show signal lights, on the part of one vessel, discharges the other, as they approach, from the obligation to adopt all reasonable and practicable precautions to prevent a collision. Absence of signal lights in cases falling within the Act of Congress renders the vessel liable to the extent already mentioned, but it does not confer any right upon the other vessel to disregard or violate the rules of navigation, or to neglect any reasonable and practicable precaution to avoid a collision, which the circumstances afford the means and opportunity to adopt. Steamers displaying proper signal lights are, in that respect, without fault; but they have other duties to perform to prevent collisions, besides complying with that requirement, and their obligation to perform such other duties remains unaffected by anything contained in the provision under consideration. As an illustration of our views upon the subject, we will suppose the case of two steamers approaching on intersecting lines. They are required by the Act of Congress to show signal lights, in order that each may be seen by the other in time to adopt reasonable and necessary precautions to prevent a disaster like the present; and if one has such lights, and the other has not, yet if the one having such lights actually sees the other vessel as she approaches, in ample season to avoid the collision, and neglects to take any proper precaution to prevent it, and it ensues, it cannot be said in such a case that all the loss or damage resulted from the neglect of the vessel without such lights, as the collision might have been prevented; and but for the negligence or perverseness of those in charge of the vessel showing lights, would never have occurred. We are not prepared to admit that a fair construction of the section referred to would absolve a party, under such circumstances, from pecuniary responsibility. What the judgment of the court would be in the case supposed it is not necessary to decide, and we only advert to it as an illustration, to show that the construction of the Act of Congress contended for cannot be sustained. All we mean to decide is, that the neglect of the propeller to show signal lights did not vary the obligations of The Atlantic to observe the rules of navigation, and to adopt all such reasonable and necessary precautions to prevent the collision, as the circumstances in which she was placed gave her the opportunity to employ.

1. The Atlantic is also chargeable with fault, because the officer in charge of her deck did not exercise proper vigilance to ascertain the character of the approaching vessel after he discovered the white lights, which subsequently proved to be the white lights of the propeller. His excuse, that he supposed she was a sailing vessel, under the circumstances of the case, as shown in the evidence, is not satisfactory. When he first discovered those lights, the two vessels were at least a mile apart; and if it be true, as he states, that they appeared like glimmering stars, we are satisfied, from the evidence, that the distance must have been much greater, as is evident from the character of the night, and from the fact, which is fully proved, that the red light of the steamer was seen on the propeller at the distance of three miles. Those white lights, though not the signal lights required by the Act of Congress, were nevertheless sufficient to apprise the officer on the deck of the steamer that a vessel of some sort was approaching; and if he had performed his duty, the night being calm and the wind light, he might have seasonably ascertained that it was a propeller. They were large globe lamps, such as are usually shown by sail vessels, and were suspended in a similar manner, and the weight of the testimony clearly shows that they were burning brightly; and if so, they would hardly appear like glimmering stars at the distance of a mile, on a smooth sea, when at the same time the usual red lights carried by steamers were plainly visible at three times that distance. Two other persons were in the pilot house with the second mate when he discovered those white lights, one of whom was a master mariner; and although he says they did not hold any conversation, there is much reason to conclude that his estimate of the time he remained there is somewhat short of the fact. Master mariners, as well as other seafaring men, are very apt to converse when they meet on the theater of their favorite pursuit; and the statement that they remained together in the pilot house, even for two minutes, without speaking, needs confirmation.

2. In the second place, The Atlantic is chargeable with fault, because the officer of her deck did not seasonably and effectually change the course of the vessel, or slow or stop her engine, so as to avoid a collision, after he discovered the white lights of the approaching vessel.

Whether his neglect, to adopt those precautions or some one of them, arose from inattention or rashness, is immaterial; as, in either event, it was a culpable omission of duty, plainly required by the rules of navigation in that emergency, and one which the dictate of common prudence, as well as a proper regard for the safety of his passengers, should have prompted him to perform; and the owners of the steamer must answer for the consequences of his negligence. His first order, to port the helm, was not designed to change the course of the vessel to any considerable extent, and only had the effect to open the light of the other vessel half a point.

This is admitted, and so is the more important fact that no other change of course was made until he gave the order hard a-port, which his own testimony shows was at the instant of collision, and not until all reasonable expectation of preventing it was gone. Nothing additional was done to avert the disaster; and the officer of the deck admits that the speed of the steamer was not slackened at any time throughout the entire period that elapsed after he saw the white lights of the approaching vessel.

On this ground, we think the steamer was clearly in fault, and that her owners are responsible for the consequences of the negligence or mismanagement of the officer in charge of the deck.

3. In the third place, The Atlantic was in fault, because she did not have a vigilant and sufficient lookout. No person, either officer or seaman, was assigned to that duty, except the second mate, who also had charge of the deck and the control and management of the vessel. According to his testimony, the officer of the deck was not expected to occupy any one particular place on the vessel; but was sometimes on the top of the promenade deck, either on the larboard or starboard side of the vessel—sometimes in the pilot house, on the hurricane deck—and sometimes on the top of the pilot house; and, in accordance with this practice, the wheelsman of his watch, who was called by the libelants, testifies that he saw him round on the deck, attending to his duties, during all the time he was at the wheel. Steamers navigating in the thoroughfares of commerce must have constant and vigilant lookouts stationed in proper places on the vessel, and charged with the duty for which lookouts are required, and they must be actually employed in the performance of the duty to which they are assigned. To constitute a compliance with the requirements of law, they must be persons of suitable experience, properly stationed on the vessel, and actually and vigilantly employed in the performance of the duty; and for a failure in either of those particulars, the vessel and her owners are responsible.

Lookouts stationed in positions where the view forward or on the side to which they are assigned is obstructed, either by the lights, rigging, or spars of the vessel, do not constitute a compliance with the requirement of the law; and, in general, elevated portions, such as the hurricane deck, are not so favorable situations as those more usually selected on the forward deck, nearer the stem. Persons stationed on the forward deck are less likely to overlook small vessels, deeply laden, and more readily ascertain their exact course and movement. Ocean steamers usually have two lookouts in addition to the officer of the deck, and in general they are stationed one on the larboard and the other on the starboard side of the vessel, as far forward as possible, and during the time they are so engaged they have no other duties to perform; and no reason is perceived why any less precaution should be taken by first-class steamers on the lakes. Their speed is quite as great, and the navigation is no less exposed to the dangers arising from the prevalence of mist and fog, or from the ordinary darkness of the night; and the owners of vessels navigating on those waters are under the same obligations to provide for the safety and security of life and property as attaches to those who are engaged in navigating the seas.

Apply these principles to the present case, and it is obvious that the officer in charge of The Atlantic was not a sufficient lookout. He stood the watch of the master, who was below; and, as the officer of the watch, he had the charge of the deck and the control and management of the vessel; and in the midst of his varied duties it is scarcely possible that he could give his undivided attention to the special duty required of lookouts.

Not long before the white lights of the approaching vessel were discovered, he had occasion to go into the pilot house, to look at the compass; and there is much ground to presume that the disaster is more attributable to that circumstance than any other in the case, except the absence of proper signal lights on the propeller.

We are of the opinion that it is a case of mutual fault, and that the decree of the Circuit Court, apportioning the damages, was correct.

The decree of the Circuit Court, therefore, is affirmed, without costs.

Ward v. Chamberlain, ante, affirmed—right to bring cross libel—practice in.

The appellants in this suit were the libelants in the case of Chamberlain v. Ward, ante, 211, decided at the present term, and the questions to be determined have respect to the same subject matter which was in controversy in that case, and come before the court upon the same pleadings and testimony.

The questions in that case, and the conclusions there stated, and the reasons for them, are applicable to this case and need not be repeated.

Respondents in a pending libel have the right, in a proper case, to institute a cross libel to recover damages against the libelants in the primary suit; but they should file their libel, take out process, and have it served in the usual way.

When that is done, the libelants in the first suit regularly become respondents in the cross libel, and as such, they must answer or stand the consequences of default.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Ohio.

Mr. Justice Clifford delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal in admiralty from a decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Ohio. The appellants in this suit were the libelants in the case of Ward v. Chamberlain et al., decided at the present term, and the questions to be determined have some respect to the same subject-matter which was in controversy in that case, and come before the court upon the same pleadings and testimony. In that case, Ward et al., as owners of the steamer Atlantic, filed their libel in the district court against Chamberlain et al., as owner of the propeller Ogdensburg, to recover the damage sustained by the steamer in a collision which occurred between those vessels on the 20th day of August, 1852, while navigating on the waters of Lake Erie. After the process was served, Chamberlain et al. appeared and filed their answer to the libel. In the answer, after setting up several defenses, they alleged, among other things not necessary to be noticed, that the collision was not occasioned by the negligence, inattention, or want of proper care and skill, on the part of the master or crew of the propeller, but wholly through the fault, neglect, and unskillfulness, of the master and crew of the steamer, and set forth the grounds on which those allegations were based, and prayed that their answer to the libel might also be taken as a cross libel in their behalf against Ward et al., to recover the damage which the propeller sustained by the collision.

On the 26th day of April, 1853, the parties entered into an agreement, which is a part of this record, that the answer of the respondents should operate as a cross libel, and that the claims of both parties should be considered by the court in weighing the evidence, and be adjudicated upon in the final decree. Afterwards, at the final hearing in the district court, on the merits of the case, the libel was dismissed upon the ground that the steamer was wholly in fault; and under the agreement of the parties that the answer should operate as a cross libel, a decree was entered in favor of Chamberlain et al., for the amount of the damage occasioned to the propeller. Ward et al., as owners of The Atlantic, appealed to the circuit court, where the decree of the district court dismissing the libel and awarding damages to the propeller, as upon a cross libel, was in all things reversed. The reversal was made upon the ground that the collision was the result of mutual fault, and that the damages and costs ought to be equally divided. Injuries had been sustained ay the propeller to the amount of $3,000, and the agreed value of the steamer at the time of her loss was $75,000, and accordingly a decree was entered in favor of Ward et al. for the sum of $36,000, together with a moiety of the costs in both courts. From that decree Chamberlain et al. appealed to this court, and the appeal was regularly docketed, and the case has been heard and decided by the court, upon the libel, answer and proofs, as exhibited in the transcript. At the same time Ward et al., the present appellants, also appealed from so much of the decree of the circuit court as found The Atlantic in fault, and directed that the damages should be divided. They appealed to the respondents in the cross libel, and under the agreement before referred to, as sanctioned in the district court, filed a separate copy of the record, and regularly docketed the appeal, as in the case of a cross libel, the answer in the other record constituting the libel in this case.

We have been thus particular in adverting to these proceedings, in order that the relation which the respective parties bear to this controversy, and the state of the pleadings, may be fully and clearly understood, and for the purpose of remarking that they are unusual, and do not meet the approval of this court, and ought not to be drawn into precedent. Respondents in a pending libel have the right, in a proper case, to institute a cross libel to recover damages against the libelants in the primary suit; but they should file their libel, take out process, and have it served in the usual way; and when that is done, the libelants in the first suit regularly become respondents in the cross libel, and, as such, they must answer or stand the consequences of default. Regularity in pleading is both convenient and essential in judicial investigations, and such departures from the usual practice as are exhibited in this record ought not to receive countenance. This appeal was taken, and has been prosecuted upon the ground that the circuit court erred in coming to the conclusion that The Atlantic was in fault. That question we have already considered and decided in the other appeal, and the conclusions there stated, and the reasons for them, are applicable to this case. As before remarked, both appeals were taken from the same decree, and the questions presented for the decision of the court are in all respects the same, and depend upon the same testimony. In that case, the court held that The Atlantic was chargeable with fault upon three grounds:

1. Because the officer in charge of her deck did not exercise proper vigilance to ascertain the character of the approaching vessel, after he discovered the white lights, which subsequently proved to be the white lights of the propeller.

2. That she was also in fault, because the officer of her deck did not seasonably and effectually change the course of the vessel, or slow or stop her engines, after he discovered those lights, so as to prevent a collision.

3. That she was also in fault, because she did not have a vigilant and sufficient lookout.

Our reasons for these conclusions are fully stated in the former case, and need not be repeated. Having already decided that the propeller also was in fault, the necessary result is, that the decision of the Circuit Court was correct.

The decree of the Circuit Court, therefore, is affirmed, without costs.

SELDEN F. WHITE, Plff. in Er.,
v.
THE VERMONT & MASSACHUSETTS RAILROAD COMPANY.

Bonds of railroad company—blanks in, by whom filled—construction of—negotiability.

Bonds of defendant in error were issued by the Company, in regular course and for a sufficient consideration, to a citizen of Massachusetts, and were payable in blank, no payee being inserted, and came into the hands of the plaintiff through several intervening holders, in regular course. Held, that it was the intention of the Company, by issuing the bonds in blank, to make them negotiable and payable to the holder, as bearer, and that the holder might fill up the blank with his own name or make them payable to himself or bearer, or to order.

Until the plaintiff choose to fill up the blank, he is to be regarded as holding the bonds as bearer, and held them in this character till made payable to himself or order. At that time he was a citizen of New Hampshire, and therefore competent to bring the suit in the court below.

Repeated decisions by courts and judges of the highest respectability, have settled the question of the negotiability of this class of securities.

Argued Mar. 8, 1859. Decided Mar. 11, 1859.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Massachusetts.

The history of the case and a sufficient statement of the facts, appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Henry M. Park, for the plaintiff in error:

The first question is, whether these choses in action are, or are not, within the protection of the rule as to negotiable paper laid down in Bank of Kentucky v. Wister, 2 Pet., 318; Smith v. Clapp, 15 Pet., 125; Wood v. Dummer, 3 Mason, 308.

We contend:

1. That they were notes, and negotiable notes.

Morris Canal Co. v. Fisher, 1 Stock. Ch., 667; Mechanics' Bank v. N. Y. & N. H. Ry. Co., 18 N. Y., 599; Carr v. Lefevre, 27 Pa. State, 418; Delafield v. State of Illinois, 2 Hill, 159; Craig v. City of Vicksburg, 31 Miss., 216.

This is but carrying out certain familiar decisions of the English courts in regard to exchequer bills.

Gorgier v. Mieville, 3 B. & C., 45; Wookey v. Pole, 4 B. & Al., 1; Lang v. Smyth, 7 Bing., 284; Redf. on Railw., 595, 596; 1 Pars. Cont., 240.

Following these authorities, we have the right at all events to recover upon the money counts. The instruments sued were payable to bearer. They do not differ from promissory notes of a private individual, payable to his own order, and indorsed in blank before being issued.

Gorgeir v. Mieville, 3 B. & C., 45; Cruchley v. Clarance, 2 M. & S., 90.

2. If these instruments were not originally negotiable, they were so when this action was brought.

Statute of Mass., 1852, ch. 76; 1850, ch. 233; Chapin v. V. & M. R. R. Co., 8 Gray, 575.

3. The fact that these instruments bear the corporate seal of the Company, does not exclude them from being considered promissory notes. The seal is but the evidence of a corporate act. It is the proper evidence of every corporate act, yet it does not make every instrument so attested of necessity a deed. An instrument attested by a corporate seal should be examined before its character can be definitely pronounced upon.

NOTE.—Negotiability of railroad bonds.

Bonds issued by a railroad company and payable in blank, usually secured by a mortgage to trustees are negotiable securities. Mercer County v. Hacket, 68 U. S. (1 Wall.), 83; Gelpcke v. City of Dubuque, 68 U. S. (1 Wall.), 176, 206; Bronson v. La Crosse R. R. Co., 69 U. S. (2 Wall.), 283.

The negotiability of such bonds as are ordinarily issued by municipal, railroad and other corporations, drawn payable to bearer, and intended for sale in the public market, is sustained to a full extent by many adjudications. 64 U.S. (23 How.), 381; Woods v. Lawrence Co., 66 U. S. (1 Black), 386; Moran v. Com'rs of Miami Co., 67 U. S. (2 Black), 722; Mercer Co. v. Hacket, 68 U. S. (1 Wall.), 95; Gelpcke v. City of Dubuque, 68 U. S. (1 Wall.), 175; Van Hostrup v. Madison City, 68 U. S. (1 Wall.), 291; Meyer v. Muscatine, 68 U. S. (1 Wall.), 382; Thomson v. Lee County, 70 U. S. (3 Wall.), 227; Murray v. Lardner, 69 U. S. (2 Wall.), 110; Rogers v. Burlington, 70 U. S. (3 Wall.), 654; Railroad Company v. Howard, 74 U. S. (7 Wall.), 392; Brainerd v. N. Y. & Harlem R. R. Co., 25 N. Y., 496; Conn. Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Cleveland, &c., R. R. Co., 41 Barb 9; 15 Conn., 502; 31 Conn., 342; 20 Ind., 467; 18 Ind., 96; Railway v. Clearlay, 13 Ind., 161; Chapin v. Vt. & Mass. R. R. Co., 8 Gray, 575; Craig v. City of Vicksburg, 31 Miss., 216; Arents v. Commonwealth, 18 Gratt., 338; 11 Wis., 488; 19 Iowa, 213; 16 Ohio St., 145; Nat'l Exch'ge B'k v. Hartford, &c., R. R. Co., 8 R. I., 379; Langston v. S. C. R. R. Co., 2 So. Car. N. S., 248.

No judgment conceding their negotiability has denied the additional feature of their similitude of chattels. City of Memphis v. Brown, 11 Am. L. Reg., 629; 5 Am. L. T. 424; 6 West, Jur., 495.

Bonds of railroad companies and other corporations payble to A, or his assigns, and assigned by A in blank, are transferable by delivery. Brainerd v. N. Y. & Harlem R. R. Co., 10 Bosw., 332.

State bonds and railroad bonds are negotiable securities; the title to which will pass by delivery, and unlike certificates of stock, are valid securities in the hands of bona fide holders against existing equities between the parties. Finnegan v. Lee, 18 How., Pr., 186.

Where in an instrument for the payment of money—railroad bonds—the name of the payee is left blank, with the intention that such instrument may be transferred by delivery, any lawful holder may fill the blank with his own name as payee. Hubbard v. N. Y. & Harlem R. R. Co., 14 Abb. Pr., 275; S. C., 36 Barb., 286.

Thus an answer by a corporation in equity, must be under its seal.

2 Daniels Ch. Pr., 844.

Yet it is not a deed.

See, also, 1 Kyd Corp., 267; Grant, Corp., 55.

4. If it be treated as a deed, then this plaintiff was not an assignee of a contract, but the original obligee. This was the intent of the contract.

5. The same is true of these contracts, whether they be treated as deeds or as notes not payable to the bearer. It is in every respect equivalent to a blank signature, intended to have a note written above it, at the discretion of the person to whom it is delivered.

Texira v. Evans, cited in 1 Anstr., 228; Cruchley v. Clarance, 2 M. & S., 90; Crutchly v. Mann, 5 Taunt., 529; 1 Marsh., 29; Atwood v. Griffin, 2 C. & P., 368.

6. The blank having been purposely left to be filled, we, as bona fide holders, might well fill it.

Story, Prom. N., sec. 37; Bayl. Bills, ch. 1, sec. 10; Cruchley v. Clarance, 2 M. & S., 90; Atwood v. Griffin, 2 C. & P., 268; Ryan & M., 425; 1 Stockton, 693.

7. We submit that it is not admissible for the defendant to show that it issued such obligations in a form which gave no person a right of action upon them. The instrument appears only as filled up. The defendant does not suggest any alteration of its tenor (unless it first admit it to have been payable to bearer), but offers to show that it has committed a fraud upon the public by issuing an instrument which was originally void, and this without any authority in any person whatever to complete it.

Cases already cited.

Mr. Henry C. Hutchins, for defendant in error:

1. The instruments declared upon being under seal, are not promissory notes within the Statute of Anne, and are not, therefore, negotiable; more especially as there was no payee named in them, and no words of negotiability when issued. When transferred to the plaintiff, they were at most choses in action.

Glyn v. Baker, 13 East, 509; Clark v. Farmers' Mf. Co., 15 Wend., 256; Lewis v. Wilson, 5 Blackf., 370; Brown v. Lockhart, 1 Mo., 409, (289); Gorgier v. Mieville, 3 B. & C., 45; Warren v. Lynch, 5 Johns., 239; Higgins v. Bogan, 4 Harr. Del., 30; Parks v. Duke, 2 McCord, 380; Foster v. Floyd, 4 McCord, 159; Barry v. Merchants' Exchange Co., 1 Sandf. Ch., 280; Enthoven v. Hoyle, 13 C. B., 373; Hibblewhite v. M'Morine, 6 M. & W., 200.

The cases cited by the plaintiff in error, and apparently in conflict with the above, are distinguished from the present case in this, that they were all cases where the bonds were payable to bearer, or to a person named or bearer; they were complete contracts.

2. The Act of March 30, 1852, of the Statutes of Massachusetts, does not apply to these bonds.

(a) Because they do not come within its terms. They were not payable to the bearer or some person designated, "bearer," or "order."

Chapin v. V. & M. R. R. Co., 8 Gray., 575; Sup. Ct. of Mass.

(b) Because the plaintiff became the holder of these bonds before the passage of the Act in question.

8. If the Act of March 30, 1852, was held to be applicable, it would impair the obligation of the contract. It would change the defendant's obligation, fram a chose in action to a negotiable instrument, and would be unconstitutional.

Planters' Bank v. Sharp, 6 How., 301; Dundas v. Bowler, 3 McL., 397.

4. The court below had no jurisdiction of this suit.

11th sec. Judicary Act of 1789; 1 U. S. Stat. at L., 79; Sheldon v. Sill, 8 How., 441.

It being admitted by the agreed statement that the bonds in suit were first issued to a citizen of Mass., who could not have brought suit thereon in the court below, the plaintiff cannot maintain this action, because if there was a valid contract made by the defendant with anyone, it must have been with the first taken, and these bonds being unnegotiable, the plaintiff must claim as assignee or not at all.

5. The insertion of the words "Selden F. White," and the words "or order," by the plaintiff, in these bonds, without the knowledge or consent of the defendants, was a material alteration, and vitiated them.

Story, Prom. N., sec. 37; Bruce v. Westcott, 8 Barb., 374; Johnson v. Bank U. S., 2 B. Mon., 310; Knill v. Williams, 10 East, 431.

6 In the case of a bond, there is no presumed authority in the holder to insert his own name as payee and bring suit. To allow it, would be to change the very character of the instrument.

Enthoven v. Hoyle, 13 C. B., 378; Hibblewhite v. M'Morine, 6 M. & W., 200.

7. If this plaintiff, having derived title to these bonds from a citizen of Mass., could fill up the blanks with his own name and bring his action in the court below by virtue of the Statute of Mass., when but for that Act he could not bring such action, it would follow that the Legislature of Mass. can enlarge the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States.

Dromgoole v. Bank, 2 How., 241.

Mr. Justice Nelson delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a writ of error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Massachusetts.

The suit was brought in the court below by the plaintiff (White) against the Company, upon several bonds issued by the same.

The case was presented to the court upon an agreed state of facts, and, among others, that the bonds in question were issued by the Company, in regular course, and for a sufficient consideration; and that payment had been demanded and refused. Coupons for the accruing interest, previous to the maturity of the bonds, had been duly paid.

It was further agreed that bonds of this description, issued by the Company, were sold in the market, and passed from hand to hand by delivery, at prices varying according to the state of the market; and that those in question were issued at or about their date, to a person a citizen of Massachusetts, and were payable in blank, no payee being inserted; that they came into the hands of the plaintiff through several intervening holders, in regular course; and that he then and since lived in the State of New Hampshire, and, before this suit was brought, filled up the blank by inserting "Selden F. White, or order," the name of plaintiff, without the knowledge or consent of the defendants.

The court ruled that the suit could not be sustained, for want of jurisdiction.

The ground upon which this ruling below is sought to be maintained is, that these bonds were issued to citizens of Massachusetts; and as they could not be regarded as negotiable instruments, or, if negotiable, not payable to bearer, the plaintiff was disabled from suing in the federal court, within the prohibition of the 11th section of the Judiciary Act. 15 Pet., 125; 2 Pet., 318; 3 How., 574. 8 How., 441.

In answer to this ground, we think it quite clear, on looking into the agreed state of facts, in connection with the bonds and the mortgage given to secure their payment, that it was the intention of the Company, by issuing the bonds in blank, to make them negotiable, and payable to the holder, as bearer, and that the holder might fill up the blank with his own name, or make them payable to himself or bearer, or to order. In other words, the Company intended, by the blank, to leave the holder his option as to the form or character of negotiability, without restriction. If the utmost latitude, in this respect, was not intended, why leave the payee in blank when issuing the bonds, or why not fix the limit of negotiability, or negative it altogether? To adopt any other conclusion would seem to us to be unjust to the Company, for then the blank would be wholly unmeaning; or if any, a meaning calculated, if not intended, to embarrass the title of the holder.

Assuming, then, that these bonds were intended to be made negotiable, we do not see the difficulty suggested in maintaining the suit in the federal court; for, until the plaintiff choose to fill up the blank, he is to be regarded as holding the bonds as bearer, and held them in this character till made payable to himself or order. At that time he was a citizen of New Hampshire and, therefore, competent to bring the suit in the court below.

As to the negotiability of this class of securities, when shown to be intended that they should possess this character by the form in which issued, and mode of giving them circulation, we think the usuage and practice of the companies themselves, and of the capitalists and business men of the country, dealing in them, as well as the repeated decisions or recognition of the principle by courts and judges of the highest respectability, have settled the question.

Morris Canal, etc., Co. v. Fisher, 1 Stockton, 667, 699; Delafield v. Illinois, 2 Hill, N. Y., 177; 8 S. C., Paige Ch., 527; Mech. Bank v. N. Y. and N. H. R. R. Co., 13 N. Y., 625; Carr v. Le Fevre, 27 Penn., 418; Craig v. The City of Vicksburg, 31 Miss., 216; Chapin v. The Vt. and Mass. R. R. Co., 8 Gray, 575, decided Sept. 7, 1857, in Sup. Ct. of Mass.

Indeed, without conceding to them the quality of negotiability, much of the value of these securities in the market, and as a means of furnishing the funds for the accomplishment of many of the greatest and most useful enterprises of the day, would be impaired. Within the last few years, large masses of them have gone into general circulation, and in which capitalists have invested their money; and it is not too much to say, that a great share of the confidence they have acquired, as a desirable security for investment, is attributable to this negotiable quality, as well on account of the facility of passing from hand to hand, as the protection afforded to the bona fide holder.

It is true that in England the law is, that a bond delivered in blank, as it respects the payee, is void, and the blank incapable of being filled up by the holder, either upon an implied or express parol authority from the maker. This is maintained upon the principle that the authority of an agent to make a deed for another must be by deed; and also, that to admit the parol authority to fill up the blank would, in effect, make a bond transferable and negotiable, like a bill of exchange or exchequer bill. Hibblewhite v. M'Morine, 6 Mees. & W., p. 200, and Enthoven v. Hoyle et al., in the Exch., 9 Eng. L. & Eq., 434.

The law had been otherwise held by Lord Mansfield, in the case of Tezira v. Evans, cited in Masten v. Miller, 1 Anst., 228; but was distinctly overruled by Park, B., in delivering the opinion of the court in the case first above cited, and the opinion re-affirmed by him still more strongly in the second case.

Courts of the highest authority in this country have followed Lord Mansfield, and have not hesitated to meet the fears expressed by Park, B. (that the effect would be to make bonds negotiable), by admitting the consequence. Chief Justice Marshall, in the case of The United States v. Nelson & Myers, 2 Brock., 64, hesitated to reach this conclusion, but expressed a strong belief that, at some future day it would be, by this court.

We think, for the reasons above given, the ruling of the court below cannot be upheld, and that the judgment should be reversed, with a venire de novo.

v.

JONATHAN B. H. SMITH.

(See S. C., 21 How., 579–582.)

Virginia land-warrants—proprietor of, who is —superior equity of a claimant.

The Act of Congress of 3d March, 1835, made a further and apparently final appropriation of lands, to be applied to the satisfaction of Virginia military land-warrants.

This appropriation was sufficient to pay ninety per cent. of the warrants received.

Thus the matter stood for fourteen years, when at length, on the 31st of August, 1852, Congress passed an Act, which authorized an issue of land scrip in favor of the present proprietors of any outstanding military land-warrants, &c. This Act has been construed to include not only unsatisfied warrants, but the ten per cent. not given on the satisfied and surrendered warrants.

The question as to who may be considered as the "present proprietor" of these surrendered and satisfied warrants must be decided by the Secretary of the Interior in the first instance, by the rules, customs, and practice of the Land Office.

Where the defendant, assignee or grantee of the unsatisfied ten per cent. of a quantity of said warrants, had paid a large and valuable consideration without any notice of plaintiff's claim, had made his proofs and had the decisions of the Land Office in his favor; held that he had obtained an advantage of which a court of equity would not deprive him, under the circumstances.

Argued Mar. 1, 1859. Decided Mar. 11, 1859.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Columbia.

The bill in this case was filed in the court below, by the appellant, praying an injunction to prevent the issuing from the General Land Office, to the appellee, of certain scrip; and for the cancellation of a certain assignment, under which the appellee had, by that office, been adjudged entitled to the scrip in question.

The court below having entered a decree dismissing the bill, with costs, the complainant took an appeal to this court.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Chilton & Davidge, for appellant:

The appellant was, at the passage of the Act of August 31, 1852, the "present proprietor" of the warrants, and as such, by the very terms of the law, entitled to receive the unpaid 10 per cent. He held by a legal title warrant, assignable under the laws both of Virginia and the United States. The language of the Act Act manifestly relates to legal ownership.

Assuming, however, that as regards a legislative grant of this description there can be no inquiry beyond the plain terms of the grant, and that in any case the defense of bona fide purchaser for valuable consideration without notice, could be set up, that defense cannot avail the appellee.

I. Because the appellant holds the legal title and asks relief upon it, and in such case equity follows the law.

Williams v. Lambe, 3 Bro. Ch., 264; Collins v. Archer, 1 Rus. & M., 284, 292; Rogers v. Seale, Freem., 84; Shirras v. Caig, 7 Cranch, 34; Snelgrove v. Snelgrove, 4 Desaus, 288; Fitzsimmons v. Ogden, 7 Cranch, 2.

II. Because the appellant cliams under a prior assignment, and, the appellee not having legal title, qui prior in tempore, potior est in jure.

1 Story Eq. Jur., sec. 64, C. and D.

3. Because the appellee has no title whatever.

Hallett v. Collins, 10 How., 174.

III. The decision below was on the ground that the appellant lost his superior equity, by his failure to file his assignment in the General Land Office, where search was made by the ancestor of the appellee, and the case of Judson v. Corcoran, 17 How., 612, was considered in point.

The Circuit Court erred.

1. There is here no conflict of equitable titles. The appellant holds by as complete a legal title as he could hold stock or negotiable paper.

Baldwin v. Ely, 9 How., 580.

2. Because the subject matter of this controversy is not a chose in action, but an interest or estate in land The English doctrine that notice to the debtor or trustee holding the fund, is necessary to complete the transfer of a chose in action (Row v. Dawson, Ryall v. Rowles, 2 White & Tudor's Lead. Cas. Eq., 731–734, and notes; Dearle v. Hall, and Loveridge v. Cooper, 3 Russ., 1) has never been applied to equitable interests or estates in land.

Jones v. Jones, 8 Sim. 633; Wilmot v. Pike, 5 Hare, 14; Peacock v. Burt, Coot. Mort., 569, Wiltshire v. Rabbits, 14 Sim., 76.

The American doctrine certainly is, that no such notice is necessary, although proper, to secure the fund by preventing payment to a second assignee in ignorance of the prior assignment.

Muir v. Schenck, 3 Hill, 228; U. S. v. Vaughan, 3 Binn., 394; Stevens v. Stevens, 1 Ashm., 190; Bholen v. Cleveland, 5 Mas., 174; Warren v. Copelin, 4 Met., 594; Dix v. Cobb. 4 Mass., 512; Wood v. Partridge, 11 Mass., 488; Littlefield v. Smith, 17 Me., 327; Story, Confl. L., sec. 396.

3. Even assuming that the principles relating to the assignment of choses in action apply here the general rule still is, qui prior in tempore, potior est in jure, unless the first assignee has been guilty of laches, whereby he has enabled the assignor to practice a fraud on the assignee.

Judson v. Corcoran, 17 How., 612.

To bring the case within the exception to the general rule, there must be fraud or gross negligence on the part of the first assignee and diligence on the part of the second assignee.

The neglect relied on here, is the failure to file in the General Land Office. The diligence is inquiry there.

Counsel reviewed the circumstances of the case, and contended that appellant was not to be held to have lost his priority, by a failure to file his assignment until a few months after the second assignment.

IV. The appellee did not obtain the legal title by the letter of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, of August 3, 1854.

1. Because the Secretary of the Interior, much less a subordinate unknown to the law, had not jurisdiction inter partes.

Comegys v. Vasse, 1 Pet., 193.

2. Because the Secretary of the Interior did not act in the premises.

3. Because the letter of the Commissioner clearly shows that even his action was not final.

V. As to the consideration of the assignment to appellant, the answer by appellee denies any real consideration on information only, not even belief. A replication was filed, but no evidence offered by the appellee:

Messrs. George E. Badger and J. M. Carlisle, for appellee:

1. As the alleged assignment to the appellant, the answer impeaches it in form and substance, and particularly denies that it was founded on any consideration whatever. The answer is responsive to the bill, and is evidence against the appellant.

2. The warrants were satisfied, surrendered and canceled by the voluntary act of the holders.

3. The case is within the principles of Judson v. Corcoran, 17 How., 612. The points decided there are in support of the appellee in this cause, and support the correctness of the decree below.

1st. The assignment to the appellee "was fair and accepted on his part, without knowledge" of the prior assignment, if any, to the appellant.

2d. The appellee had, in effect, drawn to his equity a legal title.

3d. The prior assignment, if any, to the appellant, "operated as a latent and lurking transaction, calculated to circumvent subsequent assignees, and such would be its effect upon the appellee, was priority accredited to it."

4. If the decision of the Land Office did not give to the appellee a "legal advantage," the facts referred to constitute an "equitable advantage," giving him "a superior claim to the legal title;" and even if the appellant have an equity prior in time, the doctrine of Corcoran v. Judson is, that under such circumstances he shall not be aided to prevail

5. There is no evidence whatever that there was any real consideration paid for the assignment on which the bill is founded.

Mr. Justice Grier delivered the opinion of the court:

The purpose of this bill is to obtain an injunction to prevent the issuing of certain scrip to appellee by the Land Office, and to have canceled the assignment under which the appellee had, by the officers of Government, been adjudged entitled to the scrip.

This bill was properly dismissed by the court below, as a brief statement of the case will show. The Act of Congress of 3d March, 1835, made a further and apparently final appropriation of six hundred and fifty thousand acres, to be applied to the satisfaction of Virginia military land-warrants. It provided that "no scrip should be issued thereon until the 1st of September following, and that warrants should be received in the General Land Office till that day; and immediately thereafter, if the amount filed exceeded six hundred and fifty thousand acres, the Commissioner of the Land Office should apportion the said six hundred and fifty thousand among the warrants which shall then be on file, in full satisfaction thereof."

This appropriation was sufficient to pay ninety per cent. of the warrants received.

William S. Scott, as attorney for the heirs of General Charles Lee, filed a warrant in their names for fifteen thousand acres; which was surrendered and satisfied by the issue of land-scrip for thirteen thousand five hundred acres, being ten per cent., or one thousand five hundred acres less than the whole amount called for on the face of the warrants.

The warrants were, therefore, fully satisfied; and being surrendered, were no longer evidence of any right of property. But it seems that, notwithstanding this surrender and satisfaction, there was a sort of lingering hope or expectation that sometime hereafter, Congress, by continued importunity, might be prevailed upon to make some further grant of land to satisfy the shadow of equity which was supposed to remain, after the warrantees had surrendered their warrants and accepted the satisfaction tendered.

On the 30th March, 1837, Scott signed an instrument in form of a power of attorney, which, after reciting that he had sold to Walker, the complainant, the warrants, and delivered him the scrip issued in lieu thereof, stated as follows: "Now, the object of this power of attorney is to secure the said Walker the said ten per cent. of warrants unsatisfied, or any and every equivalent that may be at any time given in lieu thereof," &c.

On the 18th of January, 1838, Scott conveys by indenture, in consideration of $750, and with warranty, the Lee warrants, on which he alleges there is "still due one thousand five hundred acres" to defendant. At this time the records of the Land Office contained no evidence of the prior assignment (if such it can be called) to Walker; and a clerk in the office indorsed on the respondent's deed as follows: "William S. Scott, the party grantor of the within, has full authority on file to sell the warrants and appoint a substitute; and in the event Congress makes up the ten per cent., the scrip to be issued will be delivered to Mr. Smith."

Thus the matter stood for fourteen years, when, at length, on the 31st of August, 1852, Congress passed an Act, which authorized an issue of land-scrip in favor of the present proprietors of any outstanding military land-warrants, &c. This scrip is to be issued by the Secretary of the Interior, who is to make the necessary inquiries, and "be satisfied by a revision of the proof, or by additional testimony," &c.

It seems that this Act has been construed to include not only unsatisfied warrants, but the ten per cent. not given on the satisfied and surrendered warrants. It is a liberal construction of the statute, and so far as it extends to the scrip in question, it is a simple gratuity. The Secretary is made the agent for its distribution. It is his duty to ascertain the parties entitled to it, if any person can be said to have a title to a gift before it is received. When he issues the scrip it then becomes a "chose in action," capable of being dealt with as property by courts of justice, but not till then. The question, as to who may be considered as the "present proprietor" of these surrendered and satisfied warrants, must be decided by him in the first instance by the rules, customs and practice of the Land Office. Before the Act of Congress, this right was too subtile (being no more than the remote expectation of a gift) to be dealt with by courts, and the Act of Congress has not conferred on them the distribution of their bounty. Besides, if an injunction was issued to hinder the defendant from receiving the scrip which the Land Office has concluded to give him, this would confer no title on the complainant.

Whether, after the Land Office have issued the scrip to a claimant, another person alleging fraud or misrepresentation, and claiming himself to be the "proprietor" intended by the Act, might not obtain the interference of the courts to obtain a transfer of the scrip to himself, is a question not presented in this case.

But assuming that the court would undertake to decide as to the respective rights of these claimants, treating their claims as tangible equities, the complainant has not made out such a case as would entitle him to relief. His power of attorney (or whatever it may be called) mentions no consideration paid. The answer of defendant, which is responsive to the bill (which avers a purchase at market price), denies the payment of any consideration whatever, and none has been proved.

The defendant has paid a large and valuable consideration without any notice of the plaintiff's claim, has made his proofs, has had the decision of the Land Office in his favor. He has obtained an advantage of which a court of equity will not deprive him, under the circumstances.

The judgment of the court below is affirmed, with costs.

HIRAM BARBER, Appt.,

v.

HULDAH A. BARBER, by her Next Friend, GEORGE CRONKHITE.

(See S. C., 21 How., 582-605.)

Courts of U. S. have no jurisdiction of divorce or alimony—decree of state court for same, binding—decree of one State has full force in another—jurisdiction of U. S. courts over—separate domicil of wife—may sue husband for alimony—husband's change of domicil—where suable.

This court disclaims altogether any jurisdiction in the courts of the United States upon the subject of divorce, or for the allowance of alimony.

The parties to a cause for a divorce and for alimony are bound by a decree for both, which has been given by a state court having jurisdiction of the subject-matter and over the parties.

Such a judgment or decree, rendered in any State of the United States, the court having jurisdiction, will be carried into judgment in any other State, to have there the same binding force that it has in the State in which it was originally given.

For such a purpose, both the equity courts of the United States and the equity courts of the States, have jurisdiction.

Where the wife is plaintiff in a divorce suit, she is entitled to a separate domicil.

So when parties are already living under a judicial separation, the domicil of the wife does not follow that of the husband.

A wife, under a judicial sentence of separation from bed and board, is entitled to make a domicil for herself, different from that of her husband.

And she may, by her next friend, sue her husband for alimony, which he had been decreed to pay as an incident to such divorce, or when it has been given after such a decree by a supplemental bill.

Her right to pursue her remedy in the equity side of the District Court of the United States in the State of Wisconsin is undoubted.

Where the husband, after the decree of separation was given, left his domicil in New York for another in the State of Wisconsin, in which he says that he has acquired a domicil; held, that his voluntary change of domicil from New York to Wisconsin makes him suable there.

Argued Jan. 19, 1859. Decided Mar. 11, 1859.

APPEAL from the District Court of the United States for the District of Wisconsin.

The bill in this case was filed in the court below, by the appellee, on a foreign judgment for alimony. The court below having entered a decree in favor of the complainant, for $5,936.80, with costs, the defendant took an appeal to this court.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. C. Billinghurst and J. R. Doolittle, for appellant:

1. Husband and wife, although allowed to live separately under a decree of separation a mensa et thoro, made by a state court having competent jurisdiction, are still so far one person while the marriage relation continues to exist, that they cannot become at the same time citizens of different States, within the meaning of the Federal Constitution; and therefore, the court below, upon the plaintiff's own ground, had no jurisdiction.

Warrender v. Warrender, 9 Bligh., 103; Dougherty v. Snyder, 15 S. & R., 90; Phillim. Dom., p. 27; Story, Confl. L., sec. 46; Harrison v. Harrison, 20 Ala., 629; 6 Pa. State, 452; 6 Watts & S., 87.

2. The case presented by this bill is not such a one as a court of equity, in the State of Wisconsin, can take cognizance of, either by virtue of any statute conferring equity jurisdiction, or as coming within its original equity jurisdiction. It is not for a divorce; it is not for alimony; it is not in the nature of a creditor's bill; and if it were, it does not show that execution issued upon the decree in New York, or that any other means were resorted to to enforce it there. Nor is it for any other cause, of which equity will take original jurisdiction.

1 Story, Eq., ch. 3; Bish., Mar. & Div., sec. 553, 554; 2 Story, Eq., 1425, note 2; Stones v. Cooke, 7 Sim., 22; 8 Sim., 321; Pennington v. Gibson, 16 How., 79.

3. The whole subject of divorce and alimony was exclusively of ecclesiastical jurisdiction, at the time of the adoption of the Constitution of the United States; therefore, the whole subject of divorce and alimony is, by the Constitution of the United States, placed beyond the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States.

4. The decree of the Circuit Court in Wisconsin, upon the bill filed by the plaintiff in error dissolving the marriage, is valid and effectual in that State.

Manley v. Manley, 4 Chand., 96; Hubbell v. Hubbell, 8 Wis., 662; Gleason v. Gleason, 4 Wis., 64.

This is true, both in the courts of the State and of the United States for that district.

10 How., 98; Harding v. Alden, 9 Me., 140.

It follows that if the marriage relation has been dissolved, the plaintiff should have sued in her own name and not by her next friend; and also, that whatever claim the plaintiff may have had, at law or in equity, against the appellant for alimony, it ceased from and after the decree dissolving the marriage relation. The plaintiff should only be entitled to recover up to the date of the decree.

20 Ala., 649.

Mr. James S. Brown, for appellee.

Mr. Justice Wayne delivered the opinion of the court:

We regard this as a suit for a wife brought on the equity side of the District Court of the United States for the District of Wisconsin, by her next friend, George Cronkhite, a citizen of the State of New York, against Hiram Barber, a citizen of the State of Wisconsin, to give the same validity to a judgment in that State which it has in the State of New York against the defendant for the payment of alimony to his wife, who has been divorced from him a mensa et thoro, with an allowance of alimony by a court, which had, when the decree was made, jurisdiction over the parties and the subject matter.

We shall not have occasion to comment upon the relations of husband and wife in her uninterrupted coverture, nor will we discuss the general rights, obligations or disabilities of either, when they have been separated by a divorce a mensa et thoro.

Our first remark is—and we wish it to be remembered—that this is not a suit asking the court for the allowance of alimony. That has been done by a court of competent jurisdiction. The court of Wisconsin was asked to interfere to prevent that decree from being defeated by fraud.

We disclaim altogether any jurisdiction in the courts of the United States upon the subject of divorce, or for the allowance of alimony, either as an original proceeding in chancery or as an incident to divorce a vinculo, or to one from bed and board.

The record raises these inquiries: Whether a wife divorced a mensa et thoro can acquire another domicilation in a State of this Union different from that of her husband, to entitle her, by her next friend, to sue him in a court of the United States having equity jurisdiction, to recover from him alimony due, and which he refuses to make any arrangement to pay; and whether a court of equity is not a proper tribunal for a remedy in such a case.

We will first direct our attention to the circumstances of the case, and will give them from the bill and answer, and from the testimony in the record.

Hiram Barber and Huldah Adeline Barber were married in the State of New York in the year 1840, where his domicil then was, and continued to be until he left it for Wisconsin, which was soon after a decree had been given for a divorce a mensa et thoro between them, with an allowance of alimony to be paid by him. Her application for such a divorce was made by Cronkhite, her next friend, in the Court of Chancery for the Fourth District of the State of New York, that court having jurisdiction of the subject matter and over the parties.

The defendant appeared and resisted the application. The cause was heard on the pleadings and proofs. It resulted in a declaration by the Chancellor that the defendant had been guilty of cruel and inhuman treatment of his wife, and of such conduct towards her as to render it unsafe and improper for her to cohabit with him; and that he had abandoned, neglected, and refused to provide for her. And it therefore decreed that the complainant and defendant be separated from bed and board forever; provided, however, that they might at any time thereafter, by their joint petition, apply to the court to have the decree modified or discharged; and that neither of the said parties shall be at liberty to marry any other person during the lifetime of the other party. The court then referred the cause to a master, to ascertain and report what should be allowed and to be paid by the defendant, or out of his estate, to Mrs. Barber, for her suitable support and maintenance. In pursuance of this decretal order and reference, the master made a report. The defendant filed exceptions to it. The cause was regularly brought to a hearing upon the defendant's exceptions. They were overruled, and a final decree was made in the cause. The language of the decree is, that the exceptions are overruled, and that the report of the master is absolutely confirmed. That for the suitable support and maintenance of Mrs. Barber, there should be allowed and paid to her by the defendant, or out of his estate, in quarterly installments, the annual sum of $360 in each and every year; and that as it appeared he had not given to her any support in the interval between the filing of the bill in her behalf and the rendition of the decree, that the defendant should pay to her $360 a year in quarterly payments from the 1st day of July, 1844, that being the day when the bill was filed; and it was decreed that the sum of $960, being the alimony retrospectively due, should be paid forthwith by the defendant, and that the complainant should have execution therefor. It was further ordered, that the permanent alimony allowed and to become due after the 1st of March, 1847, to which day alimony is above computed, should be paid by the defendant in quarterly payments on the 1st days of March, June, September and December, in each year, during the life of Mrs. Barber; and in case of its not being so paid, that the quarterly payments should bear interest as they respectively became due, and that execution might issue therefor toties quoties. The court then decreed that the permanent alimony allowed to Mrs. Barber was vested in her for her own and separate use, and as her own and separate estate, with full power to invest the same in a trustee or trustees, as she might think proper to appoint, with the power to dispose of the same by will or otherwise, from time to time during her life, or at her death, or either, as she may think proper, free from any control, claim or interposition of the defendant. The said decree, with a tax bill of costs in the suit, was signed and enrolled according to the form of the Statute in such cases made and provided in the State of New York.

It is upon a transcript of all the papers in that suit, authenticated as the law requires it to be done, that the suit now before us was brought in the District Court of the United States for the District of Wisconsin.

The complainants aver in their bill that they are citizens of the State of New York, and that the defendant is a citizen of the State of Wisconsin. They then set out the proceedings of the court of New York, divorcing Mr. and Mrs. Barber from bed and board, with especial reference to the decree and the entire record of that suit, charging the defendant with not having paid any part of the alimony adjudged to Mrs. Barber; and that there was then due to her on that account the sum of $4,242.15, with interest at seven per cent., that being the legal rate in the State of New York. The rest of the bill it is not necessary to state more particularly, than that it is a recital of a suit which had been brought upon the common law side of the District Court of the United States for the County of Milwaukee, in the Territory of Wisconsin, for the amount of alimony due by the defendant; to the declaration in which he filed a demurrer, upon which a judgment was rendered in his favor, which was afterwards affirmed in the Supreme Court of the State, for the reason that the remedy for the recovery of alimony was in a court of chancery, and not at law. To this bill also the defendant demurred, on account of the case not being within the ordinary jurisdiction of a court of chancery, that the relief sought could only be had in the Court of Chancery in the State of New York, and that it did not appear that the complainants had exhausted the remedy which they had in New York. This demurrer was overruled, and the defendant was ordered to answer. He did so. He admits in his answer the legality and locality of his marriage with Mrs. Barber; the jurisdiction of the court in the divorce case; that a divorce had been decreed between them from bed and board, after contestation; and that by that decree he was subject to the payment of alimony to the extent and in the way it is claimed in the bill he was then answering. He admits that he left the State of New York without having paid any part of it, or having made any arrangement to do so; alleging, however, that he had left real estate in New York, upon which no proceedings had been taken to make it liable to the decree against him for alimony. And he then goes on to state, that on the 19th day of April, 1852, he had filed his bill in the Circuit Court of the County of Dodge, in the State of Wisconsin, against Mrs. Barber, she then being his wife, to obtain a dissolution of the marriage contract between them, and that their marriage had been dissolved by a decree of that court, which is on record in the same. And he adds, that his wife by that decree became a feme sole; and being so, she could not sue by her next friend, and that her remedy was in a court of law. To this answer a general replication was filed. The cause was carried to a hearing upon the pleadings and proofs, and a decree was made, adjudging that $5,936.80 is due from the defendant upon the alimony sued for, for principal and interest, to and prior to the time of filing the bill in this cause, and that the defendant should pay it, for for the sole and separate support and maintenance of Mrs. Barber, together with the costs, to be taxed within ten days; and in default thereof, that execution should issue for the same.

It appears, from the testimony in the cause, that the defendant left the State of New York in a short time after the decree for the divorce and for alimony had been rendered, for the purpose of placing himself beyond the jurisdiction of the court which could enforce it, without having paid any part of the alimony due, or leaving any estate of any kind out of which it could be paid; for he gave no proof of any kind that he had real estate in the State of New York in support of that allegation in his answer.

It also appears, from the record, that the defendant had made his application to the court in Wisconsin for a divorce a vinculo from Mrs. Barber, without having disclosed to that court any of the circumstances of the divorce case in New York; and that, contrary to the truth, verified by that record, he asks for the divorce on account of his wife having willfully abandoned him. It is not necessary for us to pass any opinion upon the legality of the decree, or upon its operation there or elsewhere to dissolve the vinculum of the marriage between the defendant and Mrs. Barber. It certainly has no effect to release the defendant there and everywhere else from his liability to the decree made against him in the State of New York, upon that decree being carried into judgment in a court of another State of this Union, or in a court of the United States, where the defendant may be found, or where he may have acquired a new domicil different from that which he had in New York when the decree was made there against him.

The questions made by the bill and the answer, and by the arguments of counsel, we will state in the form of an inquiry. They are as follows: whether a wife divorced a mensa et thoro may not have a domiciliation in a State of this Union different from that of her husband in another State, to enable her to sue him there by her next friend, in equity, in a court of the United States, to carry into judgment a decree which has been made against him for alimony by a court having jurisdiction of the parties and the subject-matter of divorce.

In the consideration of these questions, we must not not allow ourselves to be misled by the general rule which prevails in England, that a suit cannot be maintained at law by a feme covert, and that, nothwistanding a divorce a mensa et thoro, a wife cannot sue or be sued in a court of law; for in England she may in several cases maintain a suit in her own name as a feme sole, both at law and in equity. They are exceptions to the general rule, or privileged cases, under certain circumstances, where it cannot be presumed, from his own acts, that the husband's control of his wife is continued, and where she has been deprived of his protection to represent with her her rights and interests in a suit at law, or in one in equity. The cases mentioned in the books where a feme covert may sue as a feme sole are: when her husband is banished, or has abjured the realm, or has been transported for felony; where the husband is an alien enemy, and his wife is domiciled in the realm; where the husband is an alien domiciled abroad, and has never been in the realm; or where he has voluntarily abandoned her, and is under a disability to return; so where the husband has deserted the wife in a foreign country, and she goes to England and maintains herself as a feme sole; where the husband in a foreign State, compels his wife to leave him for another political jurisdiction, and she maintains herself there as a feme sole.

Cases have been decided in Massachusetts in conformity with the English cases. There are cases in England which have gone much further, but we do not cite them, preferring only to mention such instances as have not been questioned by subsequent cases in England or in the United States. See Sto. Eq. Pl., 6th ed., sec. 61, pp. 59, 60, and the cases cited in the notes.

Except in such cases, a feme covert cannot sue at law, unless it be jointly with her husband, for she is deemed to be under the protection of her husband, and a suit respecting her rights must be with the assent and co-operation of her husband. Mitf. Eq. Pl., by Jeremy, 28; Ed. Par. in Eq., 144, 153; Calvert on Parties, ch. 3, sec. 21, pp. 265, 274.

In the case of Bein v. Heath, 6 How., 228, this court said, without any reference to the law of Louisiana: "That the general rule was, when the wife complains of her husband, and asks relief against him, she must use the name of some other person in prosecuting the suit; but where the acts of the husband are not complained of, he would seem to be the most suitable person to unite with her in the suit. This is a matter of practice within the discretion of the court. It is sanctioned in Story's Equity Pleading, and by Fonblanque. The modern practice in England has adopted a different course, by uniting the name of the wife with a person other than her husband, in certain cases."

There are also exceptions in equity, which are wholly unknown at law. Thus, if a married woman claims some right in opposition to the rights claimed by the husband, and it becomes proper to vindicate her rights against her husband, she cannot maintain a suit against him at law; but in equity she may do so, and against all others who may be proper or necessary parties. But it must be done under the protection of some other person who acts as her next friend, and the bill is accordingly exhibited in her name by such next friend. Sto. Eq. Pl., 6th ed., sec. 61, p. 61. It is also said, in the same work, to be our constant experience, that the husband may sue the wife, or the wife the husband, in equity, notwithstanding neither of them can sue the other at law. Cannel v. Buckle, 2 P. Wms., 243, 244; Ex parte Strangeways, 3 Ark., 478; Fonblanque Eq., B. 1., ch. 2, sec. 6, note N; Brooks v. Brooks, Finch, Pre. Ch., 24; Mitf. Pl., by Jeremy, 28. These citations have been made to show the large jurisdiction which a court of equity has to secure the rights of married women, when it may be necessary to exert it with the assistance of the husband, or when he improperly interferes with them, so as to make it necessary for the wife to defend herself against his unwarranted claims to her property. The result of that jurisdiction now is, that the wife may, in all such instances, sue her husband by her next friend.

There is, too, another ground of jurisdiction in equity, just as certainly established as that is of which we have just spoken. It comprehends the case before us. It is, that courts of equity will interfere to compel the payment of alimony which has been decreed to a wife by the ecclesiastical court in England.

Such a jurisdiction is ancient there, and the principal reason for its exercise is equally applicable to the courts of equity in the United States. It is, that when a court of competent jurisdiction over the subject-matter and the parties, decrees a divorce, and alimony to the wife as its incident, and is unable of itself to enforce the decree summarily upon the husband, that courts of equity will interfere to prevent the decree from being defeated by fraud. The interference, however, is limited to cases in which alimony has been decreed; then only to the extent of what is due, and always to cases in which no appeal is pending from the decree for the divorce or for alimony. Shaftoe v. Shaftoe, 7 Ves., 171; Dawson v. Dawson, 7 Ves., 173; Haffey v. Haffey, 14 Ves., 261; Angier v. Angier, Finch., Pre. Ch., 497; Cooper's Eq. Pl., ch. 3, pp. 149, 150; Coglar v. Coglar, 1 Ves., Jr., 94; Street v. Street, 1 Turn. & Russ., 322.

The parties to a cause for a divorce and for alimony are as much bound by a decree for both, which has been given by one of our state courts having jurisdiction of the subject-matter and over the parties, as the same parties would be if the decree had been given in the Ecclesiastical Court of England. The decree in both is a judgment of record, and will be received as such by other courts. And such a judgment or decree, rendered in any State of the United States, the court having jurisdiction, will be carried into judgment in any other State, to have there the same binding force that it has in the State in which it was originally given. For such a purpose, both the Equity Courts of the United States and the same courts of the States have jurisdiction.

We observe, in confirmation of what has just been said, that the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States is derived from the Constitution, and from legislation in conformity to it. The first limitation by the latter upon the jurisdiction of the Equity Courts of the United States is, that no suit can be sustained in them, where a plain, adequate, and complete remedy may be had at law. The court has said: "It is not enough that there is a remedy at law; it must be plain and adequate, or in other words, as practical and efficacious to the ends of justice, and its prompt administration, as the remedy in equity. Boyce's Ex'r v. Grundy, 3 Pet., 210; United States v. Howland, 4 Wheat., 108; Osborn v. United States Bank, 9 Wheat., 841, 842. It is no objection to equity jurisdiction in the courts of the United States, that there is a remedy under the local law, for the equity jurisdiction of the federal courts is the same in all of the States, and is not affected by the existence or non-existence of an equity jurisdiction in the state tribunals. It is the same in nature and extent as the jurisdiction of England, whence it is derived." Livingston v. Story, 9 Pet., 632. Such a suit for the enforcement of a decree for alimony, as that before us, is not an exception, unless the court has not jurisdiction over the parties, and the amount be not such as is required to bring it into this court by appeal.

We proceed to show that it has jurisdiction. The Constitution requires, to give the courts of the United States jurisdiction, that the litigants to a suit should "be citizens of different States." The objection in this case is, that the complainant does not stand in that relation to her husband, the defendant; in other words, it is a denial of a wife's right, who has been divorced a mensa et thoro, to acquire for herself a domiciliation in a State of this Union different from that of her husband in another State, to entitle her to sue him there by her next friend, in a court of the United States having equity jurisdiction, to recover from him alimony which he has been adjudged to pay to her by a court which had jurisdiction over the parties and the subject matter of divorce, where the decree was rendered.

We have already shown, by many authorities, that courts of equity have a jurisdiction to interfere to enforce a decree for alimony, and by cases decided by this court; that the jurisdiction of the Courts of Equity of the United States is the same as that of England, whence it is derived. On that score alone, the jurisdiction of the court in the case before us cannot be successfully denied.

But it was urged by the learned counsel who argued this cause for the defendant, that husband and wife, although allowed to live separately under a decree of separation a mensa et thoro, made by a state court having competent jurisdiction, are still so far one person, while the married relation continues to exist, that they cannot become at the same time citizens of different States, within the meaning of the Federal Constitution, and therefore the court below had no jurisdiction. It was also said, for the purpose of bringing suits for divorces, they may acquire separate residences in fact; but this is an exception founded in necessity only, and that the legal domicil of the wife, until the marriage be dissolved, is the domicil of the husband, and is changed with a change of his domicil.

Such, however, are not the views which have been taken in Europe generally, by its jurists, of the domicil of a wife divorced a mensa et thoro. They are contrary, too, to the generally received doctrine in England and the United States upon the point.

In England it has been decided, that where the husband and wife are living apart, under a judicial sentence of separation, that the domicil of the husband is not the domicil of the wife. Eng. L. & Eq., 9th vol., 598; 2 Rob. Eccl., 505. When Mr. Phillimore wrote his treatise upon the Law of Domicil, he said he was not aware of any decided case upon the question of the domicil of a wife divorced a mensa et thoro, but there can be little doubt, that in England, as in France, it would not be that of her husband, but the one chosen for herself after the divorce. In support of his opinion, he cites Pothier's Introd. aux Coutume, p. 4; Mercadie, in his Commentary upon the French Code, Vol. I., p. 287; the French Code, tit. 111, art. 108; the Code Civile of Sardinia; and Cocher's Argument in The Duchess of Holsten's case, Ouvres, 1, 2, p. 223.

Mr. Bishop, in his Commentaries on the Law of Marriage and Divorce, has a passage so appropriate to the point we are discussing, that we will extract it entire. It is of the more value, too, because it comprehends the opinions entertained by eminent American jurists and judges in respect to the domicil of a wife divorced a mensa et thoro. He says, in discussing the jurisdiction of courts where parties sought a divorce abroad for causes which would have been insufficient at home, that "it was necessary to settle a preliminary question, namely: whether for the purpose of a divorce suit the husband and wife can have separate domicils; that the general doctrine is familiar, that the domicil of the wife is that of the husband. But it will probably be found, on examination, that the doctrine rests upon the legal duty of the wife to follow and dwell with the husband wherever he goes.

"If he commits an offense which entitles her to have the marriage dissolved, she is not only discharged thereby immediately, and without a judicial determination of the question, from her duty to follow and dwell with him, but she must abandon him, or the co-habitation will amount to a condonation, and bar her claim to the remedy. In other words, she must establish a domicil of her own, separate from her husband, though it may be, or not, in the same judicial locality as his. Courts, however, may decline to recognize such domicil in a collateral proceeding—that is, a proceeding other than a suit for divorce. But where the wife is plaintiff in a divorce suit, it is the burden of her application, that she is entitled, through the misconduct of her husband, to a separate domicil. So when parties are already living under a judicial separation, the domicil of the wife does not follow that of the husband." Section 728.

Chief Justice Shaw says, in Harteau v. Harteau, 14 Pick, 181, 185, the law will recognize a wife as having a separate existence and separate interests and separate rights, in those cases where the express object of all proceedings is to show that the relation itself ought to be dissolved, or so modified as to establish separate interests, and especially a separate domicil and home. Otherwise, the parties, in this respect, would stand upon a very unequal footing, it being in the power of the husband to change his domicil at will, but not in that of the wife.

The cases which were cited against the right of a wife, divorced from bed and board, to choose for herself a domicil, do not apply. Chichester v. Donegal, in 1 Ad. Eccl., p.8, 19. That of Shachell v. Shachell, cited in Whitcomb v. Whitcomb, 2 Curt. Eccl., 352, are decisions upon the domicil of the wife, when living apart from her husband by their mutual agreement, but not under decrees divorcing the wife from the bed and board of the husband. The leading case under the same circumstances is that of Warrender v. Warrender, 9 Bligh., 103, 104. In that case, Lord Brougham makes the fact that the husband and wife were living apart by agreement, and not by a sentence of divorce, the foundation of the judgment. The general rule is, that a voluntary separation will not give to the wife a different domicilation in law from that of her husband. But if the husband, as is the fact in this case, abandons their domicil and his wife, to get rid of all these conjugal obligations which the marriage relation imposes upon him, neither giving to her the necessaries nor the comforts suitable to their condition and his fortune, and relinquishes altogether his marital control and protection, he yields up that power and authority over her which alone makes his domicil hers, and places her in a situation to sue him for a divorce a mensa et thoro, and to ask the court having jurisdiction of her suit to allow her from her husbands means, by way of alimony, a suitable maintenance and support. When that has been done, it becomes a judicial debt of record against the husband, which may be enforced by execution or attachment against his person, issuing from the court which gave the decree; and when that cannot be done on account of the husband having left or fled from that jurisdiction to another, where the process of that court cannot reach him, the wife, by her next friend, may sue him, wherever he may be found or where he shall have acquired a new domicil, for the purpose of recovering the alimony due to her, or to carry the decree into a judgment there with the same effect that it has in the State in which the decree was given. Alimony decreed to a wife in a divorce of separation from bed and board, is as much a debt of record, until the decree has been recalled, as any other judgment for money is. When it is not paid, the wife can sue her husband for it in a court of equity, as an incident of that condition which gave to her the right to sue him, by her next friend, for a divorce.

It was decided in the State of Massachusetts, as early as the year 1800, that there were circumstances under which it appears to be absolutely necessary for the wife to sue, as for the recovery of alimony. That case was the same, in its circumstances, as this with which we are dealing. The wife libeled for a divorce a mensa et thoro, on account of the extreme cruelty of her husband. The divorce was decreed; and the husband was ordered to pay to her alimony, in quarterly installments. The wife afterwards brought an action against him for arrears. He demurred to the declaration, and judgment was given for her. Wheeler v. Wheeler, 2 Des. Abr., 310.

The same has been held in other cases in that State. It is now established doctrine there, and in some of our other States. They hold that a decree for a divorce, with an allowance for alimony, is as much a judgment as if it had been obtained on the common law side of the court.

Rogers, Justice, in Clark v. Clark, 6 Watts & Serg., 85, places the right to recover arrears of alimony on the ground that the husband, after the decree for a divorce was rendered, had withdrawn himself from the jurisdiction of the court, to prevent him from being forced by attachment to pay the alimony which had been decreed to the wife.

In the State of New York, a wife may file a bill against her husband for alimony; and it appearing that he had abandoned her without any support, and threatened to leave the State, the court, on the wife's petition, granted a writ of ne exeat respublica against him. Seymour v. Hazard, 1 Johns. Ch., 2; Denton v. Denton, 1 Johns. Ch., 364.

In South Carolina, where the court, having no power to grant divorces, decreed to a wife alimony, on her bill praying for that remedy only, and ordered the husband to give security for its payment, the sheriff, having taken him into custody, suffered him to escape; it was held that the wife might maintain, by her next friend, an action at law against the sheriff for the escape. Smith, Justice, said: "It had been urged in the argument that this woman, being a feme covert, could not maintain the action by her next friend. If that argument were to prevail, there would be a failure of justice, which our law abhors, as there would be no means of enforcing a decree of a wife against her husband for alimony. The court of equity could order a refractory husband to be attached, and the sheriff would let him go, if he thought proper; then, if the wife could not sue by her next friend, who could? The law provides no other course. And, upon this occasion, I would adopt the course of a very learned judge, 'if there is no precedent, I will make one.'"

In Ohio, a wife divorced a mensa et thoro may maintain ejectment for a lot of land, the use of which was allowed to her as alimony. In Virginia, it was said, in Purcell v. Purcell, 4 Hen. & M., 507, that the Court of Chancery has jurisdiction in all cases of alimony. In Maryland the High Court of Chancery, from the earliest colonial times, exercised the jurisdiction to decree alimony, but not to grant divorces.

This was done under the belief that it belonged to the High Court of Chancery, in the absence of ecclesiastical tribunals; and in 1777 an Act of Assembly provided that the Chancellor shall and may hear hear and determine all causes for alimony; in as full and ample a manner as such causes could be heard and determined by the laws of England, in the ecclesiastical courts there.

Under that Statute, alimony is granted to the wife whenever the English courts would be authorized to render a divorce from bed and board; but the court has no power to extend the remedy, and decree a divorce also.

The inherent jurisdiction of a court of equity to decree alimony has also been acknowledged in Alabama. In North Carolina, bills of equity by the wife against the husband, praying alimony, were sustained, from an early day, without question as to the lawfulness of the jurisdiction.

Where such a decree has been made, whether done as an inherent power in equity to grant a decree for alimony, or as an auxiliary to enforce the payment of it as an incident of a divorce a mensa et thoro, there are no decisions, either in the English or American books, denying the wife's right to sue her husband for arrears of alimony due, by her next friend.

In some of the States she may do so, without the intervention of her next friend; but she cannot do that, as has been said before, in the courts of the United States having equity jurisdiction.

We think, also, that the cases which have been cited in this opinion are sufficient to show, whatever may have been the doubts in an earlier day, that a wife under a judicial sentence of separation from bed and board is entitled to make a domicil for herself, different from that of her husband, and that she may by her next friend, sue her husband for alimony, which he had been decreed to pay as an incident to such divorce, or when it has been given after such a decree by a supplemental bill. In our best reflections, we have been unable to come to a different result. The privileges allowed to a wife under such circumstances rest upon the facts that the separation is only grantable propter Sævitiam; that the alimony commonly allowed is no more than enough to give her a home and a scanty maintenance, almost necessarily short of that from which her husband has driven her; and that, as a consequence, she should be permitted to change her domicil, where she may live upon her narrow allowance with most comfort and the least mortification. Her right to sue her husband, by her next friend, for alimony already decreed, rests upon higher considerations, or upon legal principles which have been so well expressed by Chief Justice Shaw, as to her right to sue in the State of Massachusetts, that we will use his language, deeming it to be applicable in any other State in the American Union:

"After such a divorce, the law of this Commonwealth recognizes her right to acquire and hold property, to take her own earnings to her own use, for the maintenance of herself and her children. She is deprived of the protection, and exempted from the control, of her husband. She may by the decree of the court granting the divorce, and pursuant to the provision of the statute law of the Commonwealth, be charged with the custody, and consequently with the support and maintenance, of the children of the marriage. The reason, therefore, why a wife cannot sue or be sued without joining or being joined with her husband, does not exist. The relation in which the divorce a mensa et thoro places the parties opposes a joinder. If it were necessary to join the husband as plaintiff, he might release her rights, by which she would be subjected to costs; if he might be joined as defendant, he might be made subject to her debts; both of which consequences are repugnant to the true relation of divided and separate interests, in which the law by such a decree places them. Whilst the law thus recognizes the right of a woman so divorced to acquire and take the proceeds of her own industry to her own use, it recognizes her power to make contracts; and if she could not sue and be sued, it would present the anomalous case in which the law recognizes a right without affording a remedy for vindicating it, and subjects a party to a duty without lending its aid to enforce it."

We do not deem it necessary to show, further than it has already been done in this opinion, that the equity side of the court was the appropriate tribunal for this cause. We have, however, verified the correctness and applicability of several of the cases cited in his argument by the counsel of the complainant to sustain that point, and deem them decisive.

The only point remaining for our determination is that which questions the complainant's right to pursue her remedy in the equity side of the District Court of the United States in the State of Wisconsin.

The facts are, that she married the defendant in the State of New York, the State then of her husband's domicil; that they lived there until the decree of separation was made; that she has retained it ever since as her domicil, but that the defendant, after the decree of separation was given, left her domicil in New York for another in the State of Wisconsin, in which he says that he has acquired a domicil. The complainant comes into court in the character of citizen of the State of New York. Mrs. Barber is recognized to be such by the laws of that State, and her status as a divorced woman a mensa et thoro by a court of competent jurisdiction in New York, and the rights of citizenship which she has under it there, are decisive of her right to sue in the courts of the United States, as that has been done in this instance. The citizenship of the defendant is admitted and claimed by him to be in the State of Wisconsin. His voluntary change of domicil from New York to Wisconsin makes him suable there. That might have been done in a state court in equity as well as in the District Court of the United States; but she had a right to pursue her remedy in either. She has chosen to do so in a court of the United States, which has jurisdiction over the subject matter of her claim to the same extent that a court of equity of a State has, and we think that the court below has not committed error in sustaining its jurisdiction over this cause, nor in the decree which it has made.

We affirm the decree of that court, and direct a mandate to be issued accordingly.

Dissenting, Mr. Justice Campbell, and Mr. Justice Daniel, and Chief Justice Taney.

Mr. Justice Daniel, dissenting:

From several considerations, which to me appear essentially important, I am constrained to differ in opinion with the majority of the court in this case.

1st. With respect to the authority of the courts of the United States to adjudicate upon a controversy and between parties such as are presented by the record before us. Those courts, by the Constitution and laws of the United States, are invested with jurisdiction in controversies between citizens of different States. In the exercise of this jurisdiction, we are forced to inquire, from the facts disclosed in the cause, whether during the existence of the marriage relation between these parties the husband and wife can be regarded as citizens of different States? Whether, indeed, by any regular legal deduction consistent with that relation, the wife can, as to her civil or political status, be regarded as a citizen or person.

By Coke and Blackstone it is said: that "By marriage, the husband and wife become one person in law; that is, the very being or legal existence of the woman is suspended during the marriage, or at least is incorporated or consolidated into that of the husband, under whose wing and protection she performs everything. Upon this principal of union in husband and wife, depend almost all the rights, duties, and disabilities, that either of them acquire by the marriage. For this reason, a man cannot grant anything to his wife, nor enter into a covenant with her, for the grant would be to suppose her separate existence, and to covenant with her would be only to covenant with himself; and therefore it is generally true, that all compacts made between husband and wife, when single, are voided by the intermarriage." Co. Lit., 112; Bla. Com., Vol. I., p. 442. So, too, Chancellor Kent (Vol. II., p. 128): "The legal effects of marriage are generally deducible from the principle of the common law, by which the husband and wife are regarded as one person, and her legal existence and authority in a degree lost and suspended during the existence of the matrimonial union."

Such being the undoubted law of marriage, how can it be conceived that pending the existence of this relation the unity it creates can be reconciled with separate and independent capacities in that unity, such as belong to beings wholly disconnected, and each sui juris? Now, the divorce a mensa et thoro does not sever the matrimonial tie; on the contrary, it recognizes and sustains that tie; and the allowance of alimony arises from and depends upon reciprocal duties and obligations involved in that connection. The wife can have no claim to alimony but as wife, and such as arises from the performance of her duties as wife; the husband sustains no responsibilities save those which flow from his character and obligations as husband, presupposing the existence and fulfillment of conjugal obligations on the part of the wife. It has been suggested that by the regulations of some of the States a married woman, after separation, is permitted to choose a residence in a community or locality different from that in which she resided anterior to the separation, and different from the residence of the husband. It is presumed, however, that no regulation, express or special, can be requisite in order to create such a permisson. This would seem to be implied in the divorce itself; the purpose of which is, that the wife should no longer remain sub potestate viri, but should be freed from the control which had been abused, and should be empowered to select a residence and such associations as would be promotive of her safety and her comfort. But whether expressed in the decree for separation, or implied in the divorce, such a privilege does not destroy the marriage relation; much less does it remit the parties to the position in which they stood before marriage, and create or revive ante-nuptial, civil, or political rights in the wife. Both parties remain subject to the obligations and duties of husband and wife. Neither can marry during the lifetime of the other, nor do any act whatsoever which is a wrong upon the conjugal rights and obligations of either. From these views it seems to me to follow, that a married woman cannot, during the existence of the matrimonial relation, and during the life of the husband the wife cannot be remitted to the civil or political position of a feme sole, and cannot, therefore, become a citizen of a State or community different from that of which her husband is a member.

2d. It is not accordance with the design and operation of a government having its origin in causes and necessities, political, general and external, that it should assume to regulate the domestic relations of society, should, with a kind of inquisitorial authority, enter the habitations and even into the chambers and nurseries of private families, and inquire into and pronounce upon the morals and habits and affections or antipathies of the members of every household. If such functions are to be exercised by the federal tribunals, it is important to inquire by what rule or system of proceeding, or according to what standard, either of ethics or police, they are to be enforced. Within the range subjected to the political, general and uniform control of the federal Constitution, there are numerous Commonwealths, and within these are ordinances much more numerous and diversified, for the definition and enforcement of the duties of their respective members. Now, to which of these ordinances, or to which of these various systems of regulation, will the federal authorities resort as a source of jurisdiction, or as a rule of decision, especially when it is borne in mind that it is only between members of different communities, persons legitimately subject to such separate rules of obligation or policy, that the tribunals of the Federal Government have cognizance; when, too, it is recollected that the Federal Government is clothed with no power to execute the laws of the States. The federal tribunals can have no power to control the duties or the habits of the different members of private families in their domestic intercourse. This power belongs exclusively to the particular communities of which those families form parts, and is essential to the order and to the very existence of such communities.

It has been suggested, that by the decree for separation a mensa et thoro, the husband and wife have become citizens of different States, and that the allowance to the wife is in the nature of a debt, which, as a citizen of a different State, she may enforce against the husband in he federal courts. This suggestion, to my mind, involves two obvious fallacies. The first is the assumption, that by the decree, the wife is made a citizen at all, or a person sui juris, whilst yet she is wife, still bound by her conjugal obligations, the faithful observance of which, on her part, is the foundation of her claim to maintenance as wife, and which claim she would forfeit at any time by a violation of these obligations. Indeed, the form of her application is an acknowledgment that she is not sui juris, and not released from her conjugal disabilities and obligations, for she sues by prochein ami.

The second error in the position before mentioned is shown by the character and objects of the allowance made as alimony to a wife. This allowance is not in the nature of an absolute debt. It is not unconditional, but always dependent upon the personal merits and conduct of the wife—merits and conduct which must exist and continue, in order to constitute a valid claim to such an allowance. This allowance might unquestionably be forfeited upon proof of criminality or misconduct of the wife, who would not be permitted to enforce the payment of that to which it should be shown she had lost all just claim; and this inhibition, it is presumed, might embrace as well a portion of that allowance at any time in arrears, as its demand in future. The essential character, then, of this allowance, viz.: its being always conditional and dependent, both for its orgin and continuation, upon the circumstances which produced or justified it, is demonstrative of the propriety and the necessity of submitting it to the control of that authority whose province it was to judge of those circumstances. That authority can exist nowhere but with the power and the right to control the private and domestic relations of life. The Federal Goverment has no such power; it has no commission of censor morum over the several States and their people.

But, irrespective of the disability of the wife as a party, I hold that the courts of the United States, as courts of chancery, cannot take cognizance of cases of alimony.

It has been repeatedly ruled by this court, that the jurisdiction and practice in the courts of the United States in equity are not to be governed by the practice in the state courts, but that they are to be apprehended and exercised according to the principles of equity, as distinguished and defined in that country from which we drive our knowledge of those principles. Such is the law as announced in the cases of Robinson v. Campbell, 3 Wheat., 212; The United States v. Howland, 4 Wheat., 108; Boyle v. Zachrie & Turner, 6 Pet., Pet., 648. It is repeated in the cases of Story v. Livingston, 13 Pet., 359, and of Gaines v. Relf, 15 Pet., 9. Now, it is well known that the Court of Chancery in England does not take cognizance of the subject of alimony, but that this one of the subjects within the cognizance of the Ecclesiastical Court, within whose peculiar jurisdiction marriage and divorce are comprised. Of these matters, the Court of Chancery in England claims no cognizance. Upon questions of settlement or contract connected with marriages, the Court of Chancery will undertake the enforcement of such contracts, but does not decree alimony as such, and independently of such contracts.

In Roper on the Law of Baron and Feme (Vol. II., p. 307), it is stated that Lord Loughborough, in a case in 1 Vesey, Jr., 195, is reported to have said, that if a wife applied to the Court of Chancery upon a supplicavit for security of the peace against her husband, and it was necessary that she should live apart as incidental to that, the Chancellor will allow her separate maintenance. That this passage has been quoted by Sir William Grant in 10 Ves., 397, and that the same opinion was advanced in the case of Lambert v. Lambert, 2 Brown's Parliamentary Cases, p. 26. "But," continues this writer, "there seems to be no reported instance of such a jurisdiction, and it would be inconsistent with the object and form of the writ of supplicavit;" and he concludes with the position that "the wife can only obtain a separate maintenance in the ecclesiastical courts where alimony is decreed to be paid during the pendency of any suit between husband and wife, and after its termination, if it ends in a sentence of separation on the ground of the husband's misconduct."

From the above views, it would seem to follow, inevitably, that as the jurisdiction of the chancery in England does not extend to or embrace the subjects of divorce and alimony, and as the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States in chancery is bounded by that of the chancery in England, all power or cognizance with respect to those subjects by the courts of the United States in chancery is equally excluded.

It has been said that, there being no ecclesiastical court in the United States, many of the States have assumed jurisdiction over the subjects of divorce and alimony, through the agency of their courts of equity. The answer to this suggestion is, first, that it concedes the distinction between the character and powers of these different tribunals. In the next place, it may have been that the jurisdiction exercised by the state courts may have been conferred by express legislative grant; or it may have been assumed by those tribunals, and acquiesced in from considerations of convenience, or from mere toleration; but whether expressly conferred upon the state courts, or tacitly assumed by them, their example and practice cannot be recognized as sources of authority by the courts of the United States. The origin and the extent of their jurisdiction must be sought in the laws of the United States, and in the settled rules and principles by which those laws have bound them.

THE DECISIONS

OF THE

Supreme Court of the United States,

AT

DECEMBER TERM, 1859.

J. W. HODGE, JOHN W HUNTER, HAYWOOD HUNTER, THOMAS COLEMAN AND YOUNG COLEMAN, Plffs. in Er.,

v.

JOHN A. WILLIAMS.

(See S. C., 22 How., 87-89.)

Writ of error must be brought by party who alleges error—amendment of, refused—party must see that process is legal.

This court has no appellate power over the judgment of the court below, unless the judgment is brought here by writ of error, sued out by the party who alleges error in the judgment of the inferior court.

This court has uniformly refused to amend writs of error.

It is the duty of the party who desires to bring a case before this court, to see that proper and legal process is sued out for that purpose; and if he fails to do so, the writ of error must be dismissed.

Motion made Dec. 9, 1859. Decided Dec. 19, 1859.

IN ERROR to the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Texas.

On motion for leave to amend the record, or to dismiss this writ of error for want of jurisdiction.

The case is stated by the court.

Mr. Wm. G. Hale, for the plaintiffs in error.

Mr. Robert Hughes, for defendant in error.

Mr. Chief Justice Taney delivered the opinion of the court:

It appears, from the record in this case, that an action was brought in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Texas, by John A. Williams, against Hodge and the other defendants named in the proceedings, and at the trial, the judgment was against the plaintiff.

The writ of error removing the case to this court is in the name of the defendants who succeeded in the court below, and do not desire to disturb the judgment; and the plaintiff in that court, who alleges error in the judgment, and seeks to reverse it, is made the defendant in the writ of error.

It is evident that the writ was intended to be sued out by the plaintiff in the court below, and that the names of the defendants, as plaintiffs in the writ, were used without their authority; for the errors are assigned by the plaintiff, and the bond states that a writ of error has been sued out by him, and the citation issued by the judge is directed to the defendants, and served on their counsel. And it is obvious that the writ in the name of the defendants was an oversight of the clerk by whom it was issued.

But the amendment proposed cannot be made here. An amendment presupposes jurisdiction of the case. And this court have no appellate power over the judgment of the court below, unless the judgment is brought here according to the Act of Congress—that is, by writ of error; and that writ, from its nature and character, must be sued out by the party who alleges error in the judgment of the inferior court. This writ is not a mere matter of form, but matter of substance, prescribed by law, and essential to the jurisdiction of this court. And if it were amended here, by making the plaintiffs in error defendants, and the defendant in error the plaintiff, it would be a new writ made here, and not the one issued by the officer appointed by law.

Upon this principle, the court have uniformly refused to amend writs of error; and this must now be regarded as the settled practice of the court. It has repeatedly refused to amend, where the partnership name of a firm name was used instead of the proper names of the parties; and in like manner it has refused to amend where the name of one or more of the parties were given, and the rest designated as others joined with them, without setting out the names of those intended to be included as others.

But the precise point now before us was decided in the case of Hines v. Papin, at December Term, 1857. The same error was committed in that case which had been committed in this; and the error was equally apparent, as in the present instance, from the recital in the bond and the citation and service. The case was, indeed, even stronger for the amendment than this, for counsel appeared in this court for each of the parties, and offered to amend by consent. Yet the court refused to amend, upon the ground that consent of parties would not give jurisdiction, where it was not given by law and legal process. But here there is no appearance for the parties who are named as plaintiffs in the writ of error; and if we order the amendment, we should make them defendants in a suit in which they are not bound to appear in that character. It is the duty of the party who desires to bring a case before this court, to see that proper and legal process is sued out for that purpose; and if he fails to do so, he has no right to treat the defect as a mere clerical error, for which he is not to be held responsible.

The opinion in the case of Hines v. Papin, above referred to, was delivered orally, and not reduced to writing, and consequently does not appear in the printed reports. The court have, therefore, deemed it advisable to state now the practice and doctrine of the court in this respect, in order that suitors may be aware of the necessity of paying proper attention to the process they issue, and not subject themselves to costs and delays by errors which a clerk, in the hurry and pressure of other business, will unavoidably sometimes commit.

The writ of error must, therefore, upon the motion before the court, be dismissed, as it cannot be amended.

GEORGE BONDIES, late Master and Part Owner of the Steamboat KATE, Intervening, &c., Appt.,

v.

JAS. P. SHERWOOD, JOS. McCLELLAND AND BARNEY McGINNIS, Libts.

(See S. C., 22 How., 214–217.)

Contract to raise sunken vessel cannot be repudiated and libel filed for salvage.

Where the libelants agreed to raise a sunken vessel in fourteen days, and proceeded under their contract to raise the vessel, but not within the agreed time, and the bargain was an unprofitable one, the libelants cannot repudiate it and file a libel for salvage.

Assuming the services rendered to be in nature of salvage services, and that a court of admiralty had jurisdiction to enforce the contract, as a maritime contract, yet the libelants, by their own showing, cannot recover under the contract.

And it is equally clear that they cannot repudiate their contract, and libel the vessel for salvage.

Submitted Dec. 7, 1859. Decided Dec. 19, 1859.

APPEAL from the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Texas.

The libel in this case was filed in the court below, by the appellees, on a claim for salvage compensation. The said court found for the libelants, and entered a decree for $2,575, as salvage, being fifty per cent. of the total value of everything saved; whereupon the claimant took an appeal to this court.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. L. Sherwood and William G. Hale, for appellant:

The whole case is replete with evidence that libelants worked under the written contract and under no verbal agreement whatsoever; that Bondies cautiously avoided all verbal agreements; that he carefully guarded the boat, cargo, himself and the underwriters, by stipulating against all claims for salvage services; that he sought to guard against a devastavit upon the property by stipulating that he should retain exclusive possession until the contract should be complied with by the libelants.

No counsel appeared in this court for the appellees.

Mr. Justice Grier delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellees, describing themselves as ship-carpenters, residing in Galveston, filed their libel in the District Court of Texas against the Steamboat Kate, and against Bondies, late master and owner, in a "cause of salvage, civil and maritime."

They charge that the steamboat left the port of Galveston, for ports and places on the Trinity River, in said District of Texas, laden with merchandise. That the boat was snagged and sunk in the river near Morse's bluff, in Liberty County.

That on the 24th of April, 1856, the libelants entered into an article of agreement, under seal, with Bondies, who had become sole owner of both cargo and vessel, to raise the vessel.

In this agreement, the libelants covenant to proceed with the necessary boats, apparatus, &c., and to raise the steamboat at their own cost in fourteen days after their arrival at the place where it lay, provided they were not hindered by high water; when raised, the boat to be taken to Galveston. Bondies covenants to convey the boat to them, on their payment to him of $4,000, and also to subrogate them to all his claims against the cargo. But, in the mean time, until the covenants of libelants were performed, the legal possession of the boat and cargo was to be and remain in Bondies.

The libel alleges that "this agreement was mutually given up and abandoned." But this averment is not sustained by the evidence. On the contrary, it appears that the libelants proceeded under their contract to raise the vessel, but did not succeed till sometime in July. The boat and merchandise being much injured in the operation and by the delay, it turned out that the costs and expenses would exceed the whole value of the boat and cargo when recovered. The bargain was, therefore, an unprofitable one, and the libelants concluded to repudiate it, and filed this libel for salvage.

Without adverting to the numerous other facts developed in the history of this case, but which cannot affect its merits, it is very plain, that assuming the services rendered by these mechanics to be in the nature of salvage services, and that a court of admiralty had jurisdiction to enforce the contract both against the owner and the boat as a maritime contract, yet the libelants, by their own showing, cannot recover under the contract. And it is equally clear that they cannot repudiate their contract, and libel the vessel for salvage.

See The Mulgrave, 2 Hagg. Adm., 78, and Abbott on Shipping, 706.

For this reason alone the libel must be dismissed.

But there are two other questions which arise on the face of of this record, and which it will not be necessary to decide, but which ought not to pass without notice, lest an inference should be drawn from our silence that the court considered them of no importance, or intended to decide them in favor of the libelants:

1. By the 19th rule prescribed by this court for practice in the courts of admiralty, it is ordered, that "in all suits for salvage the suit may be in rem against the property saved, OR in personam against the party at whose request and for whose benefit the salvage service has been performed." By reference to Mr. Conklin's treatise, page 42, it will be found that it is the prevailing opinion that both cannot be joined in the same libel. The point has not been brought before this court, and we notice it now only to show that it is not now decided.

2. The libel shows that the steamboat was engaged in the internal trade of the State of Texas, proceeding from a port in the same, up a river wholly within the same. It is not even alleged that she had a coasting license. That a court of admiralty had jurisdiction in such a case, or that the maritime law of wreck and salvage could be applied to it, are questions not made by the pleadings nor noticed in the argument, and therefore are not decided by the court.

Let the libel be dismissed, with costs.

v.

HORACE B. CLAFLIN, WM. H. MELLEN, NATHANIEL F. MILLER, DAVID H. CONKLING, AND HENRY STONE.

(See S. C., 22 How., 23-28.)

Where record defective, no exceptions, and jury waived, nothing to review.

In a suit on a mortgage, where the loose papers certified from the Supreme Court of Minnesota to this court has neither the form nor substance of a record, and no exceptions were taken, and a jury was waived, and the facts were submitted to the court, there is nothing for this court to try.

Argued Dec. 8, 1859. Decided Dec. 27, 1859.

APPEAL from the Supreme Court of the Territory of Minnesota.

This action was brought in the District Court of Ramsey County in Minnesota, by the appellees, to foreclose a certain mortgage. A jury having been waived, the court entered judgment of foreclosure. This judgment having been affirmed on appeal by the Supreme Court of the Territory of Minnesota, the defendant took an appeal to this court.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Brisbin & Bigelow, H. W. Merrill and H. L. Stevens, for appellant:

The note and mortgage were effectual and valid as collateral security for the debt of $2,126.08, and for that debt only; and the payment of this identical debt on Dec. 15, 1852, satisfied and discharged the note and mortgage.

Bleaden v. Charles, 7 Bing., 246; Walker v. Snediker, 1 Hoffm. Ch., 145; Shirras v. Caig, 7 Cranch, 84: Chit. Bills, ch. 3, pp. 84, 96, 12th ed.; Story, Prom. N., sec. 187, cases cited, 2d ed.

The mortgage, in any just view of the case, was not a continuing security. No reasonable construction can give it the effect of a continuing guaranty covering future balances.

Wright v. Johnson, 8 Wend., 512; Hunt v. Smith, 17 Wend., 179; Dobbin v. Bradley, 17 Wend., 422; Fellows v. Prentiss, 3 Den., 512; Baker v. Rand, 13 Barb., 152; Bigelow v. Benton, 14 Barb., 123.

A mortgage once paid becomes functus officio, and is forever extinguished, and a fortiori when given by a surety as collateral security.

Mr. R. H. Gillet, for appellees:

The decision of the court where a jury is waived, is conclusive upon the parties as to all questions of fact, and the appellate court cannot review its decision on such questions.

United States v. King, 7 How., 833; Bond v. Brown, 12 How., 254: Graham v. Bayne, 59 U. S. (18 How.), 60; Penhallow v. Doane, 3 Dall., 54; Guild v. Frontin, 59 U. S. (21 How.), 224.

The cause having been tried without a jury, no objection can be taken to the admissibility of evidence.

Weems v. George, 13 How., 190; Arthurs v. Hart, 58 U. S. (17 How.), 6; Martin v. Ihmsen, 62 U. S. (21 How.), 394.

The record does not show any exceptions; and, therefore, defendant cannot raise the question of the admissibility of evidence in this court.

Mr. Justice McLean delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from the Supreme Court of the Territory of Minnesota.

The suit was brought on a mortgage executed the 1st day of October, 1852, by Ann Curran, the duly authorized attorney in fact of William B. Lawler, conditioned for the payment of the sum of $4,000, being part of lot three, in block thirty, in the Town of St. Paul, forming an oblong square, forty-two feet on Third Street by eighty feet on Roberts Street. This mortgage was duly recorded on the day subsequent to that of its execution.

This mortgage, it was alleged, was executed to secure a sum of money then due to the plaintiffs, and which was likely to become due, in the further purchase of merchandise from the plaintiffs by the defendant. The plaintiffs accepted the mortgage, as security for purchases to be made, or any debts which the firm of Curran & Lawler might subsequently owe the firm.

The understanding and agreement between the parties was, that the mortgage was to be held by plaintiffs as a pledge or collateral security, and was not to be canceled or delivered up until all purchases which Curran & Lawler might make, and which might become due at any time within the year—that is, before the 1st day of October, 1853. So long as anything should remain due on such purchases, the indebtment was to be considered and deemed secured by the mortgage.

The payment of the note and mortgage, as alleged by Curran & Lawler in their answer, is denied; and it is stated that the amount of indebtment on the note and mortgage, at maturity, was upwards of $5,000.

It is difficult to determine the character of the loose papers certified from the Supreme Court of Minnesota to this court. They have neither the form nor the substance of a record. The papers seem to be thrown together, as much by accident as design; and one can scarcely gather any special object in reading the transcripts. It would seem that neither certainty nor order can be extracted from these papers, and that some form should be adopted by which the pleadings should be stated, and the points controverted, whether of fact or of law. Many objections are made to questions propounded to witnesses, but no exceptions seem to have been taken.

A jury seems to have been waived, and the facts were submitted to the court. In such a case, the question of law arising on the facts would appear to have been decided by the court. Still, no exception is taken. In fact, there seems to be nothing for this court to try, except the validity of the mortgage and the fact of its discharge. And, even in this matter, the evidence is in conflict, and it is difficult to decide the point disputed.

The mortgage was for $4,000, and was to stand as a security for the balance due the plaintiffs; and in this way it was intended to give an additional credit to the company. From the manner in which the mortgage was treated, it appears to have been designed as a standing guaranty for the sum named.

And, in the language of the court, the said "action having come on to be heard at the May Term of the District Court of Ramsey County, upon the complaint of the plaintiffs and the answer of the said William B. Lawler, before the presiding judge of said court, a jury trial therein having been waived by the respective parties, the same having been decided in favor of the plaintiffs, and that there is due on the notes and mortgage upon which the action is brought the sum of $4,495.40, with interest from the 4th October, 1853, amounting in all to $5,084.07; and, on motion, it was ordered, adjudged and decreed, that the mortgaged premises, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be sold by the sheriff for the payment of the mortgage; and it is further ordered, adjudged and decreed, that the defendants, and all persons claiming under them, be forever barred," &c.

On the appeal of Lawler and others from the District Court of Ramsey County to the Supreme Court of the Territory, "the matters at issue in this cause having been fully considered, it appears to this court that, in the proceedings, decree, and judgment thereon, in the District Court of Ramsey County, to this court appealed from, there is no error. It is therefore ordered that said decree and judgment be in all things affirmed with costs," &c.

From this last decree there is an appeal now pending before this court.

In looking into the facts of this case, it does not appear that the merits are changed by the views taken by the District Court of Ramsey County, or by the decision of the Supreme Court of the Territory.

The evidence is against the discharge of the mortgage. After the amount claimed under the mortgage, there is still a balance due the plaintiffs on general account.

Upon the whole, the decree of the Supreme Court of the Territory is affirmed; and the cause is remitted to the Supreme Court of the State of Minnesota, to be carried into effect as the law authorizes.

EDWIN M. CHAFFEE, Plff. in Er.,

v.

THE BOSTON BELTING COMPANY.

(See S. C., 22 How., 217-225.)

Purchaser of patented machine may use it during extended term—error in charge, to assume fact not proved.

A party who had purchased a patented machine, and was using it during the original term for which the patent was granted, may continue to use the machine during the extended term and until it is worn out, or he may repair it or improve upon it, as he pleases, in the same manner as if dealing with property of any other kind.

That the defendant had a title to the machinery and was rightfully in the use of it under that title, before and at the time the original letters patent expired, finds no support in the evidence reported.

It is clearly error for the court, in its instruction to the jury, to assume a material fact as proved, of which there is no evidence.

And when the finding of the jury accords with the theory of the instruction thus assumed without evidence, the error is of a character to deserve correction.

Argued Dec. 7, 1859. Decided Dec. 27, 1859.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Massachusetts.

This was an action on the case brought in the court below, by the plaintiff in error, for the alleged infringement of certain rights secured by letters patent.

The trial below having resulted in a verdict and judgment for the defendant, the plaintiff sued out this writ of error.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. T. A. Jenckes and C. A. Seward, for plaintiff in error:

I. The court below erred in charging the jury that under its title the defendant had a right to continue to use the same machinery for the same purpose. This charge was predicated upon an assumption of title in the defendant which had not been proved. This entitles the plaintiff to a reversal of the judgment, and to a venire facias de novo.

The court below assumed in its charge that the defendants, upon the assumption that they were rightfully in the use of the plaintiff's patent during its original term, had by operation of law a right to continue that use during the extended term. To this we reply:

1. That the license from Goodyear to Edwards was, by its terms, for so long only as said Goodyear and his assigns shall be possessed of any valid patent rights or the United States before mentioned.

2. The defendants derive no right from the proviso of the 18th section of the Act of July 4, 1836, to use the invention during the extended term.

Brooks v. Byam, 2 Story, 525; Curt. Pat., secs. 195, 197.

It is well settled that an instrument like that between Goodyear and Edwards is not an assignment or a grant, but a mere license.

Blanchard v. Eldridge, 1 Wall., Jr., 338; Gayler v. Wilder, 10 How., 477.

Mr. H. F. Durant, for the defendant in error, submitted no argument in this court.

Mr. Justice Clifford delivered the opinion of the court:

This case comes before the court on a writ of error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Massachusetts. It was an action of trespass on the case, for the alleged infringement of certain rights secured by letters patent.

As the foundation of the suit, the declaration alleges, in effect, that the assignor of the plaintiff was the original and first inventor of certain improvements in the manufacture of India rubber, and that in the year 1836 letters patent for such improvements were duly issued to him by the Commissioner of Patents, as is therein fully and correctly set forth and described.

Those improvements, as is alleged in the declaration, consist in a mode of preparing the rubber for manufacturing purposes, and of reducing it to a pasty state, without the use of the spirits of turpentine or other solvents, and of applying the same to cloths, and for other purposes, by the use of heated rollers and other means, as set forth in the letters patent, saving thereby, as is alleged, a large portion of the expense of reducing the original material to a proper degree of softness, and of fitting and preparing it for the various uses to which it may be applied.

On application subsequently made to the Commissioner of Patents, in due form of law, by the original inventor, the patent was extended for the further term of seven years, from the 31st day of August, 1850; and the plaintiff alleges that the patentee, on the 1st day of July, 1853, transferred, assigned and conveyed to him all his title to the invention and to the patent for the extended term.

By virtue of that deed of transfer, it is claimed in the declaration that the plaintiff acquired the right to demand and recover the damages for all infringements of the letters patent prior to the date of the transfer, as well as for those that have been committed since that time; and accordingly the plaintiff alleges that the defendants, on the 31st day of August, 1850, fraudulently commenced the use of those improvements, without law or right, and so continued to use them to the day of the commencement of this suit; averring, at the same time, that the defendants have prepared large quantities of the native rubber for manufacturing purposes, without the use of spirits of turpentine or other solvents, thereby making large gains, and greatly to the damage of the plaintiff.

As appears by the transcript, the action was entered in the circuit court at the May Term, 1854, but was continued from term to term until the May Term, 1857, when the parties went to trial upon the general issue.

From what is stated in the bill of exceptions, it appears that one Charles Goodyear was the owner of the original letters patent on the 26th day of January, 1846, and that he continued to own them for the residue of the term for which they were originally granted. On that day he entered into an indenture with one Henry Edwards, of the City of Boston, whereby, for certain considerations therein expressed, he sold and conveyed to the said Henry Edwards, his executors, administrators and assigns, the exclusive right and license to make, use, and vend, any and all articles appertaining to machines, or in the manufacture, construction, and use of machines or machinery, of whatever description, subject to certain limitations and qualifications therein expressed.

By the terms of the instrument, it was understood that the right and license so conveyed was to apply to any and all articles substituted for leather, metal and other substances, in the use or manufacture of machines or machinery, in so far as the grantor had any rights or privileges in the same, by virtue of any invention or improvement made, or which should thereafter be made, by him in the manufacture of India rubber or gum elastic goods, and in virtue of any and all letters patent or patent rights of the United States granted or belonging to him, or which should thereafter be granted or belong to him, for any and all inventions or improvements in the manufacture of such goods in this country, but excluding the right to make any contract with the Government of the United States. In consideration of the premises, the grantee paid the sum of $1,000, as appears by the recital of the instrument, and agreed to pay a certain tariff, at the rate of five cents per superficial yard, or five cents per pound for the pure gum, according to the nature of the article manufactured.

Reference is made in the declaration to the letters patent, and to the deed of assignment from the patentee to the plaintiff, but neither of those instruments appears in the bill of exceptions or in any other part of the record.

At the trial of the cause, it was conceded and agreed that the defendants, before the date of the plaintiff's writ, used certain machinery, constructed in conformity with the specification annexed to the letters patent declared on, and that the defendants, in using the machinery, conformed to the directions contained in the specification, and that the same was so used for the preparation and application of India rubber to the manufacture of the articles mentioned and described in the indenture from Charles Goodyear to Henry Edwards, and that all the machinery so used was constructed and in use as aforesaid before and at the time the original letters patent expired.

Upon this state of the case, according to the bill of exceptions, the presiding justice ruled and instructed the jury, that, under their title, the defendants had the right to continue to use the same machinery for the same purposes, and in conformity with the directions contained in the specification, after the expiration and renewal of the letters patent; and consequently, that the plaintiff could not recover.

Under the ruling and instruction of the court, the jury returned their verdict for the defendants; and the plaintiff excepted to the ruling, and his exceptions were duly allowed.

It is insisted by the counsel of the plaintiff, that the instruction given to the jury was erroneous; and that is the only question presented for decision at the present time. In considering that question, our attention must necessarily be confined to the evidence reported in the bill of exceptions, as the only means of ascertaining the precise state of facts on which the instruction to the jury was given. Whether the report of the evidence, as set forth in the bill of exceptions, may or may not be incomplete, or imperfectly stated, cannot be known in an appellate court. Bills of exception, when properly taken and duly allowed, become a part of the record, and, as such, cannot be contradicted.

By the admission of the parties in this case, it appears that the defendants, before the date of the plaintiff's writ, had used certain machinery, constructed in conformity with the specification of the plaintiff's patent. In the absence of any explanation or suggestion to the contrary, it must be inferred that the use of the machinery so admitted was without the license or consent of the plaintiff, and subsequent to the period when he became the owner of the patent for the extended term; and if so, the admission was sufficient, under the pleadings, to make out a prima facie case for the plaintiff. To maintain the issue on their part, the defendants, proved in effect, or it was admitted, that all the machinery so used by them had been constructed, and was in use, as aforesaid, before and at the time the original letters patent expired, and that in using the machinery they had conformed to the directions contained in the specification; and that the same was so used for the purposes and in the manufacture of the articles specified, and described in the before mentioned indenture. As before stated, they had previously proved, or it had been admitted, that the owner of the original term of the patent had granted the exclusive right and license to a third party to use the invention for the same purposes for which the defendants, both under the original and extended term of the patent, had used their machinery; but they did not prove, and there is no evidence in the case to show, any privity between themselves, and that license, either by assignment or in any other manner. They offered no proof tending to show that their use of the machinery in question, under either term of the patent, was with the license, consent, or knowledge, of the patentee, or of any other person who ever had or claimed to have any power or authority under him to convey the right. Provision is made by the 18th section of the Act of Congress, passed July 4th, 1836 (5 Stat. at L., p. 125), for the extension of patents beyond the time of their limitation, on application therefor in writing, by the patentee, to the Commissioner of the Patent Office, setting forth the grounds for such extension. By the latter clause of that section, the benefit of such renewal is expressly extended to assignees and grantees of the right to use the thing patented to the extent of their respective interests therein. Under that provision, it has been repeatedly held by this court, that a party who had purchased a patented machine, and was using it during the original term for which the patent was granted, might continue to use the machine during the extended term. Bloomer v. McQuewan et al., 14 How., 549; Wilson v. Rousseau, 4 How., 646. That rule rests upon the doctrine that the purchaser, in using the machine under such circumstances, exercises no rights created by the Act of Congress, nor does he derive title to it by virtue of the franchise or the exclusive privilege granted to the patentee.

When the patented machine rightfully passes to the hands of the purchaser from the patentee, or from any other person by him authorized to convey it, the machine is no longer within the limits of the monopoly. According to the decision of this court in the cases before mentioned, it then passes outside of the monopoly, and is no longer under the peculiar protection granted to patented rights. By a valid sale and purchase, the patented machine becomes the private individual property of the purchaser, and is no longer protected by the laws of the United States, but by the laws of the State in which it is situated. Hence it is obvious, that if a person legally acquires a title to that which is the subject of letters patent, he may continue to use it until it is worn out, or he may repair it or improve upon it as he pleases, in the same manner as if dealing with property of any other kind. Applying these principles to the present case, as it is exhibited in the bill of exceptions, there would be no difficulty in sustaining the instructions given to the jury, provided it appeared that the machinery used by the defendants had been legally purchased by them of the patentee or his assigns during the original term of the patent. But nothing appears in the evidence reported to warrant the inference that they were either assignees or grantees of the thing patented, within the meaning of the Act of Congress or the decisions of this court. All that the indenture offered in evidence showed, was the nature and extent that the defendants had used the invention, but, as is well contended by the counsel for the plaintiff, it proved nothing more. It did not prove, or tend to prove, that the defendants were rightfully in the enjoyment of the thing patented during the original term of the patent, and having failed to establish any right or license to use their machinery during the extended term by any other proof, they appear in the record as naked infringers.

Their right to continue to use the machinery as against the plaintiff is predicated in the instruction upon the assumption they had a title to it, and were rightfully in the use of it under that title, before and at the time the original letters patent expired. That assumed fact finds no support in the evidence reported. It is clearly error for the court, in its instruction to the jury, to assume a material fact as proved, of which there is no evidence in the case. United States v. Breitling, 20 How., 255. And when the finding of the jury accords with the theory of the instruction, thus assumed without evidence, the error is of a character to deserve correction.

Another position is assumed by the counsel of the plaintiff, which ought not to be passed over without a brief notice. They contend that the invention of the plaintiff, as described in the letters patent, is for a process, and not for a machine or machinery; and that the Act of Congress, extending the benefit of renewals to assignees and grantees of the right to use the thing patented, when properly construed, does not include patents for a process, but should be confined to patents for machines. That question, if properly presented, would involve the construction of the letters patent in this case as well as the Act of Congress; but as the patent is not in the record, it is not possible to determine it at the present time, and we only advert to it that it may not appear to have escaped attention.

The decree of the Circuit Court is reversed, with costs, and with directions to issue a new venire.

v.

GORHAM DAVENPORT ET AL., Commissioners of Pilotage of the Bay and Harbor of MOBILE.

(See S. C., 22 How., 227-244.)

Act of State regulating coasting trade, invalid, as inconsistent with Act of Congress.

Where the Act of a State imposes a condition to the privilege of carrying on the coasting trade within her waters, namely: the filing of a statement in writing, in the office of the Probate Judge, setting forth: 1. The name of the vessel; 2. The name of the owner, &c., and provides that unless this condition is complied with, the vessel is forbidden to leave the port, under the penalty of $500 for each offense, held, that there is a direct conflict between this Act of the State and the Act of Congress regulating this trade.

This Act of the State is not merely the exercise of a police power, which has not been surrendered to the General Government, but reserved to the States.

When an Act of a State prescribes a regulation repugnant to and inconsistent with the regulation of Congress, the state law must give way; and this, without regard to the source of power whence the State Legislature derived its enactment.

Such Act of the Legislature of the State of Alabama is in conflict with the Constitution and law of the United States and, therefore, void.

Argued Dec. 7, 1859. Decided Dec. 27, 1859.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Alabama.

This was an action in the nature of a libel filed in the City Court of Mobile in the State of Alabama, by the Commissioners of Pilotage for the bay and harbor of Mobile, against the steamboat William Bagaby, claiming the sum of $4,000 for eight separate violations of the Act of said State, entitled "An Act to provide for the registration of the names of steamboat owners," approved Feb. 15, 1854.

In the answer and exceptions filed to this libel, it is insisted that the General Assembly of the State of Alabama had no constitutional authority to require the owners of said boat to comply with the requirements of said Statute, the said Act being in conflict with the Constitution of the United States.

The case was tried on an agreed statement of facts, from which it appears to be admitted "that the said boat was regularly engaged in navigation and commerce between the port of New Orleans in the State of Louisiana, on the one hand, and the cities of Montgomery and Wetumpka on the other; that the said boat touched Mobile only for the purpose of better carrying on the said business between New Orleans and Montgomery and Wetumpka."

It is also stated in the answer, and admitted to be true, that the said steamboat was built at Pittsburg and that on her way to New Orleans, to wit: at Cincinnati, she took on board freight for New Orleans, for Mobile, and for Montgomery and Wetumpka; that previously to leaving Pittsburg, she was regularly enrolled and licensed in pursuance of the laws of the United States; that while at New Orleans she was regularly cleared, at the custom-house of that port, for Montgomery and Wetumpka; that having discharged her freight for Mobile on arrival there, she proceeded to Montgomery; and that on her return thence to New Orleans, she passed Mobile without stopping.

The judge decreed in favor of libelants.

On appeal to the Supreme Court, the decree of the judge of the city court was affirmed; whereupon the appellant sued out this writ of error.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Mr. P. Phillips, for plaintiffs in error:

The power to regulate commerce, conferred by the Constitution of the United States, includes the regulation of navigation, and was one of the primary objects which led to its adoption.

Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat., 67; Pennsylvania v. Wheeling Bridge Co., 18 How., 431.

The power to regulate navigation is the power to prescribe rules, in conformity with which navigation must be carried on. It extends to the persons who conduct it, as well as to the instrument used.

Cooley v. Port Wardens, Phil., 12 How., 316.

Is the power to regulate commerce, thus granted to the Federal Government, exclusive? In Gibbons v. Ogden, the court say: "It has been concluded that as the word to regulate, implies in its nature full power over the thing to be regulated, it excludes necessarily the action of all others that would perform the same operation on the same thing. That regulation is designed for the entire result applying to those parts which remain as they were as well as to those which are altered. It produces a uniform whole, which is as much disturbed and deranged by changing what the regulating power designs to leave untouched, as that on which it has operated. There is great force in the argument, and the court is not satisfied that it has been refuted.

In City of N. Y. v. Miln, 11 Pet., 130, which involved the constitutionality of an Act requiring captains of vessels arriving in the port of that State to furnish a list of passengers, &c., and which was sustained as a police regulation, the court waived the examination of the question whether the power to regulate commerce be or be not exclusive to regulate the States.'

In commenting on this case, Judge Wayne says that the power to be exercised under state authority was after the passengers have landed. That on the question as to the exclusiveness of the power, the judges were divided, four being in favor of the exclusiveness, and three opposed, and to this state of opinion was owing the waiver above quoted.

7 How., 481.

In the Passenger Cases, 7 How., 400, Justice McLean said: The power to regulate commerce, foreign and between the States, was vested exclusively in Congress.

Justice Wayne: This power "includes navigation upon the high seas and in the bays, harbors, lakes and navigable waters within the United States, and any law by a State in any way affecting the right of navigation, or subjecting the exercise of the right to a condition, is contrary to the grant" (p. 414).

Justices Catron and Grier: "That Congress has regulated commerce and intercourse with foreign nations and between the several States by willing that it shall be free, and it is therefore not left to the direction of each State in the Union, either to refuse a right of passage to persons or property through her territory, or to exact a duty for permission to exercise it" (p. 464).

In Cooley v. Port Wardens of Phil., the court say: "Although Congress has legislated on the subject of pilotage, its legislation manifests an intention, with a single exception, not to regulate this subject, but to leave its regulation to the several States. To these precise questions, which are all we are called on to decide, this opinion must be understood to be confined. It does not extend to the question what other subjects under the commercial power are under the exclusive control of Congress, or may be regulated by the States in the absence of all congressional legislation," &c.

12 How., 320.

But whether this power is exclusive or not, when Congress, in pursuance of the power, proceeds to regulate the subject-matter, it necessarily includes state interference with the same subject-matter.

In Houston v. Moore, 5 Wheat., 1, the court say: "We are altogether incapable of comprehending how two distinct wills can at the same time be exercised in relation to the same subject, to be effectual and at the same time compatible with one another."

In Prigg v. Commonwealth of Penn., 16 Pet., 617, the language of the court is: "If Congress have a constitutional power to regulate a particular subject, and they do regulate it in a particular manner and in a certain form, it cannot be that the State Legislatures have a right to interfere, and as it were by way of complement to the legislation of Congress, to prescribe additonal regulations, and what they may deem auxiliary provisions for the same purpose. In such a case the legislation of Congress in what it does prescribe, manifestly indicates that it does not intend that there shall be any further legislation to act upon the subject-matter. Its silence as to what it does not do, is as expressive of what its intention is, as the direct provisions made by it.

The license granted to the steamer to carry on the coasting trade, is a grant of authority to do whatever it purports to authorize. The States cannot add to the regulations made by the paramount authority, nor subtract anything from them.

Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat., 79; The People v. Brooks, 4 Den., 479.

The Act of the State is in direct conflict with these principles; for, in effect, it declares that vessels engaged in foreign commerce or the coasting trade, shall not navigate its waters without complying with a condition not prescribed by the Acts of Congress. If the State has power to inflict a penalty for the violation of the condition, it is equally authorized to use force to prevent the violation.

It is not pretended that the Act is based on the police power of the State; neither the preservation of the health, morals, nor the peace of the community is affected by it. In the language of the Supreme Court of the State, its object is merely to "advance the remedies for torts or contracts done or made by the agents of steamboats," &c.

While the power of the State over its legal remedies is admitted, this, like the taxing power of the State, cannot be exercised so as to interfere with the power delegated to Congress to regulate commerce.

Brown v. State of Maryland, 12 Wheat., 419, Hays v. Steamship Company, 17 How., 599; Towboat Company v. Steamboat Company, Law Reg., March, 1857, p. 284.

The Act of Congress of 29th of July, 1850, provides the mode by which sales and transfers shall be made, and what shall be the evidence of ownership, while the Act of the State disregards the mode thus provided, and declares a different rule shall prevail in its courts.

Messrs. C. C. Clay, Jr., and J. T. Taylor, for appellees:

1. There are three cases on appeal from the Supreme Court of Alabama against this defendant, now pending. The same question arises alike in all. See the cases reported in 28 Ala., 185. The only question to be determined by this court, is whether the Act of the Legislature of the State of Alabama is in violation of the Constitution of the United States.

The object sought and the evil intended to be cured by the Act, is clearly indicated on its face. The narrow and shallow channels in the bay and interior rivers of Alabama, required the aid of legislative protection. Navigation would be impeded by the sinking of wrecks, discharged ballast, &c., by careless, negligent and irresponsible seamen. On the narrow rivers particularly, competition, strife, explosions and collisions were of frequent occurrence, against all which the Legislature found it necessary to provide for the safety of navigation, and the protection of the life, property and rights of all persons trading or navigating the waters. But the whole of these police regulations were rendered inefficient and irresponsible, employees rendered more reckless, from the fact that the responsibility could not be fixed on the owner and real wrongdoer.

To remedy this the Act referred to was passed. The Act does not in any way prohibit, obstruct or interfere with free and uncontrolled navigation, and a compliance with it would not injure, but would encourage, both domestic and foreign trade and commerce.

Neither is the law partial; it acts alike on all, and is for the benefit and protection of all.

The Act, therefore, being for the purpose of carrying out and rendering effectual the undisputed and police regulations of the State, is itself of the same police character admitted by undisputed authority to be within the power of the States.

The coasting license authorizes the navigation of the waters, and the carrying on of trade and commerce within the States, but it does not pretend to authorize a disregard of the police laws passed by the States for the observance of its own citizens. All laws for the protection of life, health and property, inspection laws, and laws to prevent strife and confusion in bays, harbors and rivers, and to secure the rights of vessels navigating the waters, are of this kind.

The Legislature of New York passed "An Act requiring the master of every vessel arriving at New York from a foreign port, or any port of any other of the States, under certain penalties, to make a report in writing containing the names, &c., of all passengers." The ship in question landed passengers, and failed and refused to file a report as required. A suit was brought for the penalty. The defense was that the law was unconstitutional; but it was held good, by the Supreme Court of the United States, as a police law. The case at bar and that above cited, differ in this only—one requires the names of passengers to be recorded, and the other requires the owners' names to be recorded. The law of New York was for the protection of her citizens only. The Act of Alabama was for the mutual benefit of all persons and vessels.

3 Pet., 102; 2 Paine, C. C., 429.

The State of Pennsylvania passed an Act requiring all vessels to take a pilot, and on refusal, to pay to the master wardenof the pilots, for the use of the society, &c., one half the regular amount of pilotage. The Supreme Court of Pennsylvania and the Supreme Court of the United States held, that this law was not void or inconsistent with the Constitution or any of the Acts of Congress

Cooley v. Port Wardens, etc., 12 How., 299.

In the case of Veazie v. Moor, 14 How., 574, this court say: "The design and object of the clause of the Constitution under consideration was, to establish a perfect equality between the States, and to prevent unjust discrimination, &c., and in accordance therewith have been the expositions of this court in the decisions quoted by counsel, &c.

In nearly all the cases above referred to, it is held that a State has the right to make improvements in its navigable waters, in order to make the common right more beneficial to all, and to pass laws for mutual protection.

See, also, 18 Conn., 500; 4 Rich., 286; 44 Tex., 157; 4 Sand., 462, and the numerous cases there cited.

2. If it should be considered that the Act of Alabama is not a police regulation, still, as it is necessary for the protection and security of the rights of all persons trading and navigating the rivers, and is not in direct conflict with any Act of Congress, it will be held good. It was never intended by Congress, in passing general laws for all the waters of the Union, to prohibit the States from passing such other regulations not in conflict, that might be found necessary for safe and peaceful navigation on particular streams or localities. In 14 How., 296, it is said that "The grant of commercial power to Congress does not forbid the States from passing laws, not in conflict with the Acts of Congress. The power to regulate commerce includes various subjects, upon some of which there should be uniform rule, and upon others different rules in different localities.

In the case 4 Sand., the court, after commenting on the authorities of the Supreme Court of the United States, says: "If any principle may be deduced from the decisions and opinions of the judges of that high tribunal, it is this: that each State may pass such laws affecting commerce to operate within its own limits, not in conflict with the provisions of the Constitution of the United States or Acts of Congress, as are necessary for the preservation of the life, the health, the personal rights and property of its citizens, and of those enjoying its protection." A great majority of the cases already cited hold the same. The object of the Act of Alabama, was to afford all passengers and persons trading or navigating the waters, some certain evidence by which to sustain their rights or redress their wrongs, and a means of getting at the secret wrong-doers; to give fair play and ready redress to all. Upon examining this Act with the Acts of Congress, it will be seen that it does not conflict with the Acts of Congress; it is rather in addition or in aid of the objects of those laws.

3. There are three classes of these cases appealed from the Supreme Court of Alabama, one of which was engaged in running from Mobile to Montgomery, one in towing vessels in and about the port of Mobile, and one between New Orleans and Montgomery. As to the first two boats mentioned, they are domestic vessels entirely, running on our own waters and within our limits, and so regularly occupied and engaged, and not between the ports of different States. The mere fact, therefore, that they happened to have a coasting license on board, cannot help them. The Supreme Court of the United States, in 14 How., 573, says: "These categories are, 1st. Commerce with foreign nations; 2d. Commerce among the several states; 3d. Commerce with the Indian tribes. Taking the term 'commerce' in its broadest acceptation, supposing it to embrace not merely traffic but the means and vehicles by which it is prosecuted, can it properly be made to include objects and purposes such as those contemplated by the law under review? Commerce with foreign nations must signify commerce which, in some sense, is necessarily connected with those nations; transactions which either immediately or at some stage of their progress, must be extraterritorial. It can never be applied to transactions wholly internal," &c.

Mr. Justice Nelson delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a writ of error to the Supreme Court of the State of Alabama.

The suit was brought by the plaintiffs below, commissioners of pilotage of the harbor of Mobile, against the steamboat Bagaby, of which Sinnot, the defendant, was master, to recover certain penalties for a violation of the law of the State of Alabama, passed February 15, 1854, entitled "An Act to Provide for the Registration of the Names of Steamboat Owners."

The 1st section of the Act provides, that it shall be the duty of the owners of steamboats navigating the waters of the State, before such boat shall leave the port of Mobile, to file in the office of the probate judge a statement in writing, setting forth the name of the steamboat and of the owner or owners, his or their place or places of residence, and their interest therein, which statement shall be signed and sworn to by the owners, or their agent or attorney, and which statement shall be recorded by the said judge of probate; and, also, in case of a sale of said boat, it is made the duty of the vendee to file a statement of the change of ownership, his place of residence, and the interest transferred, which statement shall be signed by the vendor and vendee, his or their agent or attorney, and recorded in the office of the aforesaid judge.

The 2d section provides, that if any person or persons, being owner or owners of any steamboat, shall run, or permit the same to be run or navigated, on any of the waters of the State, without having first filed the statement as provided by the Act, he or they shall forfeit the sum of $500, to be recovered in the name of the Commissioners of Pilotage of the Bay of Mobile, either by a suit against the owners or by attachment against the boat, the one half to the use of the Commissioners, and the other half to the person or persons who shall first inform said Commissioners.

The steamboat Bagaby in question was seized and detained under this Act until discharged, on a bond being given to pay and satisfy any judgment that might be rendered in the suit. A judgment was subsequently rendered against the vessel in the City Court of Mobile, for the penalty of $500, with costs, which, on an appeal to the Supreme Court, was affirmed.

The material facts in the case are, that the steamboat was engaged in navigation and commerce between the City of New Orleans, in the State of Louisiana, and the cities of Montgomery and Wetumpka, in the State of Alabama, and that she touched at the City of Mobile only in the course of her navigation and trade between the ports and places above mentioned; that she was an American vessel, built at Pittsburg, in the State of Pennsylvania, and was duly enrolled and licensed in pursuance of the laws of the United States, and had been regularly cleared at the port of New Orleans for the ports of Montgomery and Wetumpka, whither she was destined at the time of the seizure and detention under the Act in question.

The plaintiffs in error, the master, and stipulators in the court below, insist that the judgment rendered against them is erroneous, upon the ground that the Statute of the Legislature of the State of Alabama is unconstitutional and void, it being in conflict with that clause in the Constitution which confers upon Congress the power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States," and the Acts of Congress passed in pursuance thereof. The Act of Congress relied on is that of the 18th Feb., 1793, 1 Stat. at L., 305, providing for the enrollment and license of vessels engaged in the coasting trade. The force and effect of this Act was examined in the case of Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat., pp. 210, 214, and it was there held that vessels enrolled and licensed in pursuance of it had conferred upon them as full and complete authority to carry on this trade as was in the power of Congress to confer.

The Chief Justice says (speaking of the 1st section): "This section seems to the court to contain a positive enactment that the vessels it describes shall be entitled to the privileges of ships or vessels employed in the coasting trade. These privileges cannot be separated from the trade, and cannot be enjoyed unless the trade may be prosecuted." Again; the court say, to construe these words otherwise than as entitling the ships or vessels described to carry on the coasting trade would be, we think, to disregard the apparent intent of the Act. And again; speaking of the license provided for in the 4th section, the word "license" means permission or authority; and a license to do any particular thing is a permission or authority to do that thing, and if granted by a person having power to grant it, transfers to the grantee the right to do whatever it purports to authorize. It certainly transfers to him all the right which the grantor can transfer, to do what is within the terms of the license.

The license is general in its terms, according to the form given in the Act of Congress: "License is hereby granted for the said steamboat (naming her) to be employed in carrying on the coasting trade for one year from the date hereof, and no longer."

In the case already referred to, it was denied in the argument that these words authorized a voyage from New Jersey to New York. The court observed, in answer to this objection: It is true that no ports are specified; but it is equally true that the words are perfectly intelligible, and do confer such authority as unquestionably as if the ports had been mentioned. The coasting trade is a term well understood. The law has defined it, and all know its meaning perfectly. The Act describes with great minuteness the various operations of vessels engaged in it; and it cannot, we think, be doubted that a voyage from New Jersey to New York is one of those operations.

On looking into the Act of Congress regulating the coasting trade, it will be found that many conditions are to be complied with by the owners of vessels, before the granting of the enrollment or license. 1. The vessel must possess the same qualifications, and the same requisites must be complied with, as are made necessary to the registering of ships or vessels engaged in the foreign trade by the Act of December, 31, 1792 (1 Stat. at L., 287). These conditions are many and important, as will be seen by a reference to the Act. 2. A bond must be given by the husband, or managing owner, and the master, with sureties to the satisfaction of the collector, conditioned that such vessel shall not be employed in any trade by which the United States shall be defrauded of its revenues; and also the master must make oath that he is a citizen of the United States; that the license shall not be used for any other vessel or any other employment than that for which it is granted, or in any trade or business in fraud of the public revenues, as a condition to the granting of the license. These are the guards and restraints, and the only guards and restraints which Congress has seen fit to annex to the privileges of ships and vessels engaged in the coasting trade, and upon a compliance with which, as we have seen, as full and complete authority is conferred by the license to carry on the trade as Congress is capable of conferring.

Now, the Act of the Legislature of the State of Alabama imposes another and an additional condition to the privilege of carrying on this trade within her waters, namely: the filing of a statement in writing, in the office of the Probate Judge of Mobile County, setting forth: 1. The name of the vessel; 2. The name of the owner or owners; 3 His or their place or places of residence; and 4. The interest each has in the vessel. Which statement must be sworn to by the party, or his agent or attorney. And the like statement, mutatis mutandis, is required to be made each time a change of owners of the vessel takes place. Unless this condition of navigation and trade within the waters of Alabama is complied with, the vessel is forbidden to leave the port of Mobile, under the penalty of $500 for each offense.

If the interpretation of the court, as to the force and effect of the privileges afforded to the vessel by the enrollment and license in the case of Gibbons v. Ogden are to be maintained, it can require no argument to show a direct conflict between this Act of the State and the Act of Congress reglating this trade. Certainly, if this state law can be upheld, the full enjoyment of the right to carry on the coasting trade, as heretofore adjudged by this court, under the enrollment and license, is denied to the vessel in question.

If anything further could be necessary, we might refer to the enrollment prescribed by the Act of Congress, by which it is made the duty of the owner to furnish, under oath, to the collectors, all the information required by this state law, and which is incorporated in the body of the enrollment. Congress, therefore, has legislated on the very subject which the State Act has undertaken to regulate, and has limited its regulation in the matter to a registry at the home port.

It has been argued, however, that this Act of the State is but the exercise of a police power, which power has not been surrendered to the General Government, but reserved to the States; and hence, even if the law should be found in conflict with the Act of Congress, it must still be regarded as a valid law, and as excepted out of and from the commercial power.

This position is not a new one; it has often been presented to this court, and in every instance the same answer given to it. It was strongly pressed in the New York case of Gibbons v. Ogden. The court, in answer to it, observed: "It has been contended, that if a law passed by a State, in the exercise of its acknowledged sovereignty, comes in conflict with a law passed by Congress in pursuance of the Constitution, they affect the subject and each other, like equal opposing forces." But, the court say, the framers of the Constitution foresaw this state of things, and provided for it, by declaring the supremacy not only of itself, but of the laws made in pursuance of it. The nullity of any Act inconsistent with the Constitution, is produced by the declaration that the Constitution is the supreme law. The appropriate application of that part of the clause which confers the same supremacy on laws and treaties, is to such Acts of the State Legislatures as to do not transcend their powers, but, though enacted in the execution of acknowledged state powers, interfere with, or are contrary to, the laws of Congress, made in pursuance of the Constitution, or some treaty made under the authority of the United States. In every such case, the Act of Congress or treaty is supreme; and the law of the State, though enacted in the exercise of powers not controverted, must yield to it. The same doctrine was asserted in the case of Brown v. The State of Maryland, 12. Wheat., pages 449, 449, and in numerous other cases. 5 How., pp. 573, 574, 579, 581; 2 Pet., 251, 252; 4 Wheat., pp 405, 406, 436.

We agree, that in the application of this principle of supremacy of an Act of Congress in a case where the state law is but an exercise of a reserved power, the repugnance or conflict should be direct and positive, so that the two Acts could not be reconciled or consistently stand together; and also that the Act of Congress should have been passed in the exercise of a clear power under the Constitution, such as that in question.

The whole commercial marine of the country is placed by the Constitution under the regulation of Congress, and all laws passed by that body in the regulation of navigation and trade, whether foreign or coastwise, is therefore but the exercise of an undisputed power. When, therefore, an Act of the Legislature of a State prescribes a regulation of the subject repugnant to and inconsistent with the regulation of Congress, the state law must give way; and this, without regard to the source of power whence the State Legislature derived its enactment.

This paramount authority of the Act of Congress is not only conferred by the Constitution itself, but is the logical result of the power over the subject conferred upon that body by the States. They surrendered this power to the General Government; and to the extent of the fair excercise of it by Congress, the Act must be supreme.

The power of Congress, however, over the subject does not extend further than the regulation of commerce with foreign nations and among the several States. Beyond these limits the States have not surrendered their power over the subject, and may exercise it independently of any control or interference of the General Government; and there has been much controversy, and probably will continue to be, both by the bench and the bar, in fixing the true boundary line between the power of Congress under the commercial grant and the power reserved to the States. But in all these discussions, or nearly all of them, it has been admitted, that if the Act of Congress fell clearly within the power conferred upon that body by the Constitution, there was an end of the controversy. The law of Congress was supreme.

These questions have arisen under the quarantine and health laws of the States—laws imposing a tax upon imports and passengers, admitted to have been passed under the police power of the States, and which had not been surrendered to the General Government. The laws of the States have been upheld by the court, except in cases where they were in conflict, or were adjudged by the court to be in conflict, with the Act of Congress.

Upon the whole, after the maturest consideration the court have been able to give to the case, we are constrained to hold, that the Act of Legislature of the State is in conflict with the Constitution and law of the United States and, therefore, void.

The judgment of the court below is reversed.

v.

GORHAM DAVENPORT ET AL., Commissioners of Pilotage of the Bay and Harbor of MOBILE, Libts.

(See S. C., 22 How., 244-246.)

Sinnot v. Davenport, ante, p. 243, affirmed.

The case is, in all respects, like the one of Sinnot v. Davenport, ante.

This steamboat was employed in aid of vessels engaged in the foreign or coastwise trade, either in the delivery of their cargoes in or towing the vessels to port, which was but the prolongation of their voyage.

The case, therefore, is not distinguishable in principle from the one above referred to.

Argued Dec. 7, 1859. Decided Dec. 27, 1859.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Alabama.

This was an action in the nature of a libel filed in the City Court of Mobile, in the State of Alabama, by the Commissioners of Pilotage, for the bay and harbor of Mobile, against the Steamboat Swan, claiming $500 for violation of an Act entitled, "An Act to provide for the registration of steamboats owner," approved Feb. 15, 1854.

The case having been submitted to the court on an agreed statement of facts, a decree was entered in favor of the libelants for the said amount, with costs.

On appeal to the Supreme Court, this decree was affirmed; whereupon the defendants sued out this writ of error.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

See, also, the preceding case.

Mr. P. Phillips, for plaintiffs in error.

Messrs. C. C. Clay, Jr., and J. T. Taylor, for appellees.

For the argument, see argument of same counsel in the preceding cause.

Mr. Justice Nelson delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a writ of error to the Supreme Court of the State of Alabama.

The case is, in all respects, like the one just decided except it is insisted that the steamboat was employed as a lighter and towboat upon waters within the State of Alabama, and therefore engaged exclusively in the domestic trade and commerce of the State.

According to the admitted state of facts, this boat was engaged in lightering goods from and to vessels anchored in the lower Bay of Mobile, and the wharves of the city, and in stowing vessels anchored there to and from the city, and, in some instances, towing the same bayond the outer bar of the day, and into the Gulf to the distance of several miles. This boat was duly enrolled and licensed to carry on the coasting trade at the time she was engaged in this business, and of the seizure under the state law.

It also appears from the answer, and which facts are admitted to be true, that the port of Mobile is resorted to and frequented by ships and vessels, of different size in tonnage, engaged in the trade and commerce of the United States with foreign nations and among the several States; that the vessels of small size and tonnage are accustomed to come up to the wharves of the city and discharge their cargo, but that large vessels frequenting said port cannot come up, on account of the shallowness of the waters in some parts of the bay, and are compelled to anchor at the lower bay, and to discharge and receive their cargo by lighters; and that the steamboat of claimants was engaged in lightering goods to and from said vessels, and in towing vessels to and from the lower bay and the wharves of the city.

It is quite apparent, from the facts admitted in the case, that this steamboat was employed in aid of vessels engaged in the foreign or coastwise trade and commerce of the United States, either in the delivery of their cargoes, or in towing the vessels themselves to the port of Mobile. The character of the navigation and business in which it was employed cannot be distinguished from that in which the vessels it towed or unloaded were engaged. The lightering or towing was but the prolongation of the voyage of the vessels assisted to their port of destination. The case, therefore, is not distinguishable in principle from the one above referred to.

Judgment of the court below reversed.

EBER B. WARD, Survivor of Himself and SAM'L WARD, Deceased, Owner of the Steamboat DETROIT, Appt.,

v.

CHARLES THOMPSON.

(See S. C., 22 How., 330-334.)

Admiralty has no jurisdiction of contract of partnership in a ship—what is such partnership.

A court of admiralty will not assume jurisdiction of a contract of partnership in the earnings of a ship.

If the party desires an account, his remedy is in a court of chancery.

If his complaint be for a breach of some independent covenant, he should seek his remedy in a court of common law.

Where the parties have joined together to carry on a certain adventure or trade, for their mutual profit—one contributing the vessel, the other his skill, labor and experience, &c., and there is a communion of profits, on a fixed ratio, it is a partnership.

Of such a contract, a court of admiralty has no jurisdiction.

Submitted Dec. 13, 1859. Decided Dec. 27, 1859.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Michigan.

The libel in this case was filed in the District Court of the United States for the District of Michigan, by the appellant, against Charles Thompson, the appellee, for breach of a certain contract.

The libel alleged "that in the month of June, 1852, the libelant and Samuel Ward chartered the steamboat Detroit to said Thompson for two years as follows: This libelant was to furnish said steamboat to said Thompson in good order and condition, which he complied with in all respects. The said Thompson was to run said boat between Penetanguishene and other ports on the Georgian Bay and the Sault Ste. Marie, as a passenger and freight boat. That he was to employ good, careful and competent officers and men on board of said boat, except the clerk, who was to be employed by this libelant. That the clerk was to receive all the earnings of said boat; and after paying her expenses, to remit the first net $6,000, to this libelant, and one half of the further net proceeds."

These allegations formed the substance of the contract in question.

A preliminary motion by the respondent, Thompson, to dismiss the libel, was made and heard on the ground that the contract was one of partnership. The court held otherwise. The cause was then heard on the merits, and the court dismissed the libel on the ground that Ward had himself violated the contract by instigating a seizure by the United States Collector, and by not restoring the boat afterwards to Thompson. The libelant thereupon appealed to the circuit court, which court affirmed the decree below, but on a different ground, to wit: on the ground that the contract was one of partnership, and the court had no jurisdiction.

From this decree Ward has appealed to this court.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. John S. Newberry and A. Russell, for plaintiff in error:

We submit that the district court has jurisdiction over contracts relating to vessels engaged in foreign trade upon the lakes, independently of the Act of Feb. 26, 1845, by virtue of the Federal Constitution and the Judiciary Act of Sept. 24, 1789. In other words, the admiralty jurisdiction embraced the lakes and other navigable waters, and was not confined to tide waters. This doctrine is fully stated in the case of The Genesee Chief, 12 How., 443, and it is, we submit, the correct doctrine.

2 Conk. Adm., p. 16.

If this be so, then the Act of 1845 is merely declaratory of the previous law, so far as it goes.

It cannot be considered a restraining Act, so far as to exclude jurisdiction not embraced within its terms; for it purports, and was evidently intended, to be an enlarging Act.

The contract in question was a species of charter-party, in which the owner parts with the entire possession to the charterer.

NOTE.—Partnership; when a community of profits creates a partnership; exceptions.

To constitute a partnership there must be a community of interests, a participation in profit and loss. Pelichy v. Hamilton, 1 Wash., 491; Coope v. Eyre, 1 H. Bl., 37; Forbes, Inst. of Scot. Law, part 2, b. 3, sec. 3, p. 184; Domat. Civ. Law, Vol. I., p. 85; 3 Kent's Com., p. 23; Gow on Part., p. 1; Green v. Beesley, 2 Bing. N. C., 108; Bond v. Pittard, 3 Mees. & W., 357.

A participation in the profits is sufficient to constitute a partnership, because an agreement to share profits, alone, cannot prevent the legal consequences of also sharing losses for the benefit of creditors. Participation in profit will constitute a partnership as to third persons at least. Ex parte Langdale, 18 Ves., 301; Bisset on Part., p. 6; Waugh v. Carver, 2 H. Bl., 235; Cheap v. Cramond, 4 Barn. & A., 663; Guthwaite v. Duckworth, 12 East, 421; Wightman v. Townroe, 1 Maule & S., 412; Gilpin v. Enderby, 5 Barn. & A., 954; S. C., 1 Dow. & Ry., 570; Bloxon v. Pell, 2 W. A dormant partner is liable because he takes part of the profits, which is part of the fund the creditor looks to, to satisfy his demand. Freel v. The Campbells, Cooke, 8.

As towards third persons a partnership may arise by mere operation of law, against the intention of the parties thereto; but the actual intention or agreement of the parties will alone constitute a partnership as between themselves. Hazard v. Hazard, 1 Story, C. C., 371, and cases cited. Gill v. Kuhn, 6 S. & R., 333.

The law will not allow one who participates in profits to withdraw from the obligations of a partner. Hesketh v. Blanchard, 4 East, 144; Perry v. Hone, 2 Car. & P., 401; Meyer v. Sharpe, 5 Taunt., 74; Peacock v. Peacock, 2 Camp., 45; S. C., 16 Ves., 56; Miller v. Hughes, 1 Mass., 54; Smith v. Watson, 2 Barn. & C., 401; S. C., 3 Dow. & Ry., 751.

The general rule that actual participation in profits creates a partnership as towards third persons, has no application to a case of mere service or special agency, where the employee has no power in the firm and no such interest in the profits as will enable him to go into a court of equity to enforce a lien for the same, or to compel an account. Berthold v. Goldsmith, 65 U. S., post.

Share of the profits as interest on money loaned, or for services, does not constitute a partnership. Pleasants v. Fants, 22 Wall., 116; In re Francis, 2 Sawy., 286; S. C., 7 Bank. The action is between a citizen and an alien, so that the federal courts have jurisdiction.

Messrs. George E. Hand and George V. N. Lothrop, for appellee:

The district court had no jurisdiction in admiralty, of this cause.

The district court has no general admiralty jurisdiction. It possesses jurisdiction solely by the Act of Congress of Feb. 26, 1845. This objection was not taken below. Before the decisions of this court at the last term, an impression prevailed that the Act of Congress was to be construed with greater latitude. But those decisions have indicated the limitations.

Allen v. Newberry, 62 U. S. (21 How.), 244.

And it is never too late to interpose this objection.

Cutler v. Rae, 7 How., 729.

We also insist that the Wards and Thompson were partners under the agreement of June 10, 1852; and that this court has no jurisdiction of partnership matters.

We insist that the libelant is estopped to deny the partnership. It was, before this libel was filed, res adjudicata.

The very question had arisen in a civil action brought by Thompson against the Wards in the Queen's Bench of Canada. The point was expressly raised by the Wards, ruled in their favor, and they had the benefit of it.

See Sto. Confl. Laws, secs. 604, 609; 1 Greenl. Ev., secs. 22, 207.

As to whether the contract in question was a partnership, see Coll. on Part., 2, 13; Champion v. Bostwick, 18 Wend., 183.

The last American edition of Coll. Part. brings together nearly the whole learning of the American and English law on this subject. Book 1, ch. 1, sec. 1.

But as we understand it, this point has been passed on in this court in late decisions. Vandewater v. Mills, 60 U. S. (19 How.), 82; Grant v. Poillon, 61 U. S. (20 How.), 162.

Mr. Justice Grier delivered the opinion of the court:

The articles of agreement containing the contract, which is the subject-matter of this suit, are denominated in the libel a charter-party of the steamboat Detroit to respondent. The answer denies that he had chartered the vessel, and alleges that the writing declared on is a contract of partnership, and not a charter-party. The circuit court agreed with the respondent as to the construction of the contract, and consequently dismissed the bill.

A court of admiralty takes cognizance of certain questions between part owners, as to the possession and employment of the ship, but will not assume jurisdiction in matters of account between them. The Orleans v. Phœbus, 11 Pet., 175. It is not disputed that a contract of partnership in the earnings of a ship comes within the same category. If the party desires an account, his remedy is in a court of chancery. If his complaint be for a breach of some independent covenant, he should seek his remedy in a court of common law.

A charter-party is defined to be "a contract by which a ship, or some principal part thereof, is let to a merchant, for the conveyance of goods on a determined voyage to one or more places."

A contract of partnership is where parties join together their money, goods, labor or skill, for the purposes of trade or gain, and where there is a community of profits.

The only characteristics of a charter-party to be found in this contract are, that the subject of it is a ship, and that libelants are owners. There is no letting or hiring of the ship to the respondent for a given voyage, to be employed by him for his own profit. On the contrary, the Wards contributed a steamboat, to be put into a line for freight and passengers, which has also a contract for carrying the mail. Thompson contributes the good will of an established line, together with his care, skill and experience. He is to have the general management of the business, and the selection of Where R. advanced to M., a showman, $700, upon the agreement that after the payment of all expenses R. was to receive back the $700, and one half of the net profits, held, that R. and M. were partners as to third person, irrespective of any agreement to the contrary between themselves. Haas v. Boat, 26 Hun, 632; 16 Hun, 526.

A person who has no interest in the business of a firm nor in the capital invested, save that he is to receive a share of the profits for money loaned for the benefit of the business, is not a partner, and is not liable as such. Crawford, 76 N. Y., 97.

The test of partnership is a community of profit, a specific interest in the profits, as profits, in contradistinction to a stipulated portion of the profits as a compensation for services. Loomis v. An agreement between creditors of a particular debtor to advance the moneys necessary to carry on the business of their debtor for their own profit, they to contribute the funds, to purchase stock, in equal proportions, and the profits and losses of the enterprise to be shared by them equally, it seems, makes them partners in respect to that enterprise. Wills v. Simmons, 51 How. Pr., 48.

As to the community of profits constituting a partnership or a mere rate of compensation, see, also, Bisset on Part., pp. 9–32.

Where seamen take a share, by agreement with the ship owner, in the profits of a whale fishery, by way of compensation for their services, or in shipments to India, which is usual, the responsibility of partners has never been supposed to attach. ISRAEL M. MOORE, MADISON M. MORRIS, HENRY MORRIS, JAMES P. KELLEM, JOHN F. BLACK, JAMES F. BATTE AND WILLIAM M. CRAIG.

(See S. C., 22 How., 185–191.)

State decision, as to State Statute, conclusive—soldier's land—courts cannot add exception to Statute.

Where it has been decided by the Supreme Court of Arkansas that a special Act of that State authorized the administrator to make a valid deed, and devest the title of the heirs, such decision on the effect of the state law, is conclusive on this court.

The Act of 1826, allowing the soldier to exchange his land, did not carry with it the prohibition against alienation, contained in the Act of 1812.

Where the Legislature makes a plain provision, without making any exception, the courts of justice can make none, as it would be legislating to do so.

Submitted Dec. 8, 1859. Decided Dec. 27, 1859.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Arkansas.

This was an action of ejectment brought in the Circuit Court of White County, Arkansas, by the plaintiffs in error, the grantees of the heirs at law of Allen McVey, deceased, to recover a certain quarter section of land.

The trial resulted in a verdict and judgment for the defendants. This judgment having been affirmed by the Supreme Court of Arkansas, the plaintiffs sued out this writ of error.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Mr. A. Fowler, for plaintiffs in error:

By the Act of Congress approved May 6, 1812, granting bounty lands to soldiers, their heirs and legal representatives, it is expressly declared that "all sales, mortgages, contracts or agreements of any nature whatever, made prior thereto"—the issuance of the patent—"should be held null and void."

2 U. S. Stat. at L., 729.

The Act of May 22, 1826, on the same subject, declares that a soldier or his heirs to whom bounty land has been patented in Arkansas, and is unfit for cultivation, who has removed or shall remove to Arkansas with a view to actual settlement on the land, &c., may relinquish such land to the United States, and enter a like quantity of land elsewhere in the district, &c., which may be patented to him, &c.

4 Stat. at L., p. 190, ch. 147.

This latter Act was afterwards revived and continued in force by Act of May 27, 1840.

See 5 Story U. S. L., p. 2792.

The several amendatory Acts engrafted on the Act of May 6, 1812, continue also in force the prohibitory clause declaring all sales, contracts, &c., void where they are made before the patent issues. The contract of sale made by McVey to Pelham was null and void; and the land entered and patented in McVey's name, inured to the benefit of his heirs and their assignees after the patent was issued—and not to Pelham or his assignees under such void contract.

The circuit court twice expressly decided that the contract of sale from McVey to Pelham was valid, denying distinctly the rights of McVey's heirs and their assignees under these Acts of Congress; which the Supreme Court of the State broadly affirmed.

18 Ark., 475, 480.

Hence the plaintiffs have a right to a revision of the judgment, under the 25th section of the Judiciary Act of 1789.

The whole legislation upon these bounty lands, especially the Acts above referred to, shows exclusivly the intention of Congress to guard and protect the rights of the soldier and his heirs, and to prevent speculation in the lands.

And in all such cases, the courts construe such Acts favorably and liberally for the protection of the recipients of the bounty of the government, and against the speculators in such bounty.

Opinion of Atty-Gen. Taney, No. 115, sec. 2, Laws Instr. & Opin., p. 177; Nick's Heirs v. Rector, 4 Ark., 279; Ross v. Doe, ex dem. Barland, 1 Pet., 667; Wynn v. Garland, 16 Ark., 462; McElyea v. Hayter, 2 Port. Ala., 152.

The established rule of construction, and which it is insisted on the part of the plaintiffs in error is applicable to and protects them in this case, is, that where there are several legislative Acts in pari materia, relating to the same subject-matter as these are, they must be taken together and compared, in their construction as one Act. They must be considered as all governed by one spirit and policy, and intending to be consistent and harmonious in all their parts and provisions.

1 Kent's Com., 5th ed., 463; White v. Johnson, 23 Miss., 74; Rex v. Loxdale, 1 Burn., 447; Ailesbury v. Pattison, 1 Doug., 30; Sm. Const. & Stat. Const., secs. 636–639, 642, 643.

And the foregoing rule applies, although some of the statutes may have expired or are not referred to in the subsequent Acts.

1 Kent's Com., 5th ed. 463; Rex v. Loxdale, 1 Burn., 447; Sm. Const. and Stat. Constr., secs. 637, 638.

Even in case of a subsequent and amendatory Act of Limitation not providing for a case specified in the former Act, it will, by the court, be intended and presumed that the Legislature designed the latter to be governed by the former Act.

Robertson v. DeMoss, 28 Miss, 301: see, also, on this point, Sm. Const. and Stat. Const., secs. 638 and 643.

The intention of Congress, from a fair construction of the several Acts on the subject, was manifestly to protect the soldier in his float, as much as in his original warrant, and in either case to make all contracts of sale before the issuing of the patent, void. And an object or thing which is within the intention of the Legislature in making a statute, is as much within the Statute as if it were within the letter.

People v. Utica Ins. Co., 15 Johns., 380, 381; Sm. Const. and Stat. Const., sec. 510.

Mr. Geo. C. Watkins, for the defendants in error:

1. Both parties claim title to the land in controversy, under a patent from the United States to Allen McVey. It is not, therefore, in the mouth of either party to question that title. The presumption would be that the patent emanated regularly and in accordance with law, even if that did not appear on this record; for example, the patent was not issued until after McVey's death, but since the Act of Congress of May 20, 1836, that defect is fully cured.

See Galloway v. Finley, 12 Pet., 264.

Whether the patentee had died before the patent issued and before the location was made, the patent was held valid under that Act.

See, also, Hansford v. Minor's Heirs, 4 Bibb., 385; McCracken v. Beal, 3 A. K. Marsh., 208; Bowman v. Violet, 4 Mon., 351; Adams v. Logan, 6 Mon., 177; Lewis v. McGee, 1 A. K. Marsh., 200; Skeene v. Fishback, 1 A. K. Marsh., 356.

It is true that the Military Bounty Act of 1812 contained a prohibition against any sale or assignment by the soldier, of his bounty, until after the issuance of the patent, declaring all such assignments void. There was a motive as expressed in the Act itself, which was to prevent the land, so long as the title remained in the government, from being subject to the debts of the soldiers. And the reason of the law was, to take away from the soldier the temptation of selling his equitable interest in a tract of land situate in a new and wild region of country, at a great distance from the soldier, and which he had never visited, nor had any opportunities for judging of its value.

But as those military bounties were selected by lottery, it inevitably resulted that in many instances the lands proved unfit for cultivation and worthless, and on the 22d May, 1826, an Act of Congress was passed, authorizing the soldier to surrender and reconvey to the United States the bounty tract which had been patented to him, and to locate in lieu of it a like quantity of the public land within the military district, on proof to the satisfaction of the proper Register and Receiver that the tract originally patented to him was unfit for cultivation, and that his right to it had not been devested or incumbered by sale or otherwise; and in order to entitle himself to the benefits of the Act, the soldier must have removed to the Territory of Arkansas, with a view to actual settlement on the land drawn by him. This Act was revived and extended by various Acts until the Act of 27th May, 1840, which revived and extended it for five years from that date. Such rights to locate were called "floats," and as proved in this case, and indeed a part of the public history of Arkansas, were the common subject of sale and transfer. At the time McVey sold his right of float to William Pelham, the Act of 1840, authorizing such floats, was in force. If it was a power coupled with an interest, it did not cease after McVey's death. But if it was a mere naked power, it did cease, and the location, &c., was void, and the plaintiffs, as heirs of McVey, cannot claim under it. But the plaintiffs are bound to claim under the patent, and so recognize the validity of Pelham's acts, and as a consequence, the validity of his title, because, unless he acted for himself, and not as the mere naked agent of McVey, he had no power to act.

This restriction against assignment in the Bounty Act of 1812 is not included within the terms, spirit or policy of the Acts of 1826, 1830 and 1840, allowing floats. Here the sale was not of the land drawn by the soldier, but of his floating right, a mere chose in action (Mulhollan v. Thomson, 13 Ark., 232), and after all the purposes of the Act of 1812 had been accomplished. McVey, in receiving pay for the sale of his float, would be guilty of an immoral and fraudulent act, to attempt to repudiate it. His supposed heirs, or rather those who tampered with them, stand in no better situation. Besides, according to the whole theory of our government, laws restricting alienation are to be strictly construed and not extended, without an express intention appears. It is inconsistent with the nature of property, if the individual owning property or a right to property has not the power to alienate it.

4 Kent's Com., 479.

But again, both parties in this action must concede that the title is out of the government by the patent to McVey, because without that neither has any pretense of title. The Act of Assembly authorizing the administrator of McVey to convey, was passed after the issuance of the patent, and when the title was beyond the control of the General Government, and so far as the legal title is concerned, the question is not whether the Legislature ought to have passed such an Act; but the question is, had that body the power; just as the question is, whether a court has jurisdiction.

But the right of the defendants to the land in controversy is good and available to them in this action, without reference to the Act of the Legislature, and without being bolstered up by it in any way. When it is considered that Maxwell and Walker must have known of the sale of his float by McVey to Pelham, they must have known that the fact of the sale from McVey to Pelham could be established.

Many worthless lands were relinquished to the United States, and floats obtained for others to be located in lieu of them. Floating rights were freely bought and sold for the then market value, and because of the delay, often several years, in the issuance of patents, the lands when located frequently change owners, the same as other lands before the issuance of a patent. Many valuable improvements have been made on lands thus acquired and held.

In a newly settled country, wild lands are only made valuable by the toil and expense of clearing and improving them. If, then, there be any question whether all of the restrictions of the Bounty Act of 1812, upon the alienation, before the issuance of the patent, of the tract originally allotted to the soldier, apply to the lands located in lieu of them, under the Act of 1826, and the subsequent Act continuing it in force, such a question becomes one of serious magnitude. Disaster and confusion must ever attend the disturbance of titles settled and acquiesced in.

The Act of 1812 was passed for a specific object, i. e., to give and secure a bounty to the soldier, restricting and protecting his rights down to the issuance of the patent. After that object had been accomplished, ensued the operation of the Act of 1826. That Act is in no sense supplementary to the Act of 1812. It does not re-enact or revive, or extend any of its provisions, so as also to revive by implication any of its restrictions. It granted no bounties, but dealt with those who had received their bounties and, by the issuance of patents, had become clothed with all the authority and free agency of ownership. They were no longer soldiers, but citizens and inhabitants of the territory to which they had removed with a view to actual settlement. The whole scope of the Act of 1826, is to make provisions for an exchange of lands in certain cases, pre-supposing that all the provisions of the Act of 1812 had been accomplished.

Mr. Justice Catron delivered the opinion of the court:

This cause is brought before us by writ of error to the Supreme Court of Arkansas, and presents a single question for our consideration.

Allen McVey served as a regular soldier in the war of 1812, and was entitled to a tract of 160 acres of land as a bounty for his services. The land was located and granted in what is now the State of Arkansas. By the Act of May 6, 1812 (2 Stat. at L., 728), which granted the bounty lands, all sales or agreements made by a grantee of these lands, before the patent issued, were declared to be void.

Many tracts of the lands granted turned out to be unfit for cultivation, so that the soldier took no benefit; and, as compensation, the Act of May 22, 1826 (4 Stat. at L., 190), declares that the soldier, or his heirs, to whom bounty land has been patented in the Territory of Arkansas, and which is unfit for cultivation, and who has removed or shall remove to Arkansas with a view to actual settlement on the land, may relinquish it to the United States, and enter a like quantity elsewhere in the district, which may be patented to him. This Act was continued in force by that of May 27th, 1840. (5 Stat. at L., 380.)

McVey surrendered his first patent according to the Act of 1826, and in 1842 another issued in his name for the land in dispute.

In 1834 McVey gave William Pelham a bond to convey to him the land that might be entered on his certificate of surrender (known as a float) and a power of attorney to locate the same, and obtain the patent. McVey died in 1836. In 1842 Pelham entered the land in controversy in McVey's name.

A special Act of the Legislature of the State of Arkansas was passed, authorizing McVey's administrator to convey the land to Pelham, which was done.

Afterwards, the plaintiffs in error obtained a conveyance from the heirs of McVey, on which their action of ejectment is founded. As the title vested in Allen McVey's heirs by the patent of 1842, they could well convey the land unless the administrator's deed stood in the way. Galloway v. Finley, 12 Pet., 264. That the special Act of Assembly authorized the administrator to make a valid deed, and devest the title of the heirs, was decided in this case by the Supreme Court of Arkansas, and which decision on the effect of the state law is conclusive on this court. We exercise jurisdiction to revise errors committed by state courts, where the plaintiff in error claims title by force of an Act of Congress, and the title has been rejected on the ground that the Act did not support it. And this raises the question, whether the Act of 1826 (4 Stat. at L., 190), allowing the soldier to exchange his land, carried with it the prohibition against alienation contained in the Act of 1812. (2 Stat. at L., 728).

The court below held that it did not, and that Allen McVey did lawfully bind himself to Pelham for title.

It is insisted that the Acts of 1812 and 1826 are on the same subject, must stand together as one provision, and the last Act carry with it the prohibition found in the first. We are of the opinion that the Acts have no necessary connection; that there was no good reason why the soldier who removed to Arkansas, and inspected his tract of land, then patented, and alienable, should not contract to convey the tract he might get in exchange. We can only here say, as we did in the case of French v. Spencer, 21 How., 238, that the Act of 1826 is plain on its face and single in its purpose; and that in such cases the rule is, that where the Legislature makes a plain provision, without making any exception, the courts of justice can make none, as it would be legislating to do so.

There being no other question presented by the record within the jurisdiction conferred on this court by the 25th section of the Judiciary Act, we order that judgment of the Supreme Court of Arkansas be affirmed.

JOHN CONE AND CARLOS J. CONE.

(See S. C., 22 How., 75–83.)

Acts of special agent must be within his authority —recitals in attorney's deed not evidence of his authority—admission of payment in, when good —principal not estopped—incompetent testimony.

When the authority conferred by letter of attorney is special and limited, the agent's acts under it, are valid only as they come within its scope and operation.

Bona fide purchasers are not entitled to repose credit in the recitals and declarations of the attorney, as expressed in his deed, that disclose the mode in which the authority has been exercised, and will not be protected against their falsity.

The principal is not estopped to deny their truth.

Where the deed, executed by an attorney, is apparently within the scope of his power, the admission therein of payment of the consideration, is competent testimony of the fact. But it is competent to his principal to show that the transaction was in appearance only, and not in fact, within the authority bestowed.

Testimony of one of the donors of the power, that he is informed and believes that the purchase money had not been paid to the grantors, was not admissible.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois.

This was an action of ejectment brought in the court below, by Morrill, the present plaintiff in error, against the present defendants in error..

The trial resulted in a verdict and judgment for the defendants; whereupon the plaintiff sued out this writ of error to this court, alleging error in the instructions of the court.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Williams, Grimshaw & Williams, for plaintiff in errror.

We insist that Beck's authority to sell and convey was a special and limited, and not a general power; that the taking of sufficient security on real estate, was an indispensable condition upon which his right to sell and convey depended, and that purchasers claiming under that power were bound, at their peril, to see that this condition was complied with, and that as the land was sold on a credit and no security for the purchase money was given or taken, the conveyance made by Beck was absolutely null and void.

Sug. Pow., 210, 262, 267. cases cited; 4 Cruise Dig., 146, 200; 1 Phil. Ev., 468; 1 Story on Agen., secs. 72, 126, 133; 4 Kent's Com., 329; Thatcher v. Powell, 6 Wheat., 119; Williams v. Peyton, 4 Wheat., 77; Nalle v. Fenwick, 4 Rand., 585; Williamson v. Berry, 8 How., 495; Williamson v. Irish Presb. Cong., 8 How., 565; Williamson v. Ball, 8 How., 566.

It is certainly true as a general principle, that no person can sell and convey a valid title to the land of another, without express authority to do so. It would be extremely dangerous to the security of land titles, to hold that when a person attempts so to do the owner would thereby lose his land, simply because he failed to sue for it or otherwise assert his right to it, when no person is occupying or otherwise interfering with it. Without going this length, it is impossible to sustain the title of the defendants and the judgment of the court below. It is a new and original idea, that a void title may become valid simply by lapse of time. Soldiers frequently sold, or gave powers of attorney to others to convey, their bounty lands, from 1815 to 1817, before the patent issued. If such persons have paid the taxes to the present time and the soldier has entirely neglected the land until recently, as well might it be said that these conveyances have become valid by lapse of time and the neglect and acquiescence of the owner; yet this idea has hardly entered into the conception of any lawyer, and such title has recently been sustained by the Supreme Court of Illinois.

Rose v. Buckland, 17 Ill., 310.

In both cases the conveyance is void. In the first case the power of attorney is void, in the other the act of the attorney is void; but this makes no difference in principle. One void act may be ratified or become valid by lapse of time and acquiescence, as well as another, without reference to the particular cause which renders them void. Being void, they are subject alike to the same law and incidents.

Gantly v. Ewing, 8 How., 713.

Mr. O. H. Browning, for defendant in error:

Nathaniel Abbott, with full knowledge that Beck, purporting to act as his attorney, had in his name, on Sept. 12, 1820, signed, sealed, acknowledged and delivered to O'Hara, a deed whereby he, said Abbott, purported to convey to said O'Hara in fee simple the land in controversy; in Feb. 1821, duly executed and transmitted to Beck a power of attorney to be spread upon the records authorizing Beck, for him and in his name, to sell and convey the land; and deliberately, and with the express intention of covering what had been already done by Beck, and to give it the semblance, lineaments and features of a pre-existing instrument, antedated it, July 14, 1820; and thus antedated, with its apparent priority in time to the deed made by Beck in September, it was put upon record for the inspection of all who might afterwards come to purchase the land conveyed apparently by its authority.

Thirty years after all this, the defendant, in good faith, purchased the land, and now Mr. Abbott wishes to repudiate the entire transaction upon the ground that when the deed was made the power of attorney had no existence, in fact, admitting at the same time, that he did afterwards execute the power of attorney and antedate it. Every principle of law and justice requires that Abbott and all who claim under him, should be absolutely estopped to deny that Beck, when he made the deed, had the power of attorney with its date of July 14, 1820, by which he was invested with full power to convey.

Mr. Justice Campbell delivered the opinion of the court:

This suit was brought for the recovery of a parcel of land lying in the tract appropriated for military bounties in Illinois, and granted by the United States in 1818 to Benjamin Abbott, a private in their army in the war of 1812, as bounty. The title of the plaintiff consisted of a certified copy of the patent to Abbott, and a quitclaim deed of Abbott to him, dated in 1855. He also produced a deed from Nathaniel Abbott to him, dated in 1838. The defendants exhibited the original patent to Abbott; his deed to Nathaniel Abbott, dated in 1818, for the same land; a deed from Nathaniel Abbott, John

Low, and John D. Abbott, dated 12th September, 1820, to William O'Hara, and executed by Abraham Beck as attorney, and connected themselves with this deed by a number of mesne conveyances, the last of which was to the defendants, and was executed in April, 1850. They entered upon the land under this deed, and paid taxes until the commencement of this suit. These conveyances were recorded in the proper office. The questions presented by the bill of exceptions sealed for the plaintiff on the trial arise on the conveyance to Wm. O'Hara, by Nathaniel Abbott, John Low and John D. Abbott.

This deed purports to have been made upon a pecuniary consideration, the amount and receipt of which is acknowledged. The letter of attorney to Beck is dated the 14th July, 1820, and was recorded the 30th July, 1821. It authorizes the attorney to sell and convey some sixty-four parcels of land, including the one in dispute, in the military tract described in a schedule annexed, for such price and to such persons as he might think fit, and to make, execute and deliver good and sufficient warranty deeds to them. To the ordinary testimonium clause a proviso was added, "that the condition is understood to be such, that our said attorney is to take sufficient security on real estate for all the lands which may be sold on a credit." The donors of this power of attorney reside in New Hampshire; the attorney in Missouri.

The plaintiff read a deposition of John Low, one of the donors of the power, from which we collect that Beck, the attorney, was verbally authorized to find a purchaser for the lands described in the schedule, and other parcels in the military tract in Illinois, and agreed with O'Hara upon the price and term of credit. That this agreement was communicated by letter to the witness, who sanctioned it, and sent a power of attorney to Beck to complete the sale and to execute the titles, but to reserve a mortgage on the lands sold to secure the payment of the purchase money.

O'Hara objected to giving a mortgage upon the lands purchased by him, but offered to give security upon other real property. Thereupon the attorney prepared a deed for all the lands embraced in the contract to O'Hara, and took his notes for the purchase money, and gave to him his guaranty that his constituents would confirm the sale, and received from him a covenant that whenever Beck should receive a power of attorney to convey said lands and confirm his proceedings, and deliver the same to him, O'Hara, he would deliver to Beck for his constituents a sufficient mortgage upon real property to secure the price. The power of attorney produced by the defendants was prepared by Beck without the condition, and sent to Low, to be executed by him and the others, to enable him to fulfill the agreement. This was done by them after adding the condition, on the 12th February, 1821. The witness says that there was no schedule attached to it. He answers, from information and belief, that Beck did not collect from O'Hara any money, or receive from him any further security. The district judge, upon this testimony, instructed the jury that the defendants had the superior title, and their verdict was accordingly rendered for them.

The authority conferred upon the mandatary by the letter of attorney is special and limited, and his acts under it are valid only as they come within its scope and operation. He was bound to conform to the conditions it contains, in its execution to adopt the modes it indicates.

He was authorized to sell the lands for cash or on a credit with security on real property, to execute a deed describing the consideration, acknowledging its payment, and to receive the money or securities the purchaser might render. Peck v. Harriott, 6 S. & R., 149; 9 Leigh, 387. But he was not authorized to exchange the lands for other property, or to accept the notes of the vendee as cash, or to accept personal security, or any form of security except that specified in the condition. Non est in facultate mandatarii addere vel demere ordini sibi dato. These propositions are not disputed as applicable to cases arising between parties to the original contract, in which the limitations on the authority and the circumstances of departure from it in the execution are understood. But it is contended that bona fide purchasers are entitled to repose credit in the recitals and delarations of the attorney as expressed in his deed, that disclose the mode in which the authority has been exercised, and will be protected against their falsity; that the principal is estopped to deny their truth. This argument rests for its support upon the hypothesis that the delinquency of the mandatary is a breach of an equitable trust, a trust cognizable in a court of chancery only, a court that will not administer relief against a bona fide purchaser having the legal title. It assumes that the deed made by the attorney invests the grantee with the legal title, notwithstanding the noncompliance with the condition. If this were true, the inference would follow. Danbury v. Lockburn, 1 Mer., 626. But the assumption is not tenable. The attorney was not invested with the legal estate. He was the minister, the servant, of his constituent, and his authority to convey the legal estate did not arise except upon a valid sale in accordance with the requirements of the power.

Doe v. Martin, 4 T. R., 39; Minot v. Prescott, 14 Mass., 495. The deed executed by the attorney is apparently within the scope of his power, and the admission of payment of the consideration is competent testimony of the fact. American Fur Co. v. United States, 2 Pet., 358. But it is competent to his principal to show that the transaction was in appearance only, and not in fact within the authority bestowed.

And the question arises, was there any testimony to be submitted to the jury to repel the presumption that there was a bona fide execution of the trust reposed in the attorney. One of the donors of the power, but who does not appear to be interested in the land otherwise than by the recital in that instrument, admits his knowledge of the terms of the sale made to O'Hara; that this power was remitted to Beck to validate the contract, as far as it had been executed, and to enable him to complete it according to the engagement that had been entered into.

The power of attorney and the deed had been on the public records for thirty-four years before this suit was commenced, and for five years these defendants had been in the actual possession of the property. It had been repeatedly sold during this long period. To the inquiry made of the witness, whether the purchase money had been paid to the grantors, or whether the security on real property had been taken, he answers: "This affiant is informed and believes that most of the lands were sold to William O'Hara without security, or the payment of anything in hand upon the promissory notes of the said O'Hara, which, as this affiant is informed and believes, were in the hands of Beck at the time of his death, and copies of which, * * as he is informed and believes, * * * are annexed." It is the opinion of the court that this testimony was not admissible; and although it was read to the jury, it did not contain anything to warrant a conclusion unfavorable to the title of the defendants.

Judgment affirmed.

SPRINGFIELD TOWNSHIP OF FRANKLIN COUNTY.

v.

JOHN H. QUICK, Auditor, AND WM. ROBESON, Treasurer of FRANKLIN COUNTY.

(See S. C., 22 How., 56–69.)

Indiana school fund.

The Indiana state laws, apportioning the school fund, do not violate the Acts of Congress providing that the proceeds of the sixteenth section shall be for the use of schools in the township.

Submitted Dec. 19, 1859. Decided Jan. 3. 1860.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Indiana.

This action was brought by Springfield Township against Quick, Auditor, and Robeson, Treasurer, of the said county, in the Franklin Circuit Court. The complaint was for an injunction to enjoin the Auditor and Treasurer from distributing the school fund in said county, in compliance with the provisions of the School Law of Indiana, approved March 5, 1855.

The clerk of that court, ex officio granted a temporary injunction. This order, at the subsequent term of the court, was made perpetual.

The defendants appealed to the Supreme Court of Indiana, which court reversed the judgment of the Franklin Circuit Court.

From this ruling of the Supreme Court of Indiana, this writ of error is brought.

A synopsis of the laws under which the case arose, appears in the brief for the plaintiff in error.

The questions as stated by the counsel for the appellees, were, the constitutionality of the school law of the State of Indiana, approved March 5, 1855, and whether that law violates the Act of Congress making the grant of the 16th section of lands throughout the State for the use of schools.

Mr. Lucian Barbour, for the plaintiffs in error:

An historical statement of the facts involved in the controversy in this case, will best exhibit the errors complained of.

The counsel referred to the following Acts of Congress and of the Legislature.

Act of Congress, March 26, 1804; by the 5th section of which, section number 16 was reserved in each township in Indiana for the support of schools.

Act of Congress, April 19, 1806; Act to enable the people of Indiana Territory to form a constitution and State government, which offered the following propositions to the Territery for acceptance: First. That the section numbered 16 in every township (and when such section has been sold, granted or disposed of, other lands equivalent thereto and most contiguous), should be granted to the inhabitants of such township for the use of schools.

Second. That the salt springs within the said Territory should be granted to the State for the use of the people, &c.

Third. That five per cent. of the net proceeds of the lands lying within the State, should be reserved for making roads, canals, &c.

Fourth. That one entire township should be reserved for the use of a seminary of learning, and vested in the Legislature, &c.

Fifth. That four sections be granted to the State for the purpose of a seat of government.

This Act also provided that the Ordinance of the Territory accepting the foregoing proposition should exempt lands sold by the United States after the first day of the next December, from taxation for five years from date of sale.

On the 20th day of June, 1816, the Convention of Indiana accepted this proposition. On the 24th of December, 1816, it passed an Act entitled "An Act to prevent waste on lands preserved for the use of schools and salt springs."

The 5th section provided for the incorporation of any congressional or fractional township in certain cases, and the election of trustees by the same.

This Act was re-enacted in 1818. In 1819 an Act was passed authorizing the trustees to let out any money of the township sustaining schools therein.

In 1824, an Act was passed, one section of which provided that the lands reserved by Congress for the use of schools in each congressional township, should be vested in this Corporation.

On January 25, 1827, and January 28, 1828, Acts were passed, looking towards procuring an Act of Congress, authorizing the Legislature of Indiana to convey, in fee simple, lands reserved by Congress for the use of schools within the State. On the 24th day of May, 1828, an Act of Congress was approved, granting such authority, with the provision that no land should be sold without the consent of the inhabitants of the township or district, and that out of the proceeds of the funds, each township and district should be entitled to such part thereof as should have accrued for the sale of school land belonging to such township or district.

January 23, 1829, an Act passed by the Indiana Legislature was approved, which provides for the incorporation of each congressional township in the State, the election of school trustees therein, and the election of a school commissioner in each county, and a sale by him of the 16th section, whenever a majority of the voters of the township should attend an election to be held for that purpose, and direct such sale. In 1830 an Act was passed authorizing the lease of school lands, and providing some restrictions on the sales.

On Feb. 2, 1833, an Act was passed, which provided that in case of a sale of the school lands of any township, the inhabitants should hold an election and determine whether the proceeds of the sale should be deposited in the Loan Office of the State, left with or be loaned by the School Commissioner.

Sections 88 and 89 of that Act read: "The moneys placed in the Loan Office, belonging to the inhabitants of any township, shall there remain a permenant fund for the purpose of school education for such townships, and shall yield a legal interest, and not less than at the rate of six per cent. per annum."

"And the faith of the State is hereby solemnly pledged to the inhabitants of each of said townships for the preservation of the fund belonginging thereto, and for the payment of said annual interest." In 1837 a similar law was enacted. In 1841 an Act was passed, authorizing a township to withdraw funds from the Loan Office, to be loaned out by the School Commissioner.

In 1843, the Legislature passed an Act remodeling the School Law, section 114 of which provides "that the several counties should be held liable to the inhabitants of the respective congressional townships for the preservation of the said fund, and the payment of the annual interest thereon, at the rate established by law.

In 1849, the office of School Commissioner was abolished, and his duties transferred to the County Auditor and Treasurer. For the first time the proceeds of the sale of the 16th section went into the County Treasury for management and distribution.

The 7th section of this Act contains the following: "Providing that nothing herein contained should be so construed as to divert the fund, commonly called the Congressional Township Fund, or any part thereof, from the objects and purposes for which it was granted by Congress."

After this, Indiana adopted her new Constitution, called the Constitution of 1851, in which an effort is made to consolidate the school funds of the State.

The 8th article of the Constitution contains the following provisions on the subject of education.

Sec. 1. Knowledge and Learning generally diffused throughout a community being essential to the preservation of a free government, it shall be the duty of the General Assembly to encourage, by all suitable means, moral, intellectual, scientific and agricultural improvement; and to provide by law for a general uniform system of common schools wherein tuition shall be without charge and equally open to all.

Sec. 2. The common school fund shall consist of the congressional township fund, and the lands belonging thereto; the surplus revenue fund, and the other funds named.

The 3d, 4th and 5th sections provide for the funding investment and distribution thereof.

Sec. 6 makes the several counties liable for the preservation of the fund and payment of the interest thereon.

Sec. 7. "All trust funds held by the State shall remain inviolate and be faithfully applied to the purposes for which the trust was created."

Sec. 8 provides for the election of a State Superintendent of Public Instruction.

Pursuant to the provisions of this article of the Constitution, the first Indiana Legislature, convened after its adoption by an Act approved June 14, 1852, and found in the revised Code of 1852, Vol. I, page 439, undertook to consolidate the school funds of 1832, and to distribute generally over the State the proceeds of the 16th section of each township, reserved by Congress to the inhabitants of the respective townships in which the sections are situate, for the use of schools therein.

This distribution was controverted by the present plaintiffs in the state courts, and their power and right to the exclusive control of this 16th section, and its proceeds fully established by the Supreme Court of the State of Indiana in the case of The State of Indiana and others v. Springfield Township, reported in 6th Indiana Reports, page 84, &c., and which is especially referred to the attention of this court, as containing a true statement and history of the legislation of Indiana on this subject, and a full vindication of the right of the plaintiffs in this case to the relief sought.

Shortly after this judgment was pronounced by the Supreme Court of the State of Indiana, which was at the November Term, 1854, the Legislature of Indiana, to avoid its force and effect, and indirectly to accomplish that which the court determined could not be done, passed an Act approved March 5, 1855, entitled "An Act to provide for a general system of common schools, the officers thereof, and their respective duties, and matters properly connected therewith, and to establish township libraries, and for the regulation thereof."

See Acts of Indiana for 1855, page 161.

The plaintiffs in error insist that the 8th article of the Constitution of 1851, of the State of Indiana, and the legislation of said Statute of March 4, 1855, are both in violation of the ordinance and Acts of Congress vesting these said 16th sections in the inhabitants of the respective townships in which they are situated, and consequently, void.

It cannot be disguised that this legislation of 1855 was a palpable evasion of the judgment pronounced by the Supreme Court of Indiana, in 6th Indiana Reports, page 84. And this high court will certainly not tolerate this petty subterfuge, but will hold, as they did in Trustees for Vincennes University v. The State of Indiana, 14 How., 268, that the rights of parties cannot thus be trifled with, but will be held sacred from all improper legislation.

The judgment of the Supreme Court of Indiana, in the case at bar in 7th Indiana Reports, page 636, pronounced by Judge Gookins, we think, is a very lame attempt to justify the 8th article of the Constitution of 1851 and the Act of 1255, and cannot be sustained by reason or authority. With all due respect for the opinion of that court, it is a mere ad captandum argument; and, as will be seen, was the opinion of a divided court.

Mr. D. D. Jones, for defendants in error:

The appellees conceive the only material points in the case to be the following two:

1st. Is the Act in question constitutional?

2d. Does it violate the Act of Congress making the grant of the 16th section of lands in the several congressional townships of the State of Indiana, "to the inhabitants thereof, for the use of schools?"

Does it contravene any provision of the Constitution of the State of Indiana? It is insisted that it does not, as the Constitution of the State is but an organic rule originating in, and restrictive of, the unlimited powers of a sovereignty—not defining what alone the Legislature may do in its capacity as the law-making power of the State—but positively prohibiting certain acts of legislation; denying that branch of the state government the privilege of interfering with certain defined rights reserved by the people, and pointing out the mode in which legislation shall be conducted. It does not withhold from the State the right to prescribe, through the agency of her Legislature, a rule for the taxation of her people and their property within her limits, for educational purposes. Nor does it prohibit any distribution the Legislature may see proper to direct, of such taxes so collected, whether that distribution be per capita, or with reference to existing educational advantages one locality may have over another; and whether donations from the General Government or other sources shall be taken into consideration in the mode of distribution, is conceived to be an untrammeled power of the Legislature of the State, the exercise of which is unforbidden by any provision of either the State or Federal Constitution.

The very features of the law complained of are component parts of the State Constitution; and if not repugnant to other subsequent provisions of that instrument; their validity is coequal with the Constitution itself. These provisions are contained in the 8th article of the Constitution of the State.

Vide R. S. of Indiana, 1852, Vol. I., p. 62.

The sections of the law held to be exceptionable by the appellant, are clearly within the directory provision of the 8th article of the Constitution of Indiana, and section 101, so far from diverting or diminishing the congressional township fund, expressly provides "that in no case shall the income of the congressional township fund belonging to any township, or part of such township, be diminished by such distribution and diverted to any other township."

Laws of the State of Indiana, 1855, p. 176.

It is insisted by the appellant, that the Act is contraventive of that provision of the State Constitution which requires all laws of the State to be of uniform operation throughout the State, which position the appellees deem to have been properly held untenable by the Supreme Court of the State in this same case. The court says: "It does not conflict with the 23d section of the 4th article of the Constitution of the State of Indiana, which requires all laws to be of uniform operation throughout the State; for the Act is not only uniform in itself, but it produces uniformity in the subjects upon which it operates."

The entire subject-matters upon which the Act in question proposes to operate, is within the limits of the State of Indiana. She does not propose, by this legislative enactment, to assume control of any foreign matter whatever. And it has been held "that a State has the same undeniable and unlimited jurisdiction over all persons and things within its territorial limits, as any foreign nation, when that jurisdiction is not surrendered or restrained by the Constitution of the United States."

Mayor of New York v. Miln, 11 Pet., 102.

Inasmuch as the Act does not propose to divert the congressional township fund, but expressly provides against its diversion and diminution, and for its faithful preservation and application to the specified use for which it was granted, it most certainly does not violate the Act of Congress granting the lands to the several townships of the State. Such construction can only be given to the Act in question by imputing to the State Legislature an ignorance or duplicity inconsistent with common intelligence and common honesty.

It being a well settled principle that the power of a State to levy taxes, to create a revenue for any specified object, is an incident of sovereignty, and only restricted by constitutional inhibitions; and there being no such constitutional prohibition—the sense of honor, justice and equity of a State alone defining the limits within which that power shall be exercised—what feature of the law in question can be said to exceed the authority of the State? In the Constitution of the State of Indiana there is no feature, the appellees insist, prohibiting the levying and collecting of taxes such as contemplated by the School Law in question. The Constitution of the State being silent as to the mode of distributing the common school fund, that burden was necessarily cast upon the Legislature. In the exercise of this necessary incidental power, that body directs that all the funds raised to constitute a common school revenue be so distributed, taking into consideration the congressional township fund, as to insure an equality of educational facilities throughout the State.

The same power that can rightly divert a revenue enjoyed by peculiar localities, and disburse it throughout an entire State, most certainly possesses a sufficient authority over her own internal affairs, to take into consideration other funds in her efforts at placing all upon a uniform basis, as it respects the means of educating her people.

Mr. Justice Catron delivered the opinion of the court:

The 25th section of the Judiciary Act declares, that where is drawn in question the construction of any statute of the United States, and the decision is against the right set up or claimed by either party under the Act of Congress, such decision may be re-examined, and reversed or affirmed, in the Supreme Court, on writ of error.

Here it is claimed, for the inhabitants of the township, that the fund arising from the proceeds of the 16th section shall not be estimated in distributing the general school fund of the State derived from taxes paid into the State Treasury. The Acts of the Legislature equalize the amount that shall be appropriated for the education of each scholar throughout the the State, taking into the estimate the moneys derived from the proceeds of the 16th section, with the proviso, that the whole of the proceeds shall be expended in the township. If it be more than an equal portion to each scholar elsewhere furnished by the state fund—still, the township has the benefit of such excess, but receives nothing from the treasury; and if it be less, then the deficiency is made up, so as to equalize according to the general provision.

And the question here is, whether the state laws violate the Acts of Congress providing that the proceeds of the 16th section shall be for the use of schools in the township. And our opinion is, that expending the proceeds of the 16th section for the exclusive use of schools "in the township" where the section exists, is a compliance with the legislation of Congress on the subject; nor is the State bound to provide any additional fund for a township receiving the bounty of Congress, no matter to what extent other parts of the State are supplied from the Treasury.

The law is a perfectly just one; but if it were otherwise, and the school fund was distributed partially, nevertheless those receiving the bounty from Congress have no right to call on this court to interfere with the power exercised by the State Legislature in laying and collecting taxes, and in appropriating them for educational purposes, at its discretion.

We hold that a true construction was given to the Acts of Congress referred to, and order that the judgment be affirmed.

Mr. J. P. Benjamin, for appellants.

Mr. F. Perin, in person, and Mr. L. M. Day, for appellee.

Mr. Justice Nelson delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Louisiana.

The bill filed by McMicken in the court below is in the nature of a bill of review, praying relief from a decree obtained against him by Perin in a previous suit by means of fraud and imposition.

The suit by Perin charged McMicken with holding, in trust for his use, a valuable sugar plantation, situate in the parish of East Baton Rouge, on the Mississippi River, in the State of Louisiana; and sought a discharge of the trust and a conveyance of the title to the complainant.

The bill of review sets forth as the ground of fraud in the decree, that after the commencement of the former suit and service of the subpœna on McMicken, in an interview with Perin on the subject of the suit, he agreed to discontinue it, and prosecute the same no further; upon which understanding the defendant acted, and discharged the solicitor retained to defend it, and omitted altogether any defense; and that in violation of the agreement, and in fraud of the rights of the defendant, he, Perin, proceeded with the suit in the absence and without the knowledge of the defendant, obtaining the decree in question by default, declaring the trust, and directing a conveyance of the plantation.

The bill of review further sets forth that the advances made by the complainant in the purchase of the property, and the liabilities incurred by way of raising incumbrances on the same in securing the title, far exceeded the sum stated by Perin in his bill, and which he proposed to reimburse and satisfy, and of all which he had full knowledge, but which he fraudulently suppressed and excluded from the decree, which the complainant is justly entitled to have allowed upon setting aside the purchase and declaring the trust for the benefit of Perin.

The defendant, in his answer to the bill of review, denies specifically the fraud charged therein against him; denies that he agreed to give up the suit, and not further prosecute the same, or that he gave any assurances to McMicken to that effect, or which were calculated to mislead or induce him to withdraw from the defense, or that any such understanding existed between the parties; but, on the contrary, since the filing of his bill he has, at all times, insisted upon his rights as set forth therein, and upon the prosecution of his claim to the property.

The defendant also denies that the omission to set forth in his bill any other sums than those allowed in the report of the master, and which entered into the decree, were with a view to an ex parte proceeding in the suit as charged by McMicken, and denies all fraud or concealment in respect to these accounts.

The answer of the defendant is directly responsive to the charges in the bill, and relates to facts within his knowledge, and, upon well settled principles of pleading, must be taken as presenting the true state of the case, unless overcome by the proofs. The complainant, in view of this rule, has examined witnesses in support of the allegations, but they have wholly failed to sustain them.

The bill of Perin against McMicken to enforce the trust was filed in February, 1851. The subpœna was served personally in November, 1852. McMicken resided in the State of Ohio, and the service in the suit could be made only in the State of Louisiana. The decree pro confesso was entered in April, 1853, and the final decree in June, 1854. The suit seems not to have been hurried, with any unusual speed, to its final determination.

In February, 1855, a petition was presented to the court containing, substantially, the facts set forth afterwards in the bill of review, on behalf of McMicken, to set aside the decree, and to permit him to come in and defend, which, after hearing, was denied. Whereupon an appeal was taken to this court from the decree in the suit, and also from the order refusing to set aside the decree, and which were affirmed in December Term, 1855. 18 How., 507; 20 How., 133.

The present bill was filed for a review of the decree and order thus affirmed by this court in January, 1857. The case was heard on pleadings and proofs, and a decree entered dismissing the bill in November of the same year, and is now before us on appeal.

The bill was dismissed upon the ground that the excuse set up by the complainant, to wit: the fraud and imposition of Perin, for not appearing and defending the former suit, was fully and completely denied in the answer, and wholly unsupported by the proofs. The failure, therefore, of the defendant to appear and defend, and his rights in that suit, for aught that was shown, was attributable to his own neglect and inattention.

The allegations upon which relief in the bill rested, and upon which alone a rehearing could be granted in the case, consistent with the established practice of a court of chancery, were unsustained.

This is familiar doctrine, and is decisive of the case.

The decree of the court below affirmed.

S. C.—59 U. S. (18 How.), 507; 61 U. S. (20 How.), 133.

ALEXANDER REY, WILLIAM R. MARSHALL AND JOSEPH M. MARSHALL, Partners under the Name, Style and Firm of MARSHALL & Co., Plffs. in Er.,

v.

JAMES. W. SIMPSON.

(See S. C., 22 How., 341–352.)

Bills and notes—proof of circumstances of indorsement, admissible—when note payable to order of one, is first indorsed by another, obligation of latter—pleading, when sufficient.

Parol proof of the attending circumstances under which indorsers placed their firm name upon the back of the note, is admissible under the general issue.

When a promissory note, made payable to a particular person or order, is first indorsed by a third person, such third person is held to be an original promisor, guarantor, or indorser, according to the nature of the transaction and the understanding of the parties.

If he put his name on the back of the note at the time it was made, as surety for the maker, and for his accomodation, to give him credit with the payee, or if he participated in the consideration for which the note was given, he must be considered as a joint maker of the note.

If his indorsement was subsequent to the making of the note, and he put his name there at the request of the maker, pursuant to a contract with the payee for further indulgence or forbearance, he can only be held as a guarantor.

If the note was intended for discount, and he put his name on the back of it, with the understanding of all the parties that his indorsement would be inoperative until it was indorsed by the payee, he would then be liable only as a second indorser, and as such would be entitled to the privileges which belong to such indorsers.

Where persons placed their names as indorsers at the inception of the note, not as a collateral undertaking, but as joint promisors with the maker, they are as much affected by the consideration paid by the plaintiff, and as clearly liable in the character of original promisors, as they would have been if they had signed their names under the name of the other defendant upon the inside of the instrument.

Where the plaintiff alleged, that the defendants, whose firm name is on the back of the note, placed it there for the purpose of becoming sureties and security to him as payee for the amount therein specified, that allegation is all which is required by the Code of Minnesota Territory, to maintain the suit against defendants as original promisors.

Argued and submitted Dec. 18, 1859. Decided Jan. 3, 1860.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the Territory of Minnesota.

The history of the case and a full statement of the facts appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Brisbin & Bigelow, H. L. Stevens and H. W. Merrill, for the plaintiff in error:

1. Marshall & Co. were not liable on the note as guarantors. Their undertaking, whatever it was, if regarded as a guaranty, was collateral, and was within the Statute of Frauds, and void; the same not having been reduced to writing, expressing the consideration. The note was simply indorsed in blank when it was delivered to Rey, and by him to Simpson, and

NOTE.—Indorser before payee, liability and rights of.

With reference to the indorser before the payee, the decisions are not uniform. The first diversity of opinion is as to whether such an irregular indorser, where the indorsement was made at the inception of the note, should be held to be a joint maker or surety, as has been held in the Supreme Court of the United States, or as a guarantor.

In the following instances he has been held to be a joint maker or surety: Killian v. Ashley, 24 Ark., 515; Gilpin v. Marley, 4 Houst., 284; Massey v. Turner, 2 Houst., 79; Collins v. Everett, 4 Ga., 273 (last case is by Statute); Lawrence v. Oakey, 14 La., 389; Chom v. Merrill, 9 La. Ann., 533 Childs v. Wyman, 44 Me., 441; Leonard v. Wilds, 36 Me., 265; Good v. Martin, 95, U. S. (5 Otto), 90; Ives v. Bosley, 35 Md., 262; Walz v. Alback, 37 Md., 404; Hawks v. Phillips, 7 Gray, 284; Witterwax v. Paine, 2 Mich., 559; Rothchild v. Grix, 31 Mich., 150; Pierse v. Irvine, 1 Minn., 377; Scheider v. Schiffman, 20 Mo., 571; Martin v. Boyd, 11 N. H., 385 (see, however, Currier v. Fellows, 27 N. H., 369); Baker v. Robinson, 63 N. C., 191; Perkins v. Barstow, 6 R. I., 507; McCreary v. Bird, 12 Rich., 554; Strong v. Riker, 16 Vt., 557; Sylvester v. Downer, 20 Vt., 355.

And in the following a guarantor: Pierce v. Kennedy, 5 Cal., 138; contra, Jones v. Goodwin, 39 Cal., 493; Perkins v. Catlin, 11 Conn., 212; Ransom v. Sherwood, 26 Conn., 437; Clark v. Merriman, 25 Conn., 576; Webster v. Cobb, 17 Ill., 459; Knight v. Dunsmore, 12 Iowa, 35; Firman v. Blood, 2 Kan., parol evidence was inadmissible to vary the legal effect of this indorsement.

This point rests mainly upon the construction to be given to the Minnesota Statute of Frauds, and this is a literal transcript from the N. Y. Revised Statutes.

The construction of that Statute has been settled in favor of the plaintiff in error.

Min. Rev. Stat., 268, sec. 281-282; 2 N. Y. Rev. Stat., 135, sec. 2, subdivision 2; Hall v. Newcomb, 7 Hill, 416; Spies v. Gilmore, 1 N. Y., 324; Dunham v. Manrow, 2 N. Y., 553; Brewster, v. Silence, 8 N. Y., 207; Ellis v. Brown, 6 Bard., 282; Waterbury v. Sinclair, 16 How. Pr., 329.

2. Marshall & Co. are not chargeable as makers of the note in question. In support of this propostion, we refer to the preceding point and authorities cited.

If parol evidence is inadmissible to change the contract of indorsement into a guaranty, it is equally inadmissible to change it into an absolute original promise. In so changing the contracts, not only must the promise be supplied by parol, but the consideration also.

This would, in effect, be a repeal of the Statute of Frauds.

Hall v. Farmer, 5 Den., 484; Bradford v. Martin, 3 Sand., 647; Story Prom. N., sec. 134.

In England it has long been held, that not only the promise must be in writing, but the consideration must be expressed in the instrument itself.

Wain v. Warlters, 5 East, 10; Saunders v. Wakefield 7 B. &. A., 595; Morley v. Boothby, 3 Bing., 107.

The Statute of Frauds in those States in which the courts have dissented from the above doctrine, is in its language essentially different from the Statute of Minnesota.

3d. The record shows that no agreement or contract has ever been written upon the back of the note, other than the mere indorsement. The indorsement is still in blank. The position of the Marshalls is that of second indorsers only. The note is negotiable, but they are not the payees. There are numerous cases which establish the rule that whenever the note is negotiable—payable to a third person or order, and is indorsed by a person other than the payee, he is not to be treated as an original promisor or maker, nor yet as guarantor, but simply as indorser.

Seabury v. Hungerford, 2 Hill, 84; Hall v. Newcomb, 3 Hill, 233; Ellis v. Brown, 6 Barb., 282; Hough v. Gray, 19 Wend., 202; 7 Hill, 416 to 426, note; Spies v. Gilmore 1 N. Y., 321; Cottrell v. Conklin, 4 Duer, 45; Taylor v. McCune, 11 Pa., 461; Crozer v. Chambers, 1 Spencer (N. J.), 256; Fear v. Dunlap, 1 Greene (Pa.), 334; Story Bills, sec. 134.

4. The complaint is defective.

Even this child of modern improvement, the complaint, must be sensible and state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, or like the somewhat discarded commonlaw declaration, the party must fail. An indorsement is a contract of transfer, by which the indorser contracts with, and in favor of the indorsee and every subsequent holder, and the note must be transferable or there is no legal indorsement.

Now, to enable Simpson to sue the Marshalls as indorsers, they must first have been either payees or indorsees, and thereby been able to transfer the note by indorsement; but the complaint shows the reverse of this.

See Waterbury v. Sinclair, 16 How, Pr., 329.

Moreover, no case can be found under any system of pleading, where the plaintiff has been allowed to recover against the defendant as guarantor, where the complaint was against

It is held in New York and some other States, that an indorsement of note, before its delivery to payee, will be presumed to be, in absence of evidence of the intention, for the accomodation of payee, and is an indorsement subsequent to the payees that indorser knew that the payee must indorse note before it became operative. Such an indorser cannot be held liable at the suit of the payee or of any person who has taken note of payee either after maturity, or with knowledge of the facts. Coulter v. Richmond, 59 N. Y., 478; Dale v. Moffitt, 22 Ind., 114; Frear v. Dunlap, 1 Iowa, 335, changed by law of 1851; Knight v. Dunsmore, 12 Iowa, 35; Marienthal v. Taylor, 2 Minn., 147; McComb v. As between the parties, oral evidence is competent to show the circumstances of the giving of the note, its consideration and its indorsement, and that the indorsement was given to give the maker credit with payee. It is sufficient to show that it was indorsed with knowledge that the indorsement was required to give the maker credit. Meyer v. Hibsher, 47 N. Y., 265; Gfroehner v. McCarty, 2 Abb. N. C., 76; Draper v. Chase M'f'g Co., 2 Abb. N. C., 79; Smith v. Smith, 37 Superior Ct., 208; Coulter v. Richmond, 59 N. Y., 481; Moore v. Cross, 19 N. Y., 227; Clothier v. Adriance, 51 N. Y., 322; Austin v. Boyd, 24 Pick., 64; Luft v. Graham, 13 Abb. Pr., N. S., 175.

If transferee knew note was indorsed before payee overwrote his indorsement, he must, to recover of the original indorser, give the same extrinsic evidence which the payee would have to give. Phelps v. Vischer, 50 N. Y., 74.

The Supreme Court of the United States holds the irregular indorser an original promisor, a guarantor, or an indorser, according to the nature of the transaction and the understanding of the parties. Oral evidence is admissible to show the intent and understanding. If the indorsement was made to give the maker credit with the payee, or if indorser participated in the consideration of the note, he is to be considered a joint maker. If the indorsement was after the note was delivered to payee, at request of maker to procure further indulgence or forbearance for the maker, he can only be held as guarantor, and there must be legal proof of a consideration to uphold the promise unless it be shown that he was connected with the inception of the note. If note was intended for discount, and indorsement was to be inoperative until after payee indorsed, he is liable only as second indorser. Good v. Martin, 95 U. S. (5 Otto), 90, and cases cited; Aff'g, 1 Col., 165; 2 Col., 218; Schneider v. Schiffman, 20 Mo., 571; Irish v. Cutler, 31 Me., 536; Hawks v. Phillips, 7 Gray, 284; Pierse v. Irvine, 1 Minn., 369; Perkins v. Catlin, 11 Conn., 212.

Oral evidence is admissible to show when indorsement was made. In absence of evidence, undated indorsement will be presumed to have been made at inception of note. Good v. Martin, 95 U. S. Complaint is also defective on account of defect of parties. There is no joint cause of action stated in the complaint against the two Marshalls and Rey.

See Allen v. Fosgate, 11 How. Pr., 218.

The demurrer does not admit the truth of the allegation and the complaint as to the purposes for which the defendants, Marshall & Co., indorsed the note, and of the reliance of the plaintiff upon the indorsement; because those allegations are not a statement of facts, but are merely matters of law. The Code in Minnesota requires that the complaint should state the facts constituting a cause of action. Under this Statute the conclusion of law and matters of argument are not allowed to be stated, and the demurrer does not admit them to be true.

See Barton v. Sackett, 3 How. Pr., 358; 1 Chit. Pl., 213, 214 and 541; Story Eq., Pl., sec. 452, cases cited; Hall v. Bartlett, 9 Barb., 297.

Messrs. Joseph H. Bradley and M. E. Ames, for the defendant in error:

If in any case it is competent to show by parol, an agreement collateral to a bill of exchange or promissory note in their ordinary form, the facts admitted in these pleadings would be such a case, as understood by the counsel for the plaintiffs in error.

This court has settled that question in Phillips v. Preston, 5 How., 278; but in this case, the commercial contract of an indorser of a promissory note never was complete. The indorsement was made before the title had ever passed by the indorsement of a payee, and even before the note had been delivered to the payee, and it is admitted to have been done for the purpose of guaranteeing the payment thereof to the payee; in such case, the party who puts his name on the back of the paper authorizes the payee to write over it such words as may be necessary to embody the contract between them, and he may be treated either as a guarantor or as a party to the original undertaking. The current of decision is unbroken except where there are peculiar circumstances to modify, not to make them exceptions.

The contract is not prohibited by the Minnesota Statute of Frauds. The note itself shows the consideration. Every man who indorses such a paper, thereby promises to answer for 'debt, default or miscarriage of the maker." It is a note or memorandum expressing the consideration, that is, forbearance to the maker, and is in writing by the party to be charged thereon. It is a contract of suretyship, plain, intelligible and well understood. It is put on this note for some purpose, for the very purpose which would be implied in an ordinary indorsement, except as to the person to whom, and for whom they are to be surety, and this may be proved by parol.

Bateman v. Phillips, 15 East, 272.

It is conceded in the argument, that where a person at the inception of a note not negotiable, indorses his name in blank on the back, he is liable as maker, and so as to notes made payable to bearer, or to A.B. or bearer. The indorser may be made liable to the payee, and to cases of negotiable paper indorsed in blank, after the same became due, but it is insisted there is a distinction between such paper, and negotiable paper.

The case of Tillman v. Wheeler, 17 Johns., 326, relied on by the plaintiff, was a case on a contract similar to the present, except that there was no proof of any privity or contract between payee and indorser, and on that ground alone the court decided he could not be held as guarantor.

It is submitted that these admissions cover this case. At the inception of this note, the defendants, Marshall & Co., indorsed their name in blank on the back of this note, when it was neither negotiated to them nor by them, and when, in point of fact, it was not negotiable, because it was still in the hands of the maker, and was not, and could not be negotiable until it was delivered to the payee.

See authorities first above cited.

It would exhaust the patience of this court to present any analysis of these cases, but it may be affirmed that they establish three propositions:

First. Whenever a man puts his name on the back of a promissory note, whether negotiable, assignable or transferable by delivery while it is in the hands of the maker, he intends to make himself reponsible for the default of the maker.

Second. In some cases that responsibility is to be worked out in favor of the payee by writing over the name of the indorser, his guarantee, or other form of obligation, and this may be done at any time before judgment.

Third. In others, it is held (and this seems to be the most just and rational result of all the cases) that such an indorsement is in itself (it being proved to have been made before the note was delivered to the payee, and that the note was never parted with, or indorsed by him) a guaranty by the indorser of the payment of the note to the payee; but the form is of little moment, and if the substance is, that it is or can be treated as a guaranty, this court will look to the substance and finally settle this question which has so long disturbed the judicial mind of the country.

Mr. Justice Clifford delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a writ of error to the Supreme Court of the Territory of Minnesota.

According to the transcript, the suit was commenced by James W. Simpson, the present defendant, on the 21st day of December, 1855, in the District Court of the Territory, for the second judicial district, against the plaintiffs in error, who were the original defendants. It was an action of assumpsit, and was brought upon a certain promissory note for the sum of $3,517.07½, bearing date at St. Paul, in that Territory, on the 14th day of June, 1855, and was made payable to the order of the plaintiff six months after date, for value received. At the period of the date of the note, as well as at the time the suit was instituted, two of the defendants, William R. Marshall and Joseph M. Marshall, were partners, doing business under the style and firm of Marshall and Co.

As appears by the declaration, the note was made and signed by the defendant first named in the original suit, at the time and place it bears date.

And the plaintiff further alleges in the declaration, that after making and signing the note, the same defendant then and there delivered the note to the other two defendants; and that they then and there, by their partnership name, indorsed the same by writing the name of their firm on the back of the note, and then and there redelivered the same to the first named defendant, who afterwards, and before the maturity of the note, delivered it so indorsed to the plaintiff. He also alleges that the defendants, William R. Marshall and Joseph M. Marshall, so indorsed the note for the purpose of guarantying the payment of the same, and of becoming sureties and security to him, as the payee thereof, for the amount therin specified; and that he, relying upon their indorsement, took the note, and paid the full consideration thereof to the first-named defendant.

Other matters, such as due presentment, nonpayment, and protest, are also alleged in the declaration, which it is unnecessary to notice at the present time, as the questions to be determined arise out of the allegations previously mentioned and described.

Personal service was made on each of the defendants, but the one first named did not appear; and after certain interlocutory proceedings, conforming to the laws of the Territory and the practice of the court, he was defaulted.

On the 31st day of December, 1855, the counsel of the other two defendants served notice of a motion to strike out all that part of the declaration which sets forth the purpose for which it is alleged they indorsed the note, and so much of the declaration, also, as alleges that the plaintiff took the note as payee, relying upon the indorsement, and paid to the first-named defendant the full consideration thereof, as before stated. That motion was subsequently heard before the court; and on the 9th day of February, 1856, was denied and wholly overruled. After the motion was overruled, the defendants, whose firm name is on the back of the note, demurred specially to the declaration.

None of the causes of demurrer need be stated, as they will be sufficiently brought to view in considering the several propositions assumed by the counsel on the one side and the other, in the argument at the bar. Suffice it to say, that the demurrer was overruled; and on the 10th day of July, 1856, judgment was entered for the plaintiff against all of the defendants for the amount of the note, with interest and costs.

On the 18th day of September, 1856, the defendants sued out a writ of error, and removed the cause into the Supreme Court of the Territory, where the judgment of the district court was in all things affirmed; and on the 4th day of February, 1857, a final judgment was entered for the plaintiff, that he recover the amount of the judgment rendered in the district court, with interest, costs, and ten per cent. damages, amounting in the whole to the sum of $4,371.97. Whereupon the defendants sued out a writ of error to this court, which was properly docketed at the December Term, 1857.

All civil suits in the courts of Minnesota are commenced by complaint; and suitors are enjoined by law, in framing their declarations, to give a statement of the facts constituting the cause of action, which statement is required to be expressed in ordinary and concise language, without repetition, and in such a manner as to enable a person of common understanding to know what is intended.

Pursuant to that requirement, and the practice of the courts of the Territory at the time the suit was commenced, the plaintiff in this case set forth the facts already recited as contained in the complaint or declaration.

Facts thus stated in the declaration, pursuant to the directions of the law of the Territory, and which were material to the understanding of the rights of the parties to the controversy, could not, properly, be suppressed by the court. Irrespective, therefore, of the question whether or not the motion of the defendants to strike out that part of the declaration was waived, because not pressed in the Supreme Court of the Territory, no doubt is entertained by this court that the motion was properly overruled by the district court upon the merits.

Proof of the attending circumstances under which the defendants, William R. Marshall and Joseph M. Marshall, had placed their firm name upon the back of the note, would clearly have been admissible in a trial upon the general issue; and if so, no reason is perceived why it was not proper for the plaintiff, under the peculiar system of pleading which prevailed in the courts of the Territory at the time the suit was commenced, to state those circumstances in the declaration. Beyond question, they were a part of the facts constituting the cause of action; and if so, they were expressly required to be stated by the law of the Territory prescribing the rules of pleading in civil cases. And having been alleged in pursuance to such a requirement, and being material to a proper understanding of the rights of the parties to the suit, it must be considered, by analogy to the rules of pleading at common law, that they are admitted by the demurrer.

By the admitted facts, then, it appears the defendants, William R. Marshall and Joseph M. Marshall, placed their firm name on the back of the note at its inception, and before it had been passed or offered to the plaintiff. They placed their firm name there at the request of the other defendant, knowing that the note had not been indorsed by the payee, and with a view to give credit to the note, for the benefit of the immediate maker, at whose request they became a party to the same.

Whatever diversities of interpretation may be found in the authorities, where either a blank indorsement or a full indorsement is made by a third party on the back of the note, payable to the payee or order, or to the payee or bearer, as to whether he is to be deemed an absolute promisor or maker, or guarantor or indorser, there is one principle upon the subject almost universally admitted by them all, and that is, that the interpretation of the contract ought, in every case, to be such as will carry into effect the intention of the parties; and in most instances it is conceded that the intention of the parties may be made out by parol proof of the facts and circumstances which took place at the time of the transaction. Story on Promissory Notes, secs. 58, 59, and 479.

When a promissory note, made payable to a particular person or order, as in this case, is first indorsed by a third person, such third person is held to be an original promisor, guarantor, or indorser, according to the nature of the transaction and the understanding of the parties at the time the transaction took place. If he put his name on the back of the note at the time it was made, as surety for the maker, and for his accommodation, to give him credit with the payee, or if he participated in the consideration for which the note was given, he must be considered as a joint maker of the note. On the other hand, if his indorsement was subsequent to the making of the note, and he put his name there at the request of the maker, pursuant to a contract with the payee for further indulgence or forbearance, he can only be held as a guarantor. But if the note was intended for discount, and he put his name on the back of it with the understanding of all the parties that his indorsement would be inoperative until it was indorsed by the payee, he would then be liable only as a second indorser in the commercial sense, and as such would clearly be entitled to the privileges which belong to such indorsers.

Decided cases are referred to by the counsel of the defendants, which seemingly deny that such parol proof of the attending circumstances of the transaction is admissible in evidence; but the weight of authority is greatly the other way, as is abundantly shown by the cases cited on the other side. Whenever a written contract is presented for construction, and its terms are ambiguous or indefinite, it is always allowable to weigh its language in connection with the surrounding circumstances and the subject-matter, and we see no reason, as question of principle, why any different rule should be adopted in a case like the present. Such evidence has always been received in the courts of Massachusetts, as appears from numerous decisions, and the same rule prevails in most of the other States at the present time. 1 Am. Lead. Cas., 4th ed., 322. Repeated decisions to the same effect have been made in the courts of New York, and until within a recent period it appears to have been the settled doctrine in the courts of that State.

Recent decisions, it must be admitted, wear a different aspect; but they have not had the effect to produce a corresponding change in other States, and in our view, deny the admissibility of parol evidence in cases where it clearly ought to be received. Hawkes v. Phillips, 7 Gray, 284.

Applying these principles to the present case, it is obvious that the contract of the two defendants whose firm name is upon the back of the note was an original undertaking, running clear of all questions arising out of the Statute of Frauds.

They placed their names there at the inception of the note, not as a collateral undertaking, but as joint promisors with the maker, and are as much affected by the consideration paid by the plaintiff, and as clearly liable in the character of original promisors, as they would have been if they had signed their names under the name of the other defendant upon the inside of the instrument. Numerous decisions in the state courts might be cited in support of the proposition as stated, but we think it unnecessary, as they will be found collated in the elementary works to which reference has already been made, and in many others which treat of this subject.

Another objection to the right of recovery in this case deserves a brief notice. It is insisted by the counsel of the defendants that the complaint or declaration is not sufficient to maintain this suit against these defendants as original promisors. That objection must be considered in connection with the system of pleading which prevailed in the courts of the Territory at the time the suit was commenced. By that system, suitors were only required to state the facts which constituted the cause of action. In this case the plaintiff followed that mode of pleading, and we think he has set forth enough to constitute a substantial compliance with the law of the Territory and the practice of the court where the suit was instituted. He alleges, among other things, that the defendants, whose firm name is on the back of the note, placed it there for the purpose of becoming sureties and security to him as payee for the amount therein specified. That allegation, to use the language of the Statute of Minnesota, is expressed in ordinary and concise language, and in such a manner as to be easily understood, and that is all which is required by the law of the Territory prescribing the rules of pleading in civil cases. Under the system of pleading which prevailed in the courts of the Territory, the objection cannot be sustained.

The judgment of the Supreme Court of the Territory is, therefore, affirmed with costs.

JOHN C. HALE, Plff. in Er.,
v.
WILLIAM H. GAINES, AND MARIA GAINES, HIS WIFE; ALBERT BELDING; HENRY BELDING AND GEORGE BELDING, Heirs and Legal Representatives of LUDOVICUS BELDING, Deceased.

(See S. C., 22 How., 144–161.)

Entry, sufficient to sustain ejectment in Arkansas—New Madrid certificate—plaintiff must claim right under Act of Congress, to give this court jurisdiction—claim of defendant, in answer, not sufficient.

Where the plaintiff below derived his title through a preemption claim, as an occupant under the Acts of Congress of 1830 and 1832, this entry was held to be valid by the state courts of Arkansas, and a sufficient legal title to sustain an action of ejectment.

Where the defendant relied on a survey made in June, 1838, founded on a New Madrid certificate; held, that until the survey was presented to the recorder of land titles at St. Louis, and recognized by him as proper and valid, it could have no force, as this was the only mode of location contemplated by the Act of 1815.

The New Madrid survey of 1838 was altogether invalid, and properly rejected by the state courts.

The plaintiff in error must claim for himself some title, right, privilege, or exemption, under an Act of Congress, &c., and the decision must be against his claim, to give this court jurisdiction.

Alleging a title in the United States, by way of defense, is not claiming a personal interest affecting the subject in litigation, within 25th section of the Judiciary Act.

Argued Dec. 16, 1859. Decided Jan. 9, 1860.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the State of Arkansas.

This was an action of ejectment brought in the Circuit Court of Hot Springs County, Arkansas, by the defendants in error, to recover possession of a certain quarter section of land, being the tract on which the Hot Springs are located.

The trial resulted in a verdict and judgment in behalf of the plaintiffs for the recovery of the land in question, and $500 damages, with costs. This judgment was affirmed on appeal by the Supreme Court of Arkansas, except as to the damages, which were then remitted; whereupon the defendant sued out this writ of error.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Fred P. Stanton, for plaintiff in error:

The title of Belding's heirs.

The plaintiff below claimed under Ludovicus Belding, who occupied the land in 1829 and 1830 as a tenant of John Percifull. This state of facts presents the question whether, under the Acts of 1830 and 1832, a person can occupy the relation of tenant to another, and yet be a "settler and occupant of public lands," so as to be entitled to the right of preemption.

If it be said that the plaintiff in error is concluded by the decision of the Land Office allowing the entry, we reply that the Act of 1830 requires proof to be made to the satisfaction of the Register and Receiver; but these officers differed as to the tenancy, and the question was decided by the Secretary of the Interior. The entry was allowed by the order of the Secretary.

See Lytle v. Arkansas, 9 How., 314; Wilcox v. Jackson, 13 Pet., 513; 3d vol. Opinions, Atty-Gen., 96.

We insist that the entry made by the tenant against his landlord was a fraud, not only upon the Preemption Law, but also upon the real settler. If, for a reason, the entry ought to have been allowed to Hale instead of to Belding's heirs, the former is entitled to keep possession, notwithstanding the erroneous action of the Secretary of the Interior. In order to determine this question, the facts must be examined; but the court below excluded all the facts.

See Ross v. Barland, 1 Pet., 65; Stoddard v. Chambers, 2 How., 318.

The Act of 1814, already referred to as the foundation of Hale's title, relates back to the Act of Feb. 5, 1813.

Stat. at L., 2d vol., 797, 798.

These earliest among the preemption laws have no prohibition against a sale or transfer of the right derived under them, and hence such transfers were always treated as valid until subsequent laws made them null. The record shows Hale's title to be regularly derived from John Percifull, who settled on the land in 1812, and continued to occupy it for many years afterwards.

Although in 1814 the land in question was in the County of Arkansas, one of the organized counties of the Missouri Territory, and therefore supposed to be subject to settlement and preemption, the General Land Office subsequently held the contrary, because the Indian title had not then been extinguished. By the Treaty with the Quapaw Indians, made Nov. 14, 1824, the land was ceded to the government.

The Reservation Act above quoted was passed April 20, 1832.

The Remedial Act for the benefit of preemptioners under the Act of 1814, was passed March 1, 1843 (5 Stat., 603), and as everything depends on the construction of this law, it is deemed proper to quote it at large, as follows:

An Act to perfect the title to lands south of the Arkansas River, held under the New Madrid locations and preemption rights under the Act of 1814.

Be it enactev, &c., that the locations heretofore made of warrants issued under the Act of Feb. 17, 1815, entitled "An Act for the relief of the inhabitants of the late County of New Madrid who suffered by earthquakes," which were made on the south side of the Arkansas River, if made in pursuance of the provisions of that Act in other respects, shall be perfected into grants in like manner as if the Indian title to the lands on the south side of said river had been completely extinguished at the time of the passage of said Act.

Sec. 2. "And be it further enacted, that in all cases in which the locations so made, &c., may have been sold, &c., the owner of the warrants, &c., shall have a right to enter other lands, &c."

Sec. 3. "And be it further enacted, that every settler on the public lands south of the Arkansas River, shall be entitled to the same benefits accruing under the provisions of the Preemption Act of 1814, as though they had resided north of said river."

Sec. 4. "And be it further enacted, that all Cherokee preemptions which have been or may be located * * * * * south of the base line in Arkansas, shall be confirmed, and patents shall issue as in other cases."

The Indian title to the lands north of the Arkansas River had been extinguished by the Treaty with the Osages, made Nov. 10, 1808.

7 Stat., 107.

In view of the rights of a bona fide settler on the Hot Springs tract in 1814, does the Act of 1843 repeal the Reservation Act of 1832? The department holds the negative. Yet it is believed that the repugnance of the two statutes is such that they cannot be construed to stand together.

Not only the title, but the whole scope of the law indicates that the purpose of Congress was to remove the difficulty arising from the Indian title resting on the lands south of the Arkansas in 1814, and subsequently. As a historical fact bearing on this point, the court is referred to the report of the committee which introduced the bill into the Senate.

Sen. Rep. No. 36, 2d sess. 27th Cong.

The Act of 1843 intended to confirm the preemption rights south of the Arkansas River ab initio—that is to say, it intended to place the preemptor in the position he would have occupied if the Indian title had been previously extinguished. That Indian title was the only obstacle, and the professed object of the Law of 1843 was to remove that obstacle, to cure that defect of title, and to give full force and effect to the Law of 1814, south of the Arkansas as well as north of it.

"A remedial Act shall be so construed as most effectually to meet the end in view, and to prevent a failure of the remedy."

Dwar. Stat., 614.

"Beneficial statutes, therefore, have always been taken and expounded ultra the strict letter, but not, it is well and wisely said, contra the letter."

Dwar. Stat., 623.

"Every affirmative statute is a repeal of a precedent affirmative statute, where its matter necessarily implies a negative; but only so far as it is clearly and indisputably contradictory and contrary to the former Act 'in the very matter,' and the repugnancy such that the two Acts cannot be reconciled; for then leges posteriores priores contrarias abrogant."

Dwar. Stat., 530 and 531, and authorities there quoted.

The enactment of 1843 is, "that every settler south of the Arkansas shall be entitled." John Percifull was one of those settlers, and he is included in the very words of the law, as much so as if the settlers had been enumerated and called by name. The Hot Springs were reserved in 1832, but John Percifull was settled there in 1814. The repugnance of the two laws is "in the very matter;" they cannot stand together.

Against this construction have been quoted Wilcox v. Jackson, 13 Pet., 513, and U. S. v. Gear, 3 How., 120. Of these the latter alone deserves consideration, having an apparent application to the case in hand.

In the case of Gear, a lead mine was discovered by preemption, upon the ground that all the lands in a certain district were directed to be sold by a law passed in 1834, which law made some special exceptions, but did not except lead mines. This court held that the general Law of 1807, which reserved all lead mines and salt springs from sale, was operative in the district mentioned, notwithstanding the broad terms of the Law of 1834.

The facts in this case are almost the reverse of those now before the court. The Act of 1807 was a general law reserving all salt springs and lead mines. On the other hand, the Act of 1832 was a special reservation of an isolated exceptional tract of land, which at that time was already occupied by a settler.

The Act of 1834, in Gear's case, was an Act of ordinary legislation, establishing a new district for the sale of lands.

On the contrary, again, the Act of 1843 was a special Act, designed to operate retrospectively upon a specified class of settlers, and to confirm a certain number of preemptions from their inception in 1814.

In the Gear case, the law might very reasonably be understood to mean "all the lands in this district shall be sold as far as the general policy of the laws allow such sales, and no further." In the present case it would be necessary to interpolate in the law, words of exception, thus: "Every settler on the public lands south of the Arkansas River," except the old pioneer John Percifull, shall be entitled, &c.; the remedial policy of curing the defects of title under the Act of 1814 shall not have its full effect; it shall cure everybody's title except John Percifull's.

Finally, in the one case, the general reservation was made long before the party had performed any act out of which his claim arose; in the other case, the act of settlement was performed long before the reservation, and the remedial Act comes afterwards to recognize the meritorious character of the original Act, and to remove an obstacle which prevented its operation at the time.

There is not a single argument used by the majority of the court in Gear's case which has any bearing whatever on the present controversy.

Quære. Does the case of Gear v. The U. S. establish anything more than this: that a subsequent law directing lead mines to be sold, does not so far repeal the Act of 1807 as to make such mines subject to settlement and preemption?

It has been already stated, that the Reservation Act of 1832 presents a similar difficulty in the way of the Belding title under the Act of 1830, and the supplementary Act of July 14, 1832, but there is this difference in the two cases: the two Acts—that of the 20th April and that of the 14th July, 1832—were passed at the same session of Congress, and of course, according to the established rule of construction, must have a much more intimate relation than the Acts of 1832 and 1843. Inasmuch as Belding had acquired no right under the Act of 1830, the Reservation Act of April might well be considered as an exception from the terms of the Act passed in July following.

Unless this Act of 1843 be construed to repeal the Reservation Act of 1832, it is admitted that no right accrues under the Act of 1814. The Land Office having uniformly maintained the existing validity of the Act of 1832, the parties to this record were never in a condition to make proof of their right to the satisfaction of the Register and Receiver. In 1851, the Secretary of the Interior authorized an investigation, and it was then that he allowed the heirs of Belding to make their entry as stated above, although he still insisted that the land was reserved from sale or entry by the Law of 1832.

If the Register and Receiver constitute a judicial tribunal, from which there was no appeal under the laws of 1814 and 1830, then both parties stand upon precisely the same footing; nor can it be of any importance that the Secretary of the Interior has undertaken to pronounce in favor of the one and against the other. It was not his province to decide at all.

All the latter preemption laws provide for an appeal to the commissioner and finally to the Secretary. In the absence of any appellate power, the general principle of law applicable, would pronounce the divided opinion to be equivalent to an adverse decision.

But it may be that the Register and Receiver, or either of them, have been so grossly partial or so plainly regardless of credible testimony, as to give evidence of actual fraud. Is the false decision of the Register and Receiver in such a case to preclude forever the just claims which have been either corruptly or capriciously ignored?

In the case of Cunningham v. Ashley, 14 How., 377, the Register and Receiver had not acted on the proof at all; yet it was held that the proof ought to have been satisfactory to them, and this court decreed in favor of the preemption. What is the distinction between refusing to hear proof at all, and refusing to give it a fair and rational bearing upon the rights of parties? According to the principle laid down in Lytle v. Arkansas, it is only when the register and receiver "act within the law, and the decision cannot be impeached for fraud or unfairness," that "it must be considered final."

In the cases quoted, however, the legal title had passed from the United States, and was in litigation between the parties. No such question is now presented to this court. Neither party to the record has the legal title; that still remains in the government. The utmost result of the present proceeding will be to transfer the mere possession from one party to the other, without any power on the part of the court to compel the issuance of a patent. If, however, the jurisdiction be such as to authorize the court to determine the possession according to the equitable rights of the parties under all the Acts of Congress, there can be no doubt that the Department will recognize and act upon the decision.

If the case is still in that condition which admits of doing justice through the action of the executive officers themselves, even undoing all that may have been improperly done, surely the court will not hesitate to leave the naked possession with that party which has the superior equity and is entitled to remain on the land.

The court below refused to hear any testimony, either to invalidate the entry made by Belding's heirs or to establish the preemption right of John Percifull. No opportunity was given to prove fraud which would make void the title of the plaintiffs below. The case must be sent back in order that the material facts may be determined by a jury.

The New Madrid Location.

This was not merely an outstanding title. Hale had purchased a portion of that interest, and produced it in his own right as a defense to the action. All testimony on this point was excluded, although all formal objections to the New Madrid certificate and survey were waived.

Attorney-General Reverdy Johnson thought this New Madrid location good and valid.

Cushing thought the contrary.

See his Opinion, 30th August, 1854.

Messrs. H. May, R. J. Brent and Geo. C. Watkins, for defendants in error:

This court has only jurisdiction to examine into the title of the plaintiffs in error so far as it is derived under an Act of Congress, which has been misconstrued by the Supreme Court of the State of Arkansas, to the prejudice of the plaintiffs in error. It has no authority to decide whether the title of the defendants in error was properly maintained by the court below; in other words, the only question is, in what respect the court below erred in deciding that the plaintiffs in error had no title under the Acts of Congress.

Miller v. Nicholls, 4 Wheat., 311; Davis v. Packard, 6 Pet., 41; Williams v. Norris, 12 Wheat., 117; Crowell v. Randell, 10 Pet., 368; Mackay v. Dillon, 4 How., 421; Chouteau v. Eckhart, 2 How., 344; Pollard v. Kibbe, 14 Pet., 353; City of Mobile v. Eslava, 16 Pet., 234; Menard v. Aspasia, 5 Pet., 505; Matthews v. Zane, 7 Wheat., 164.

2. The plaintiffs in error must derive title to themselves under the New Madrid warrant, and they have failed to do so. It is not enough to show outstanding title in somebody else under that claim.

Owings v. Norwood, 5 Cranch, 344; Fisher v. Cockerell, 5 Pet., 248; Henderson v. Tennessee, 10 How., 311.

In this case it does not appear by the record that Francis Langlois or his legal representatives ever made the location of the New Madrid grant, but the same was located by Hammond and Rector, 27th Jan., 1819; but the title of these locations is not sufficiently shown by the exhibits in the record, nor does it appear that the original grant in lieu of which this New Madrid certificate issued, was ever surrendered to the government, nor is there any proof of the New Madrid grant itself, but the secondary proof relied upon shows that this New Madrid grant was located prior to any public survey.

3. As to the New Madrid grants without patent, they confer no legal title, and the courts of the United States must disregard these equitable claims.

See 21 How., 481.

They must be located on lands then authorized to be sold, and they must be located within one year from 26th April, 1822.

21 How., 426.

In this last case the entry was in 1818, and the patent in 1827; but as the land was not authorized to be sold in 1818 when located, both title and patent were held void.

The counsel for the defendants in error cites the following decisions under the New Madrid Acts:

Lessieur v. Price, 12 How., 60; Barry v. Gamble, 3 How., 51; Bagnell v. Broderick, 13 Pet., 436; Cabunne v. Lindell, 12 Mo., 184; Wear v. Bryant, 5 Mo., 160; Kirk v. Green, 10 Mo., 253; Mitchell v. Tucker, 10 Mo., 262; Rector v. Welsh, 1 Mo., 238; Kennett v. Cole, Co. Ct. 13 Mo., 140.

The counsel reviewed Langlois' claim, and stated the following objections to it:

1. On the subjects that application was made to the Surveyor-General of Missouri for a survey, on Jan. 27, 1819, and a survey made on July 16, 1820.

(a) The application was not the location. The survey was not the location. The location was not made so as to become the inception of the title, until returned to the Recorder with plat, notice, &c., and approved by him, and recorded, &c.

Bagnell v. Broderick, 13 Pet., 436; Barry v. Gamble, 3 How., 51; Lessieur v. Price, 12 How., 60, above cited.

(b) The Indian title was not extinguished at the time of the passage of the New Madrid Act. The tract of country was not public land, the sale of which, in the language of the Act of Feb. 17, 1815, is authorized by law.

See 7 U. S. Stat. at L., 176; Gaines v. Nicholson, 9 How., 365; Scott v. Sandford, 19 How., 404.

The Indian right of possession is sacred, and cannot be disturbed without their consent.

Opinion of Mr. Wirt, 2 Ins. and Opin., No. 100, p. 58; No. 25, p. 28; Opinion of Mr. Butler, 2 Ins. and Opin., No. 54, p. 814; No. 59, p. 91; see, also, 2 Ins. and Opin., No. 10, p. 10; No. 11, p. 11; No. 12, p. 13; No. 23, p. 25; No. 787, p. 816.

(c) At the date of the supposed location, the lands in question were not authorized to be sold. The lands had not been surveyed. The location could, under the most liberal interpretation of the law, only be made on lands authorized to be sold at the time of location.

See Mills v. Stoddard, 8 How., 365; Stoddard v. Chambers, 2 How., 284; Barry v. Gamble, 3 How., 53.

The case of Easton v. Salsbury, 23 Mo., 100, is predicated upon these decisions, and is a strong authority to the effect that a New Madrid location is void when made upon land reserved from sale by reason of its being covered by a Spanish claim.

(d) At the time of the supposed survey in 1820, there was no authority for locating a New Madrid claim in the Territory of Arkansas, which had been organized by the Act of March 2, 1819.

(e) The survey is not evidence of title; it is only of the steps in which the claimant is the actor. The evidence of title does not remain in the office of the Surveyor-General, or emanate from it. The patent certificate, when issued by the recorder, is the evidence upon which ejectment is to be maintained.

All the foregoing objections are but a baseless fabrication, resting upon a mere supposition. There never was a survey, or what is the same thing, there is no evidence of it.

No title passes under the patent certificate, so called, for June 16, 1838.

1. Because, after the admission of Arkansas as a State, in 1836, there was no authority in the Surveyor-General of Arkansas to order a survey in 1837, or for one to be made in 1838 or returned to the Recorder of Land Titles of Missouri.

2. Because, by the Act of April 26, 1822, the time for making locations had absolutely expired, and never was extended, except in a qualified manner, for 18 months, by Act of March 2, 1831, in a particular class of cases, of which this is not one.

3. Because the land had been reserved by the Act of April 20, 1832.

4. Because the land was appropriated on, and by the Act of May 29, 1830, by means of the Belding preemption.

The junior certificate on the elder right is superior to the senior certificate on the junior right. The inception of title governs.

Mr. Justice Catron delivered the opinion of the court:

A contest for the ownership of the Hot Springs, in Arkansas, has been pending for some years before the General Land Office, and in the courts of that State. One party derived their title through a preemption claim, as an occupant under the Acts of Congress of 1830 and 1832, and the other by the location of a New Madrid warrant on the same land.

In December, 1851, the heirs of Belding were allowed to enter the quarter section, including the springs. This entry was held to be valid by the state courts, and to clothe them with a sufficient legal title to sustain an action of ejectment, according to the laws of Arkansas. They held the decision of the Register and Receiver, in favor of the occupant claimants, to be conclusive evidence of title, as against all persons who could not show a better opposing claim.

As between the titles of the United States and Belding's heirs, the state courts did not decide; but only, that the outstanding title in the United States could not be relied on by the defendant in this action; nor is the validity of the entry of Belding's heirs drawn in question in this court.

The defendant relied on a survey made in June, 1838, founded on a New Madrid certificate for 200 arpents.

To support this survey, an application was produced, dated 27th January, 1819, signed by S. Hammond and Elias Rector, addressed to William Rector, surveyor of the public lands, &c., asking to have surveyed and to be allowed to enter the Recorder's certificate for 200 arpents, granted by him to Francis Langlois, or his legal representatives, and dated the 26th November, 1818 (No 467). The survey to be made in a square tract; the lines to correspond to the cardinal points, and to include the Hot Springs in the center. In 1818, the spring was in the Indian country, to which, of course, no public surveys extended. And as the Act of 1815 (3 Stat. at L., 211), providing for New Madrid sufferers, only allowed them to enter their warrants on lands "the sale of which was authorized by law," the unsurveyed lands could not be legally appropriated; and, of necessity, the Surveyor-General disregarded the application to have a survey made for Langlois. And thus the claim stood from 1818 to 1838.

The defendant offered in evidence the certificate of a private survey of the claim of Langlois, made by James S. Conway, D. S., dated July 16th, 1820, which includes the spring. This paper the court also rejected.

Until the survey on Langlois' claim was presented to the Recorder of Land Titles at St. Louis, and recognized by him as proper and valid, it could have no force, as this was the only mode of location contemplated by the Act of 1815 (3 Stat. at L., 211). So it has been uniformly held. Bagnell v. Broderick, 13 Pet., 436; Lessieur v. Price, 12 How., 9.

The Act of April 26th, 1822, validated locations of New Madrid certificates then existing, and which had been made in advance of the public surveys; but the 2d section of the Act declared that future locations should conform to the public surveys, and that all such warrants should be located within one year after the passage of the Act.

As the public surveys then existing in Missouri and Arkansas Territory were open to satisfy these claims, there was no difficulty in complying with the Act of 1822 (3 Stat. at L., 668).

Reliance is placed on the Act of Congress of March, 1843 (5 Stat. at L., 603), to maintain the survey of 1838, of the New Madrid certificate. That Act provides, that locations before that time made on New Madrid warrants, on the South side of Arkansas River, if made in pursuance of the Act of 1815 (3 Stat. at L., 211) in other respects, shall be perfected into grants, in like manner as if the Indian title to the lands on the south side of the river had been completely extinguished at the time of the passage of said Act of 1815. The Act of 1843 (5 Stat. at L., 603) does not apply to the survey and location of Langlois made in 1838, for several reasons:

1st. The sale of the land thus surveyed was not authorized by law; the Act of April 20th, 1832 (4 Stat. at L., 505), having reserved from location or sale the Hot Springs, and four sections of land including them as their center.

2d. The attempted location was void, because barred by the Act of 26th April, 1822 (3 Stat. at L., 668), which Act was not repealed or modified by the Act of 1843. This Act referred to locations made on the south of the River Arkansas, of lands regularly surveyed and subject to sale, and which locations had been made on or before the 26th April, 1823, when the bar was interposed.

We are of opinion that the New Madrid survey of 1838 was altogether invalid, and properly rejected by the state courts.

It has been earnestly pressed on our consideration, that the entry of Belding's heirs is also void, because the land it covers was not subject to entry by an occupant claimant, or anyone else, after the Act of April 20th, 1832 (4 Stat. at L., 505), had reserved it from sale.

Admitting it to be true, that the Act of April, 1832 (4 Stat. at L., 505), was passed when no individual claimant had a vested right to enter the land in dispute, still the 25th section of the Judiciary Act only gives jurisdiction to this court in cases where the decision of the state court draws in question the validity of an authority exercised under the United States, and the decision is against its validity. Here, however, the decision was in favor of the defendant's entry, and sustained the authority exercised by the Department of Public Lands, in allowing Belding's heirs to purchase. Moreover, the plaintiff in error is not in a condition to draw in question the validity of Belding's entry. He relies on an outstanding title in the United States to defeat the action. Being a trespasser, without title in himself, he cannot be heard to set up such title. "To give jurisdiction to this court, the party must claim for himself, and not for a third person, in whose title he has no interest." Henderson v. Tennessee, 10 How., 328. The plaintiff in error must claim (for himself) some title, right, privilege or exemption, under an Act of Congress, &c., and the decision must be against his claim, to give this court jurisdiction. Setting up a title in the United States, by way of defense, is not claiming a personal interest affecting the subject in litigation. This is the established construction of the 25th section of the Judiciary Act. Montgomery v. Hernandis, 12 Wheat., 132.

If it was allowed to rely on the United States title in this instance, the right might be decided against the government, where it was no party and had not been heard.

A claim is set up in defense, that John Percifull was entitled to a preference of entry under the Act of 1814 (3 Stat. at L., 121); which Act, it is insisted, was revived by that of 1843 (5 Stat. at L., 603), sec. 3. Suppose that Percifull's right to appropriate the land in dispute was undoubted, and that the Register and Receiver had allowed the heirs of Belding to enter wrongfully; still, the courts of Arkansas, in this action of ejectment, had no right to interfere, and set up Percifull's rejected claim.

But this is of little consequence, as, when the Act of April, 1832 (4 Stat. at L., 505), was passed, reserving the Hot Springs from sale, Percifull had no vested interest in the land that a court of justice could recognize. Then, the United States Government was the legal owner, and had the power to reserve it from sale; so that the offer to purchase in 1851, under the assumed preference to entry claimed for Percifull, was inadmissible. Had the entry been allowed, in face of the Act of Congress, such proceeding would have been merely void.

These being the only questions within our jurisdiction worthy of consideration in the causes Nos. 15, 16, 17, 18 and 19, it is ordered that the respective judgments rendered therein, by the Supreme Court of Arkansas, be affirmed.

Collision between flat boat and steamer—where both boats in fault, damages and costs divided—admiralty jurisdiction

In case of collision on the Yazoo River, between flat boat and steamer, held that the flat boat was in fault. It should have had steady and fixed lights, and occupied near the shore of the river, giving a sufficient passage to the ascending steamboat, and kept on a straight line of the water and not in a diagonal course.

There was also fault in the steamer. Seeing the light ahead the master should have stopped his boat at once, and reversed her wheels, until the locality of the light was clearly ascertained. He could haved backed his boat, until he avoided the flat boat.

In cases where both boats are in fault, the damages and also the costs, must be divided between them.

The admiralty jurisdiction applies to all navigable waters, except to a commerce exclusively within a State.

Argued Jan. 5, 1860. Decided Jan. 16, 1860.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Louisiana.

The libel in this case was filed in the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Louisiana, by appellants, against the steamer Brigadier-General R. H. Stokes, to recover damages resulting from a collision. The claimants first pleaded to the jurisdiction, and then denied that the steamer was in fault. The district court entered a decree in favor of the libelants, for $7,616.44, with five per cent. interest and costs. The circuit court, on appeal, held that the admiralty court had no jurisdiction, and reversed this decree; whereupon the libelants appealed to this court.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

April 9, 1858, "Mr. Gillet, of counsel for the appellees, moved the court to dismiss this appeal on the ground of a want of jurisdiction originally in the district court, on consideration whereof, it is the opinion of this court that the question of jurisdiction in the lower court is a proper one for appeal to this court, and for argument when the case is regularly reached, and that this court have jurisdiction on such appeal; whereupon it is now here ordered by the court, that the motion to dismiss this appeal on that ground be, and the same is hereby overruled." Per Mr. Chief Justice Taney.

Mr. Albert Pike, for appellants:

The limits of the admiralty jurisdiction of the courts of the United States under the Constitution, are not those of the admiralty jurisdiction in England. The grant in the Constitution extending judicial power "to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction," is neither to be limited to, nor interpreted by, what were cases of admiralty jurisdiction in England at that day.

Waring v. Clarke, 5 How., 441; N. J. Steam Nav. Co. v. Merchants' Bank, 6 How., 344; Newton v. Stebbins, 10 How., 586.

It was within the constitutional power of Congress to enact that this jurisdiction should extend to the great fresh-water lakes and the rivers connecting the same.

The Genesee Chief, 12 How., 443; see, also, The Vengeance, 3 Dall., 297; The Betsey, 4 Cranch, 443.

The admiralty jurisdiction extends upon our great navigable rivers above tide-waters, in the absence of any law of Congress extending the jurisdiction; and under the Constitution itself.

Messrs. R. H. Gillet and C. Cushing, for appellees:

Congress can confer no broader jurisdiction than is authorized by the Constitution.

At the time of framing the Constitution, the words "admiralty and maritime jurisdiction" had a distinct legal meaning, as much as the words "judicial power."

U. S. v. Ferreira, 13 How., 40; De Lovio v. Boit, 2 Gall., 398, 471.

In law, at the date of our Constitution, navigable waters extended no further than the tide ebbed and flowed, and from the last bridges seaward.

The Act of 1845, extending the admiralty jurisdiction to the lakes and navigable waters connecting them, distinctly recognizes this view.

5 Stat. at L., 726.

This court had then settled the law and the country was acting under it, as the following cases will show:

The Thomas Jefferson, 10 Wheat., 428; Peyroux v. Howard, 7 Pet., 324; Waring v. Clarke, 5 How., 441; The Orleans v. Phœbus, 11 Pet., 175, 183; U. S. v. Coombs, 12 Pet., 72, 76.

The Act of 1845 did not alter the law except as to the lakes and their connecting waters, if in fact it altered it there.

If the territorial jurisdiction is not bounded by the ebbing and flowing of the tide, then it is not and cannot be limited by any definite boundaries.

This case is not within the ruling of The Genesee Chief, and therefore must be dismissed.

12 How., 443, 458.

The steamer in this case is not averred to have been enrolled and licensed for the coasting trade, nor engaged in a commerce between different States and Territories. It is excluded by the express words of the decision in the case of The Genesee Chief; and without now revoking that decision, this court must decree that it has no jurisdiction over it, and therefore must dismiss it.

Further argument of counsel to the merits of the case, being confined to the facts involved, is not here given.

Mr. Justice McLean delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal in admiralty from the Circuit Court of the United States of the Eastern District of Louisiana.

The libelants allege that they were the consignees of a certain flat boat called "Clear the Track," and of three hundred and sixty-six bales of cotton, which were shipped to them by various persons by said flat boat; that said boat left Sardinia, on Yakana River, in the State of Mississippi, on the 19th February, 1853, bound for New Orleans; that on the 2d March ensuing, on said voyage, descending the Yazoo River, about eight miles below the head of Honey Island, and within the admiralty jurisdiction, about four o'clock on the morning of said day, the flat boat, being a stanch, tight and well built vessel, completely rigged and well provided with tackle, apparel and furniture, and having on board a full complement of men to navigate the boat, being about the middle of the said Yazoo River, leaving sufficient space on either side for a steamboat or other large vessel to pass, and having a light upon the flat boat, the captain and crew of the boat being up, the steamboat Brigadier-General R. H. Stokes, ascending the said river, struck the flat boat "Clear the Track" in the bows, which caused her to fill with water, and become a complete wreck; that the steamboat rung her bell, recognizing the light of the flat boat, but continuing to run up the middle of the river.

In their answers, the respondents say that the collision set forth in the libel occurred on the Yazoo River, about fifty miles above the foot of said island, and more than two hundred miles above the mouth of the Yazoo, where it falls into the Mississippi River; and that the entire length of the Yazoo River is within the State of Mississippi; and they allege that the district court has not jurisdiction of the matters and things, or the claim alleged in the libel against the respondent. And the respondent denies that the collision was caused or did happen by any fault, negligence or want of skill in the officers or crew of the steamboat; and they say it was caused by the unskillful management of the flat boat; and the proper place for the flat boat, it is said, was at the shore at night; and that there was not sufficient space for the steamboat to pass between the flat boat and the shore.

D. B. Miller says: I have seen the flat boat; she seemed to have a sufficient number of hands on board, and to be well managed. From the size of the boat, witness thinks she was suitable for the navigation of the Yazoo and Mississippi rivers, and from her size she would carry three hundred and fifty bales of cotton and more.

Jackson Harris is of the same opinion. James D. Bell examined the boat well, and considered her strong and well built. Saw her loaded with three hundred and forty bales of cotton, and says she would have carried fifty more bales safely. Capt. Williams was captain of the flat boat "Clear the Track" when the collision occurred. Besides himself, he had five hands and one passenger, who also worked. Witness began his trip at Sardinia, on the Yakana River. The flat boat had three hundred and seventy-one bales of cotton on board. Nothing of importance occurred until the morning of the second of March, 1853, when a steamer was heard coming up the river, which afterwards proved to be The Brigadier-General R. H. Stokes. Witness had laid down about twelve o'clock that night, but was shortly afterwards awakened by Johnson, one of his hands, who informed him a steamboat was approaching, and he desired witness to be on deck. Witness saw the steamer approaching, at a distance of about half a mile. A light on deck was immediately prepared. At this time, the steamboat was about four or five hundred yards out of sight round the point. The witness ordered his men, four of whom were on deck at the time, to throw the boat out from the point, so as to give the steamer room to pass. Continued efforts were made for this purpose, until the collision occurred.

When the boats came together, all hands were at the oars, except Mr. Johnson, who held the light. The steamboat could be seen across the point. It was some fifteen minutes, the steamboat being in full view, before the boats came into collision. The flat boat was struck on the first stanchion from the corner of the bow nearest the point of the nosing, about three feet from the jackstaff of the steamer. The collision was very severe—so great as to knock every one down on the flat boat. Witness was knocked down senseless by the crane neck of the oar, but he saw all the others fall before he fell. When witness recovered from the effect of the blow, he perceived the steamer had passed out of his view. Every effort was made to stop the hole made in the flat boat by the steamer, and, by working the pump, to keep the boat from sinking. The boat floated down some twenty-five miles before they could land her. In less than an hour after the collision, the boat sank six feet deeper in the water, and became unmanageable; and a landing was made, with great difficulty, at some three or four o'clock in the afternoon.

The steamer Stacy came down the river the next day, and she took on two hundred bales of the cotton, including the thirty-five on shore. Before the arrival of The Stacy, witness had engaged the steamboat McLean to go up and take up the cotton that could be saved.

Witness has been engaged in flat boating on the Yazoo River for the last eighteen years. He does not consider the place where the collision happened as unsafe to run a float boat at night, and that it is not usual to tie up flat boats in that part of the river.

The witness says the flat boat had a torch made of split pine boards, as usual on such occasions. The Stacy met the flat boat in a very narrow part of the river, much narrower than where the flat boat met The Stokes. The Stacy was much nearer the flat boat when she rang her bell than The Stokes, but she backed out of the way. The Stacy is double the size of The Stokes, it being the largest boat that runs up the Yazoo.

Mr. Johnson is corroborated by others in his statement. Thomas Barnes says the steamer did not change her course after seeing the flat boat. The steamer was not hurt. Her jackstaff was knocked off, which was replaced. Did not hear Captain Williams offer any assistance to the flat boat. At the time the steamer struck the flat boat she was nearly in full headway.

Witness thinks there was time enough for the steamer to get out of the way of the flat-boat. The master of the boat entered a regular protest against the steamer. A number of witnesses referred to facts which have no material bearing in the case.

On the part of the respondent, it was proved by William F. Mouldin, the pilot on the Yazoo since 1845, and was so acting on The Stokes when the collision occurred, eight miles from the head of Honey Island. The bell was rung to stop at Hall's Landing. Directly after ringing the large bell to land, saw a light, as he supposed at the landing. The river was narrow and the current swift. After running a short distance, and rounding the point, saw the flat boat about three hundred yards above the steamer. He immediately rang the bell to stop the engines, and then to back her, which was done. When she had made about six revolutions the collision took place. The steamboat was nearly at a stand. The flat boat was floating nearly broadside down the river. There was no possible means by which a collision could be avoided. The steamboat could not pass on either side of the flat boat. This, however, is controverted by other witnesses, who say that there was space on each side of the flat boat for the steamer to pass up the river.

That the light on the flat boat was seen some two or three hundred yards by the steamer approaching the flat boat, is admitted; but it is urged that a steady light should have appeared on the flat boat; that a waving lighted torch often misleads an ascending boat, on the supposition that it is on shore, and designates a landing place. Several of the witnesses say, that on observing the approach of the flat boat, the wheel of the steamer was reversed, and some five or six revolutions had been performed when the collision occurred. Some of the witnesses think that the force of the steamer was checked, so that its movement up the river could scarcely be perceived when the steamer struck the flat boat.

It has happened in this case, as in all other cases of collision, that the witnesses on board of their respective boats, from the circumstances which surrounded them, and the favorable impressions naturally felt in regard to the efforts made by their respective crews to save the property and lives under their charge, differ widely in their opinions. The steamboat received but little or no injury by the collision; but the flat boat, in its structure and cargo, received material injury. The evidence fully proves this, not only in regard to the flat boat and cargo, but also as to the expense and loss to which the owner was subjected.

It is unnecessary to go into detail to show the facts proved. It is enough to know the character of the transaction, and the responsibilities incurred by the respective parties.

The general rule is, where two vessels meet each other, one propelled by steam and the other by the winds, the steamer must give way, and avoid a collision. To this no one can object; but, like other general rules, it may be subject to exceptions.

The Yazoo extends, from its junction with the Mississippi River, some two hundred miles and upwards into the State of Mississippi, and in some parts its navigation requires care and experience. Its channel widens and deepens as the volume of water increases; but it is a narrow river, and its course is crooked—but The Stacey and other boats, of a large class for inland boats, navigate it with success.

Several of the steamboat witnesses think that a flat boat, laden with three hundred and seventy bales of cotton, ought not to run on a dark night, but should be tied up, where the channel is narrow, and have fixed lights, which distinguish it from a place of landing. Other witnesses differ from the above, and say that an inland navigation so long and important as this, ought to be left free to the enterprise of its inhabitants. This is more congenial to the spirit of our people than a regulation which would retard commerce, without any adequate beneficial results. No measure of this character could well be adopted, without an accurate survey of the river, in which the points of danger should be designated. Until this shall be done, it would seem most judicious not to go beyond a regulation for boats, passing each other in ascending and descending this river, having lights, and giving notice of their approach. There are regulations which apply to our internal navigation, embracing our rivers and other waters. Under these, every master of a boat should act with a presumed knowledge of his duty, and be held responsible accordingly.

We think, in several particulars, the captain of the flat boat was in fault. He should have had one or more steady and fixed lights on one or more conspicuous parts of his boat. He should have been careful, by having the upper and lower end sweeps or oars so worked as to have occupied near the shore of the river, giving a sufficient passage to the ascending steamboat. Especially he should have so guided his boat as to have kept it on a straight line of the water, and not on a diagonal course. It is easily perceived that, from the position of the flat boat, it was difficult, if not impracticable, to ascend the river by the steamer without striking the flat boat, in the position it occupied.

But we think there was also fault in the steamer. In rounding the point, it is admitted, the steamer was at least three hundred yards below the flat boat. Seeing the light ahead, the master, in the use of ordinary caution, should have stopped his boat at once, and reversed her wheels, until the locality of the light was clearly ascertained. It is no excuse, that he mistook the light for a place of landing. The commander cannot lessen his responsibility by alleging his mistake. He is bound to make no mistake, for it is his duty to stop his boat where he doubts, until he ascertains the facts. Had this been done, the collision could not have occurred. He could have backed his boat, until he avoided the flat boat. In not having done this, the steamer was in fault, and the damages must be divided between the two boats, and also the costs.

Some doubts have been suggested whether, in the exercise of the admiralty jurisdiction, some limit may not be interposed.

Under the English system, the ebb and flow of the tide, with few, if any, exceptions, established the fact of navigability; and this was the course of decision in this country until recently.

The vast extent of our fertile country, its increasing commerce, its inland seas, bays and rivers, open to us a commercial prosperity in the future which no nation ever enjoyed. Our contracted views of the English admiralty, which was limited by the ebb and flow of the tide, were discarded, and the more liberal principles of the civil law, equally embraced by the Constitution, were adopted.

This law is commercial in its character, and applies to all navigable waters, except to a commerce exclusively within a State. Many of our leading rivers are sometimes unnavigable; but this cannot affect their navigability at other times. A commerce carried on between two or more States is subject to the laws and regulations of Congress, and to the admiralty jurisdiction.

Upon the whole, the decree of the circuit court is reversed, and the cause is remanded, under the above order of this court.

Mr. Justice Campbell, dissenting:

The decree in the circuit court, dismissing the libel in this cause, was rendered before the judgment in this court in the case of Jackson v. The Magnolia, 20 How., 296, was given. There is no material differences in the cases. The reasons for the judgment of the circuit court in this case are contained in the opinion filed by me in that case. I do not consider it necessary or proper to repeat them here. I concur in the judgment of the court upon the merits of the cause.

Mr. Justice Catron concurs with the opinion of the court, because the question of jurisdiction, involved in this cause, was ruled in the case of The Magnolia, referred to by Mr. Justice Campbell.

MARY FORT ADAMS, Adm'x of JOHN HAGAN, Jr., Deceased, Appt.,

v.

JOHN S. PRESTON AND CAROLINE M. PRESTON, HIS WIFE.

(See S. C., 22 How., 473–491.)

Judgment of state court cannot be reviewed, as contrary to state law—U. S. courts have no jurisdiction of insolvencies settled in state courts—cancellation of mortgages in Louisiana—appearance of creditor in insolvent proceedings waives payment by insolvent.

This court cannot review a judgment of the Parish Court of New Orleans, for any irregularity or illegality in the proceedings of that court, if either existed, when there could have been an appeal to the Supreme Court of Louisiana for its correction.

This court has never done so, in any case in which the subject-matter of a suit was within the jurisdiction of a state court, upon the allegation that its judgment had been given contrary to the laws of the State.

NOTE.—Jurisdiction of U. S. Supreme Court; to declare state law void as in conflict with State Constitution; to revise decrees of state courts as to construction of state laws. It is for state courts to construe their own Statutes. Supreme Court will not review their decisions except when specially authorized to by statute. See note to Jackson v. Lamphire, 7 U. S. (3 Cranch), 280; and note to Commercial B'k v. Buckingham, 46 U. S. (5 How.), 317.

The Parish Court of New Orleans had, by law, full power over the property ceded by an insolvent, and over the claims of creditors, and exercised its jurisdiction, and the legality of its judgment cannot be questioned by this court.

The courts of the United States have no jurisdiction over the settlement of insolvencies in the state courts. The parish court had exclusive jurisdiction.

The erasure and cancellation of mortgages may be made in Louisiana, by the judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction; where it has the effect of a res judicata.

After the erasure and cancellation so made, there can be no subsequent reinscription of a mortgage.

Neither the reinscription nor the assignment to the plaintiff, could have the effect to give to the plaintiff any claim upon property of the insolvent, which had been sold under the judgment of a court having jurisdiction in insolvency.

The appearance in the concurso of the creditors, and acquiescence with them in fixing the terms for the sale of the property of the insolvent, must be taken as a waiver of all rights of the payment of judgments against the insolvent.

Argued Dec. 30, 1859. Decided Jan. 16, 1860.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Louisiana.

The history of the case, and a very full statement of the facts involved, appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Miles Taylor and Alex. T. Steele, for appellants:

1. A mortgage in the State of Louisiana, duly inscribed in the register of mortgages, in the parish where the debtor has his domicil, will affect or bind the slaves of the debtor, no matter in what part of the State such slaves may be employed.

C. C., 453, 454, 458, 461, 3216, 3238, 3246, 3247, 3248, 3250; Hyams v. Smith 6 La. Ann., 363; Patin v. Creditors, 9 La., 71; Hooper v. The Union Bank of La., 10 Rob. La., 63; 11 Rob. Ann., 127; Voorhies v. De Blanc, 12 La. Ann., 864.

2. No mortgage of any kind existed in favor of the heirs of Hampton upon the slaves, which are the object of the present action, on the 2d day of February, 1841, when they filed their intervention in the suit then pending in the Parish Court of New Orleans, wherein the syndics of the creditors of Thomas Barrett were plaintiffs and Robert Bell was defendant, nor at any time thereafter, nor did any privilege exist on them in favor of the heirs of Hampton; and these slaves were then affected by, and subject to, the judicial mortgages resulting from the judgments duly recorded against Thomas Barrett in the Parish of New Orleans, where he had his domicil.

3. The proceedings had in the case of The Syndics of the Creditors of Thomas Barrett v. Robert Bell, in the Parish Court of New Orleans, upon the intervention of the heirs of Hampton filed therein, were and are, so far as to the mortgage rights of the Union Bank on the property of the insolvent Barrett res inter alios acta, and can have in law or equity no effect in sheltering the slaves in question from pursuit, when the object is to subject them to the operation of the judicial mortgages which existed in favor of that Bank at the time of making such intervention. Neither was there anything in the proceedings in the case of Barrett v. His Creditors, 4 Rob. La., 408, which could have had any such effect.

In conclusion, we claim that at the date of Barrett's surrender and afterwards, the heirs of Wade Hampton had no mortgage upon the slaves of Barrett which we now desire to subject to the payment of our debt, and that at the same time the Union Bank did have a mortgage on those slaves; that the heirs of Hampton (of whom the defendants are two) received the property in payment of a debt which they claimed to be due to them with mortgage without any payment whatever, and that the Union Bank received nothing; and, that the sale of the property to Hampton's heirs did not cancel any mortgages which were upon the property, and that the questions presented in this case were not and could not have been examined in the case of The Syndics of Barrett v. Bell, or of Barrett v. His Creditors, and also that the plea of prescription filed by defendants, could not apply to the case: and also that the acts of the syndics, in pretending to cancel the mortgages of the Union Bank, were void.

These are all the questions raised by the pleadings.

Mr. J. P. Benjamin, for appellees:

1. The bill must be dismissed for want of proper parties. This objection was taken in the court below, and is insurmountable.

The bill prays to annul a judgment rendered in a suit between the syndics of Thomas Barrett and Robert Bell and the heirs of Wade Hampton intervening; yet, neither of the original parties to the suit is before the court, and only one out of the three intervening parties.

It seeks to set aside a sale made by Barrett's syndic and Robert Bell to the three heirs of Wade Hampton; yet none of the vendors are before the court, and only one of three purchasers is made party.

The bill attempts to excuse the want of parties that it admits to be necessary, by averring them to be beyond the jurisdiction of the court.

This excuse cannot avail.

Shields v. Barrow, 17 How., 130 Coiron v. Millaudon, 19 How., 113.

2. The Parish Court of New Orleans was vested by law with full power over all the property ceded by the insolvent, and over the respective claims of the creditors.

Any error or illegality in the proceedings of the parish court, should have been corrected by appeal to the Supreme Court of Louisiana.

Turver v. Turver, 9 Pet., 174; Gaines v. Chew, 2 How., 619, 644; Fouvergne v. City of N. O., 18 How., 471.

That the law of Louisiana vested in the parish court full and conclusive jurisdiction over the property surrendered and the distribution of its proceeds against the creditors, is too clear to admit of dispute.

Insolvent Law of La. of 1817; Insolvent Law of La., 13th March, 1837; Act of Legistature, La., 1826.

All the property previously owned by the insolvent, become vested in the creditors represented by the syndics as their trustees.

Schroeder v. Nicholson, 2 La., 354; Morgan v. Creditors, 7 La., 62; Dwight v. Simon, 4 La. Ann., 492.

And all creditors who are parties to the insolvent proceedings, are absolutely prohibited from seeking remedies in any other court, even of the State of Louisiana, than that in which the insolvency is pending.

Jacobs v. Bogart, 7 Rob. La., 162; Marsh v. Marsh, 9 Rob. La., 46; Tyler v. Cred's, 9 Rob. La., 378.

And not only is this so, but previously existing suits in other courts are all required by law to be transferred to the court having jurisdiction of the insolvency, and to be there cumulated with the insolvent proceedings.

Code of Prac., art. 165, sec. 3.

3. If, however, it be pretended that the circuit court had jurisdiction of the complainant's demand on the ground of the frauds charged in the bill, the answer is, that those frauds are denied in the answer, and not one scintilla of proof has been offered in support of them.

4. Should it be decided by the court that the foregoing points are not sustainable, and that the merits of the controversy between the parties are open for examination, then it is contended in behalf of appellees:

I. That complainant has no such mortgage rights as are alleged by him, because the mortgages were canceled many years before he acquired the judgments assigned to him.

These mortgages were canceled by consent of complainant's assignor.

Independently of this consent, they were canceled by the syndics by virtue of power vested in them by law, and this was done on the 2d of June, 1841.

These mortgages claimed by complainant were also ordered to be erased and canceled by judgment of the court rendered contradictorily with the Union Bank, more than four years before the transfer by the Bank to the complainant.

The complainant seems to think, that because the law (C. C., 3333) provides that mortgages cease to have effect after a lapse of ten years from the registry, unless the registry be renewed, it is, therefore, in the power of a mortgagee to revive a mortgage legally canceled and erased by the ex parte act of reinscribing it on the books of the mortgage office. No argument can be needed on such a pretension.

Observe, in the transfer from the Bank, to Hagan, the Bank does not profess to sell any mortgage claims; does not pretend that there then, 1849, existed any inscription of the jugdments, but simply transfers its claim without any warranty. The idea on which this suit was brought, is plainly an after-thought, and the suit itself purely a speculation in litigation.

The appearance and action of the Bank in the concursor or meeting of creditors, and fixing the terms of sale of the property, was a legal waiver of any right to follow the property, and an agreement to look alone to the proceeds in the hands of their agents, the syndics.

Egerton v. Creditors, 2 Rob., 201; Saul v. Creditors, 7 Mart. N. S., 446, 447.

Finally, the sale of the property by order of court in the partition suit extinguished the mortgages, and left the parties entitled to them no other recourse than to claim the proceeds of the sale. The law is the same in probate and insolvent sales.

Fabre v. Hepp, 7 La. Ann., 5; Gilmore v. Menard, 9 La. Ann., 212; Williamson v. Creditors, 5 Mart., 620; Kohn, Syndic, v. Marsh, 3 Rob. La., 48.

The rights of the Union Bank as judgment creditors were finally settled in the parish court, and the judgments therein rendered for the application of the proceeds of the sale to the payment of Hampton's heirs; and the judgments finally homologating the accounts of the syndics, are final and conclusive adjudications of the subject-matter of this suit, and form res judicata against complainant.

Morgan v. Creditors, 4 La., 174; Ory v. Creditors, 12 La., 121; Lang v. Creditors, 14 La., 237; Smith v, De LaLande, 1 Rob. La., 384; Egerton v. Creditors, 2 Rob. La., 201; Coiron v. Millaudon, 3 La. Ann., 664.

And it makes no difference that the price was not actually paid to the syndics, but retained by Hampton's heirs in satisfaction of their claim, as this was their legal right.

Goodale v. Creditors, 8 La., 302; Rodriguez v. Dupertrand, 1 Rob. La., 535; Robert v. Creditors, 2 La. Ann., 535.

Complainant's claim is barred by prescription. The suit to annul the judgments and decrees of the parish court, is barred by the lapse of one year.

La. Code of Pr., 607, 713.

And the mere lapse of time, long acquiescence, and laches of the complainant and assignors, from the sale in 1841 till the filing of the bill in 1853, coupled with the fact that the complainant is a mere assignee of a right to file a bill in equity for fraud, form a sufficient ground for the dismissal of the bill.

2 Story Eq. Jur., sec. 1520, and authorities there cited; Prosser v. Edmonds, 1 You. & Coll., 481; Ward v. Van Bokkelen, 2 Paige, Ch., 289; Worsham v. Brown, 4 Ga., 284.

The complainant's right to enforce his mortgage, even if it were valid, is prescribed by the lapse of ten years.

C. C., 3495, 3374, sec. 6, 3508, 3444; Lanusse v. Minturn, 11 La., 256.

The original inscriptions of the mortgages claimed by Hampton's heirs were valid, and the registry of the sale from Leroy Pope to Barrett created a privilege in their favor, and operated as a valid reinscription of the original mortgages.

The heirs of Hampton were legally and rightfully recognized as entitled to the privilege accorded by law to partnership creditors, in the partnership assets.

Mr. Justice Wayne delivered the opinion of the court:

We have given our best consideration to this record, in connection with the minute statement made from it by the counsel of the complainant, without having been able to find any cause for the reversal of the judgment.

The plaintiff sued the defendants, John S. Preston and Caroline M. Preston, his wife, as the joint possessors of one hundred and thirteen negroes, and their increase, to subject them, and the revenues which had been derived from their labor, to the payment of certain judgments which the plaintiff says he owns, as the assignee of the Union Bank of Louisiana.

Those judgments had been obtained by that Bank against Thomas Barrett, a resident of the City of New Orleans. He alleges that Barrett was the owner of the slaves when the judgments were obtained, and that, by reason of that fact, and the Bank's assignment to him, he had a judicial mortgage upon them, their increase and revenues, to pay the judgments.

The suit was brought in the Third District Court of New Orleans, when the defendants were sojourners there; and being cited to answer, they appeared. Being citizens of the State of South Carolina, they removed the cause to the States Circuit Court for the Eastern District of Louisiana, in which it was filed in the chancery side of the docket. There the defendants filed a dilatory exception in bar of the action against them; which being overruled, they were required answer. And they did so.

They neither admit nor deny the original validity of the judgments against Barrett, nor the assignment of them to the plaintiff; and they admit that the one hundred and thirteen slaves had belonged to Barrett; but giving at the same time their narrative of the manner in which Barrett had acquired title to them and the judicial proceedings under which they bought the property. They state, in their answer, that Wade Hampton, of South Carolina, being the owner of Whitehall plantation, in the parish of St. James, in Louisiana, sold it on the 8th April, 1829, to Leroy Pope, for $100,000, payable in twenty years from the 1st day of January, 1830, with interest at six per cent. per annum, payable annually. That the seller took from Pope a mortgage on the plantation, and also an obligation that he would add to the plantation seventy working hands, and mortgage them to Hampton, with their increase, to secure the payment of Pope's purchase and interest. Pope, on the 23d of February following, complied with his obligation, by mortgaging seventy working hands and thirty-one children to Hampton. He was then a resident of the parish of St. James.

Pope, two years afterwards, on the 18th March, 1833, sold the plantation and slaves to Thomas Barrett, of New Orleans, for $151,034. In payment, Barrett assumed to pay the debt of $100,000, and the accruing interest annually, to Hampton, and received the property, subject to the rights of Hampton upon the plantation and slaves. Two days afterwards, Barrett conveyed one half of his purchase to Robert Bell, with an agreement that Bell's interest should be considered as having attached from the day of Barrett's purchase. Barrett failed to pay the interest; and Hampton being dead, his heirs brought suits for it, and these judgments were obtained against him in January, 1838, March, 1839, and April, 1839. The judgments were recorded in New Orleans, where Barrett lived; but the mortgages and conveyances given to Hampton, and his conveyance of the plantation, were recorded, when they were executed, in the parish of St. James, where the slaves were, and where Pope and Bell both lived.

Barrett became embarrassed, and applied for the benefit of the Insolvent Laws of Louisiana, on the 12th May, 1840. In the schedule of property surrendered to his creditors is found an item of Whitehall plantation and one hundred and fifty slaves, valued at $210,000, subject to the bond for $100,000, and the interest due thereon.

A meeting of Barrett's creditors was held on the 15th June, 1840. Syndics were elected by them, with general discretionary powers, particularly with the power to sue for the partition of any property whatsoever held and owned by the insolvent jointly with others, and to claim partition in kind or by sale; also, to appoint agents for the disposal of property out of New Orleans. Amongst the creditors at this meeting who elected the syndics, was the Bank of Louisiana, by its representative, its president. In October, after this meeting or the creditors, the heirs of Hamption intervened in the insolvent proceedings, claimed their rights under the mortgages upon Whitehall and upon the negroes; and they took a rule upon Magoffin and Morgan, the syndics of the creditors, to show cause why the plantation and negroes should not be sold, and the proceeds applied to the payment of their claim. The rule was made absolute, by a judgment recognizing their right as mortgagees, and ordering a sale of the property.

At a subsequent meeting of the creditors, at which the Union Bank of Louisiana was again represented by its president, the creditors gave to the syndics a power to raise all mortgages recorded against the insolvent on any estate owned by him alone, or jointly with other persons, which had been surrendered to his creditors, with authority to make partition of the same with the co-proprietors, either amicably or judicially.

Upon the petition of the syndics to the Judge of the Parish Court of New Orleans, that act of the creditors was homologated, and the syndics were authorized by the court to do all which it empowered them to perform, by the votes of the creditors who appeared, or who were represented at the meeting.

In conformity with such powers, the syndics instituted a suit, alleging that Whitehall plantation and slaves had been purchased for the joint account of Barrett & Bell, and that an action of partition was necessary, to enable them to liquidate that special partnership. They also asked that the proceeds of the crop made on the plantation might be deposited in Bank, subject to the order of the court; that an inventory and appraisement of the property should be made and returned into court; and that such proceedings might be had as would lead to a prompt and final settlement of the partnership.

Bell united in this petition, and declared himself to be a creditor of the partnership; prayed for a settlement of its affairs, and for the allowance in his favor of a lien on the partnership property, for such sum as might be found due to him.

The heirs of Hampton intervened in this partition suit, stating their claims upon the property as mortgage creditors; and insisted that the property should be sold, subject to the assumptions, by whoever might become at the sale vendee, for the payment of their claim, principal and interest.

On the 6th of February, 1841, the court gave a judgment, sustaining the claims of Hampton's heirs, and directing the sale of the property, with the condition, "that the vendees should assume the payment to Mary Hampton, John S. Preston and wife, and John L. Manning and wife, of $100,000, payable on the 1st of January, 1856, with six per cent. interest from the 1st of January, 1841; and further, that it should be taken as a term and condition of the sale, that the purchaser should specially mortgage and keep mortgaged the plantation to the intervenors, and the eighty-one slaves described in the inventory, to them and their heirs and assigns."

The property was advertised and sold by the sheriff, pursuant to this judgment; was bought by the heirs of Hampton for $116,000; was paid for by surrendering to the sheriff the bond of Leroy Pope for $100,000, and by applying arrears of interest due on that bond to the payment of $16,000. An account was filed a few days afterwards, by the heirs of Hampton, of the whole amount due them, and after giving credit for the $116,000, and there was still remaining due $11,248.11½.

A rule was then taken on both the plaintiff and defendants, by the heirs of Hampton, for them to show cause why the account should not be approved, and their demand against the partnership of Barrett & Bell be liquidated, at the sum of $11,248.11½; and why the same should not be paid out of any money belonging to the partnership.

Upon the rule a judgment was rendered on the 23d April, 1844, according to its purport, declaring that, after having credited the account with $116,000, there was still due to the heirs of Hampton, by the partnership of Barrett & Bell, the sum of 11,248.11½, and a judgment was passed in their favor for that sum, against Mrs. Caroline Bell, the heir of Robert Bell and J. B. Hullen, who had been elected the syndic of the creditors in the place of Magoffin and Morgan. A representative of the Union Bank was present, and voting for Hullen.

A final judgment was afterwards rendered, settling all matters in dispute between the parties to the suit. The proceeds of the crop were appropriated to the payment of legal charges; and that being insufficient for that purpose, the heirs of Hampton were required to pay $2,020.51, in satisfaction of them—it being declared that the legal charges were higher in rank than their privilege upon the copartnership fund. The heirs paid the amount, and that was a final settlement of all the matters in controversy between plaintiff, defendants and intervenors.

Contemporary with the proceedings in the partition suit, the matters connected with Barrett's insolvency were concluded in the same court.

Among other acts done by the syndics, Magoffin and Morgan, was their petition to the Parish Court of New Orleans to be discharged from their office of syndics in the insolvency of Thomas Barrett and Thomas Barrett & Co. They annexed to their petition an account of the collections and disbursements which had been made by them since their last account had been filed. They showed that they were, as syndics, parties to a number of suits, which were still pending; refer particularly to the partition suit instituted by them, and still pending, against Robert Bell, as the partner of Barrett; pray that the creditors of the insolvent may be ordered to meet to elect other syndics, on account of their not being able to act longer in that capacity, as their private affairs compelled them to leave the State of Louisiana.

The court gave an order upon this petition, that the parties interested show cause, within ten days from the publication of the order, why the accounts of the syndics should not be homologated, why the funds stated by the syndics should not be distributed in accordance therewith, and why the syndics should not be discharged. And it further ordered, that a meeting of the creditors should be held on Wednesday, the 9th May, to elect another syndic in place of Magoffin and Morgan.

Such a meeting was held. James B. Hullen was elected by the creditors sole syndic, with all the powers which had been conferred by the creditors at former meetings upon Magoffin and Morgan. They were then discharged by the court from their functions as syndics, upon their paying the balances in their hands to the parties entitled thereto, reserving to themselves, however, whatever claim they might have on the sale of the Whitehall plantation; and James B. Hullen was confirmed as sole syndic of Barrett and Thomas Barrett & Co. This order was given by the court on the 20th May, 1842.

Seven days after the meeting of the creditors had been held, pursuant to the order of the court, Christopher Adams, Jr., President of the Union Bank, filed a paper in the court, acknowledging himself to be fully cognizant of all the proceedings of the meeting; that he was present at it; that the Bank was a creditor; that Hullen had been unanimously elected by the creditors sole syndic, in place of the former syndics, on the same terms and conditions that they had been, with the same powers which the creditors had conferred upon the former syndics; and further shows that at the meeting on the 9th May, 1842, he had voted for the dispensation of Hullen from giving the security required by law to be given by syndics.

This narrative discloses the connection of the Hamptons with the proceedings of the syndics, and in the partnership suit which they had brought against Bell to settle his claim as a partner in the purchase of the Whitehall plantation and slaves. Thus matters remained for nine years, no one supposing that there was any irregularity in the judicial proceedings under which the heirs of Hampton had bought the property, the Bank all the time acquiescing in the result. Indeed, nothing was done without the knowledge of the Bank; everything that was done was with its approbation. The record shows that every step taken by the syndics for the settlement of Barrett's insolvency was in conformity with the powers which the creditors had given to them. But nine years after the final and conclusive settlement of the whole matter in controversy, the president and directors of the Bank assigned to the plaintiff in this suit five judgments, which the Bank had obtained against Thomas Barrett in 1838 and 1839. Upon this assignment it is that the plaintiff now claims that these judgments were a mortgage upon the Whitehall plantation and slaves. He alleges that all the proceedings in the Parish Court of the Parish and City of New Orleans, in the matter of the insolvency, were irregular; that the disposition of property surrendered by Barrett for his creditors, and the creditors of Thomas Barrett & Co., "were irregular, insufficient, null and void, and had been procured by fraudulent combination between the heirs of Hampton with Bell, and with the syndics of the creditors, for the purpose of defrauding the Union Bank particularly. He also alleges that the Union Bank has not been a party to the suit of the syndics, and that neither the Bank nor himself are in any way bound by its proceedings. And the fraud with which he charges the defendants is, that they claimed as creditors of Barrett, under the mortgage which Leroy Pope had made for their ancestor, Hampton, when the plantation was bought from him, and which Barret assumed to pay when he purchased from Pope, well knowing at the time that the efficacy of the inscription of the mortgages upon both plantation and slaves had expired, according to law, without any renewal of the registry of them. The defendants deny, in their answer, the fraud charged, or fraud of any kind, in their intervention in the proceedings in insolvency. No attempt was made to prove it; consequently, the plaintiff's whole case depends upon his assertion that there are irregularities in the suit, and in the rendition of a judgment, and under which the heirs of Hampton purchased the property at sheriff's sale, which made that judgment a nullity. The plaintiff is the assignee of the Union Bank, and the argument in support of his claim as assignee is, that he is entitled to a judgment, subjecting the property to the payment of the judgments which the Bank had obtained against Barrett, unless the mortgages of the Bank were extinguished by the sale made by the sheriff to the heirs of Hampton, and unless the settlement between the syndics, Robert Bell, and the heirs of Hampton, upon the judgments rendered in the cases of the syndics and Bell, are res judicata.

These positions are, in themselves, an abandonment of the charge of fraud originally made, and for no other purpose than to give to the circuit court jurisdiction of the case against the defendants, and without which the court could not have taken jurisdiction. With what propriety, then, can this court now be called upon to review a judgment of the Parish

Court of New Orleans for any irregularity or illegality in the proceedings of that court, if either existed, when there could have been an appeal to the Supreme Court of Louisiana for its correction? This court has never done so in any case in which the subject-matter of a suit, being within the jurisdiction of a state court, upon the allegation that its judgment had been given contrary to the law of a state. See the cases of Fouvergne v. City of N. O., 18 How., 471; Gaines v. Chew, 2 How., 619, 644; and Tarver v. Tarver, 9 Pet., 174. The Parish Court of New Orleans had, by law, full power over all the property ceded by the insolvent, and over the claims of each of the creditors.

It exercised its jurisdiction, and the legality of its judgment cannot be questioned by this court. Besides, the courts of the United States have no jurisdiction over the settlement of insolvencies in the state courts. The parish court had not only jurisdiction, but exclusive jurisdiction, over the property surrendered, and the distribution of it among the creditors of the insolvent. By the laws of Louisiana, the property surrendered becomes vested in the creditors, represented by the syndics as their trustee. Schroeder v. Nicholson, 2 La., 354; Morgan v. Creditors, 7 La., 62; Dwight v. Simon, 4 La. Ann., 492. And the creditors of an insolvent who become parties to the insolvent proceedings are prohibited from seeking remedies in any other court of the State of Louisiana. Jacobs v. Bogart, 7 Rob. La., 162; Marsh v. Marsh, 9 Rob. La., 46; Tyler v. Creditors, 9 Rob. La., 372. It is also declared, in the Civil Code, art. 165, sec. 8, "that, in all matters relative to failures, all suits already commenced, or which may be subsequently instituted against the debtor, must be carried before the court in which the failure has been declared;" and "where a party claims from the syndics goods which had been surrendered by an insolvent, the suit may be brought before the court where the concurso is pending." 2 Rob. La., 348.

The want of jurisdiction, then, in the courts of the United States, to review the proceedings of the Parish Court of New Orleans, in a case of insolvency, is, of itself, sufficient to prevent the court from giving to the plaintiff a decree in this suit.

There are, however, other grounds sufficient, to be found in the record, from which we have concluded that the plaintiff has neither an equitable claim against the defendants in this proceeding, nor any right, under the law of Louisiana, to subject the property in controversy to the judgments of which he is the assignee. But we shall confine ourselves to the discussion of one of them.

The judgments of the Union Bank if they ever had, at any time, mortgage rights against the Whitehall plantation and the slaves upon it, better than the mortgages given by Leroy Pope at the time of his purchase, and which were assumed by Barrett when he bought the property, and which were equally obligatory upon Bell, when himself and Barrett formed their particular partnership in respect to that property, those judgments had been legally canceled before they were assigned to the plaintiff by the Bank. It will be found, at pages 20 and 21 of the record, that the assignor of the plaintiff united with the other creditors in giving to the syndics the power to raise all mortgages granted by or recorded by Thomas Barrett, or Thomas Barrett & Co., on any real estate owned by Barrett, jointly with other persons, and surrendered by him to his creditors, with power also to effect partitions of the said property with his co-proprietors, either amicably or judically, &c., &c.

The creditors, too, authorized the syndics, or either of them, to vote, deliberate, and give their opinion for them, at any subsequent meeting of the creditors of Barrett, or Thomas Barrett & Co. And the powers so given to the syndics were homologated by the Judge of the Parish Court of New Orleans. Under such a power, the syndics might have erased the judicial mortgages of the bank in the fair and bona fide discharge of their relation to the creditors as their trustees, and the Bank would have been bound by their action. But they proceeded, according to law, to have the judicial mortgages of the Bank canceled; and they were canceled on the 1st of February, 1841. This cancellation was made by the syndics, in conformity with the 32d section of the Act of February, 1817, entitled, "An Act relative to the voluntary surrender of property, and to the mode of proceeding, as well for the direction as for the desposal of debtors' estates," &c., &c. The erasure and cancellation of mortgages may be made in Louisiana, by consent or by order of the court. Articles 3335, 3336. In this instance, the erasure was made by the judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction; when, by the latter, it has the effect of a res judicata. 7 Rob. La., 382, 518; 11 Rob. La., 171. After the erasure so made, there can be no subsequent reinscription of a mortgage. That which was made in 1848 revived no lien upon the property which the Bank's mortgages may have had before they were erased. But there was another erasure of the Bank's judicial mortgages in a suit brought by Barrett against it, before its assignment was made of its judgments against Barrett to Hagan, the plaintiff. Rec., 83, 88, 94, 99, 103. It was done by a court having competent jurisdiction, and it concluded the right of the Bank to convey its judgments to the plaintiff as judicial mortgages, though they might be transferred as judgments to entitle the assignee to a participation in any unadministered proceeds made from the sale of the property surrendered by the insolvent for his creditors. But neither the reinscription of 1848, nor the assignment to the plaintiff, could have the effect to give to the plaintiff any claim upon property of the insolvent which had been sold under the judgment of a court having jurisdiction in insolvency. The property now claimed by the plaintiff, as subject to his assignment, had been recognized by the judgment of the parish court to be subject to the claims of the heirs of Hampton; had been ordered by the court to be sold by the sheriff; had been sold by him, and adjudicated to the purchasers; and the consideration money of the purchase had been accounted for by the sheriff to the syndics of the insolvent, and by them accounted for to the court, in strict accordance with its order, nine years before the Bank made an assignment to Hagan. The sale could not have been in any way subject to the judicial mortgages of the Bank, nor could it in any way effect the property purchased by the defendants. Indeed, there can be no doubt that, after the appearance of the Bank in the concurso of the creditors, and its acquiescence with them in fixing the terms for the sale of the property of the insolvent, it must be taken as a waiver by the Bank of all its rights to pursue it for the payment of its judgments against Barrett, the insolvent, and that it would look to the proceeds of its sale, as the creditors did, for the satisfaction of their respective claims. Egerton v. Creditors, 2 Rob. La., 201; Saul v. Creditors, 7 Mart. N. S., 446, 467. Without pursuing the discussion further, we have concluded that the Bank, when it assigned its judgments to the plaintiff, had no mortgage lien on the Whitehall plantation and slaves to transfer; that the language of the assignment, interpreted by the acknowledged acts of the Bank in the insolvency, cannot mean any such transfer, and that the judgment and sale under the partition suit barred the Bank from making such an assignment, and the plaintiff from any such claim as he has made in his bill.

We direct the affirmance of the decree of the circuit court.

Decision of State Court, when reviewable.

This court has no jurisdiction to revise the decision of a State Court where there is no complaint that the obligation of a contract has been impaired, nor that any right has been claimed and refused under any treaty or Act of Congress.

Argued Jan. 20, 1860. Decided Jan. 23, 1860.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Louisiana for the Eastern District.

This action was commenced by petition in the Fourth District Court of New Orleans, by Wright, Williams & Co., in liquidation, against J. J. B. White. Oakey, Hawkins & Co. intervened under the practice in Louisiana. Subsequently Mrs. R. J. White and Mrs. W. C. W. Faust also intervened. After various proceedings, the above court dismissed the petition.

The plaintiffs appealed to the Supreme Court of the State. The following is the opinion of the Supreme Court:

This is an attachment suit for the recovery of $9,509.32, with eight per cent. per annum interest, from the 9th day of June, 1855, for money advanced in payment of defendant's draft given on a final settlement of his account with Hill, McLean & Co., his former factors. One hundred and fifty-four bales of cotton were attached as the property of the defendants, on board the steamboat Sally Robinson, at the port of New Orleans, consigned in the name of P. O'Donnel to Oakey, Hawkins & Co. The consignees, Oakey, Hawkins & Co., intervened in the suit, and claimed the cotton as the property of O'Donnel. On Nov. 25, 1856, Oakey, Hawkins & Co. obtained an order of court permitting them to bond the cotton, and accordingly, on 27th day of same month, gave bond and security as required by order of court. On the same day, to wit: Nov. 27, 1856, Rebecca J. White, the wife of the defendant, and Mrs. W. C. W. Faust filed their petition of intervention in this suit, and claimed the cotton attached as their joint, undivided, separate property. To this petition of intervention the plaintiff pleaded, in his answer thereto, the following peremptory exception: "That the cotton claimed had been delivered on bond anterior to the filing of the intervention to Oakey, Hawkins & Co., and is not now in court," and prayed that the intervention be dismissed.

On May 29, 1857, the plaintiff filed a supplementary petition, in which he alleged that since the institution of this suit he had obtained a judgment in the Circuit Court of Yazoo County, in the State of Mississippi, against the defendant, for the same subject-matters stated in the original petition filed in this cause, and prayed for judgment as in said original petition, and that defendant decided to answer thereto. After the filing of the supplemental petition the attorney appointed to represent the defendant filed the following exception: "That the original cause of action, if any existed, has been merged in the judgment rendered in the State of Mississippi and the proceedings therein had, as shown by the supplemental petition and documents annexed; that this court, by the said proceedings of plaintiffs, has been devested of jurisdiction in the matters in controversy, and this suit should be dismissed at plaintiff's cost. Defendant further pleads res judicata."

The intervenors also filed an exception to the supplemental petition as follows: "That the same is a change of the original cause of action and is contrary to law; and further pleaded the exception of res judicata."

1. The intervention of Oakey, Hawkins & Co. is unsustained by the evidence. It does not appear that O'Donnel was the owner of the cotton attached, or that it was even shipped with his knowledge or consent, nor does it appear that he or the consignees were in possession of the bill of lading prior to the attachment of the cotton by the plaintiff. This intervention, therefore, must be dismissed.

2. The peremptory exception filed by the plaintiff should have been sustained. The bond given by Oakey, Hawkins & Co. was only a substitute for the property attached with regard to the plaintiff, and not as to the intervenors or third parties, claiming title thereto. The intervenors cannot avail themselves of the bond, and their remedy was against the property itself, in the hands of the party having possession of it. Dorr v. Kershaw, 18 La., 57; Beal v. Alexander, 1 Rob. La., 277; 7 Rob., 349.

3. The exception filed by the attorney appointed to represent the defendant, should have been overruled. The plaintiff had the right under the law of Louisiana, to sue the defendant in the courts of this State, and also in the courts of Mississippi at the same time, and for the same cause of action. This right necessarily carries with it the accessory right to prosecute the suit in the courts of the two different States, to final judgments on the merits. This right is remedial, and is intended to secure to the creditor all possible means for the collection of his debt in different jurisdictions. If the exception filed on behalf of defendant were sufficient in law to dismiss the plaintiff's action, the right to institute separate actions in different States for the same debt, would be nugatory; for so soon as a judgment should be obtained in one State, it could be made the means of dismissing the suit in the other, and thereby deprive the creditor of the fruits of his diligence in the undecided suit.

Conceding that the account sued on was merged in the Mississippi judgment, the debt was not thereby extinguished, but established to be due and owing from the defendant to the plaintiff. This judgment in Louisiana is only evidence of the existence of the debt for the recovery of which this suit was instituted, the affidavit was made, the attachment bond was given and the writ of attachment issued, and there is no legal reason why this judgment should not be substituted, by way of amendment, as the cause of action in place of the account, for the purpose of maintaining the attachment.

The fact that the judgment is for a greater amount than claimed and sworn to by the plaintiff is immaterial, for the reason that the attachment is only valid as against the property for the amount sworn to, whatever may be the amount claimed in the petition.

The supplemental petition did not change the substance of the demand. The prayer of the original petition is, that the attachment be maintained and that the defendant be condemned to pay the sum of $9,509.32 and interest, with privilege upon the property attached, and the prayer of the supplemental petition is the same.

It is therefore ordered, adjudged and decreed, that the interventions of Oakey, Hawkins & Co., and of Mrs. White and Mrs. Faust, be dismissed at their cost; and it is further ordered, adjudged and decreed that the judgment be avoided and reversed; and proceeding to render such judgment as should have been rendered by the lower court, it is ordered, adjudged and decreed, that the plaintiff do have and recover of the defendant the sum of $9,509.32, with five per cent per annum, interest thereon, from the 9th day of June, 1855, and costs of the lower court; and that plaintiffs' privilege upon the property attached be recognized and enforced. It is further ordered and decreed, that the defendants pay one third of the costs of this appeal; that Oakey, Hawkins & Co. pay one third, and Mrs. White and Mrs. Faust the remaining third.

A petition for a rehearing by the defendant and intervenors having been refused, they sued out writs of error to this court.

On motion by defendant in error to dismiss for want of jurisdiction.

No counsel appeared for the plaintiffs in error.

Mr. J. P. Benjamin for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice McLean delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a writ of error to the Supreme Court of the State of Louisiana.

The defendant in error, by his counsel, J. P. Benjamin, Esq., moves the court that the writ of error issued in this cause be dismissed, for the reason that this case is not one in which the court has jurisdiction to revise the decision of the Supreme Court of Louisiana.

On looking into the record, there appears to be no ground on which this writ of error can be maintained. There is no complaint that the obligation of a contract has been impaired, nor that any right has been claimed and refused under any treaty or Act of Congress.

The cause must, therefore, be dismissed for want of jurisdiction.

v.

DRURY THOMPSON, WILLIAM F. CLEVELAND, AND JAMES CAMPBELL'S WIDOW, Heirs and Devisees.

(See S. C., 22 How., 246-256.)

Where fraudulent arrangement has been given up, and a fair one substituted, fraud is cured.

The arrangement between the parties in respect to the property, entered into with a view to the institution of the suit, which is complained of as fraudulent, having been given up, and a new one substituted, which was not only unexceptionable, but highly equitable and just as concerned the complainant, the charge of fraud and imposition depending upon it, even if it originally had any foundation, falls with it.

The facts of the case were examined; and the court held that there is no foundation whatever, not even colorable, for the charge of fraud set forth in the bill.

Argued Dec. 29, 1859. Decided Jan. 23, 1860.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Alabama.

The history of the case, and a statement of the facts, appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. W. H. Seward and K. B. Sewall, for appellant:

The appellant claims to have the deeds of 1844, 1849 and 1851 set aside, on the following grounds:

I. Illegality.

The transaction in Texas of 1844 was either the sale of a pretended title, the land being held adversely to both parties; or,

It was champertous or "savored of champerty," against which equity will relieve.

Wood v. Downes, 18 Ves., 120; Reynell v. Sprye, 8 Hare, 222, 272; S. C., Affirmed on Appeal, 18 Eng. L. & Eq., 74; Stevens v. Bagwell, 15 Ves., 139; Arden v. Patterson, 5 John. Ch., 44, 51; Berrien v. McLane, 1 Hoffm. Ch., 421, 424.

The maxim in pari delicto is no objection to relief, for it does not apply. The parties here are not equally guilty, and equity will relieve "the more excusable of the two."

NOTE.—Deeds, when void for fraud, insanity, drunkenness, &c. See note to Harding v. Handy, 52 U. S. (11 How.), 103.

Reynell v. Sprye, 13 Eng. L. & Eq., 95; Osborne v. Williams, 18 Ves., 379; Hatch v. Hatch, 9 Ves., 292; Cook v. Colyer, 2 B. Mon., 71; Williams v. Carter, 3 Dana, 198, 201.

II. Mistake—Ignorance.

Appellant was induced to act in ignorance of his rights—their value—the costs of enforcing them, and of the fraudulent combination which had been formed, and was all the time operating to obtain, control and appropriate them.

Evans v. Llewllyn, 2 Bro. C. C., 150; Sturge v. Sturge, 12 Beav., 229; Hitchcock v. Giddings, 4 Price, 135.

III. Fraud.

The deed of 1844 was without consideration, and therefore, considered as a sale, was void (sine pretio nulla venditio est, D, 18, 1, 2), and cannot afterwards be set up as a gift.

Bridgman v. Green, 2 Ves., 628.

Besides, it states on its face a pecuniary consideration contrary to the truth, which of itself affords a presumption of fraud.

Hawes v. Wyatt, 3 Bro. C. C., 156; Bridgman v. Green, 2 Ves., 627.

This accords with the civil law which says: "Where an engagement has no consideration, or, which is the same thing, where the consideration for which it is contracted is false, the engagement is null, and so is the contract which includes it" (Poth. Obl., 42), and for which there was condictio, or a specific mode of redress at law. D, 12, 7.

There was fraudulent concealment—suppressio veri—on the part of Thompson and others.

Bowman v. Bates, 2 Bibb., 52; Torry v. Buck, 1 Green Ch., 366.

Imperfect information is equivalent to concealment.

Walker v. Symonds, 3 Swanst., 73; Fallendi causa obscure loquitur, D. 18, 1, 43, 8, 2.

There was misrepresentation—suggestio falsi—by Thompson and others.

Broderick v. Broderick, 1 P. Wms., 240; Reynell v. Sprye, 8 Hare 222; S. C. affirmed, 18 L. & Eq., 74; Smith v. Richards, 13 Pet., 26; Tyler v. Black, 13 How., 231; Boyce v. Grundy, 3 Pet., 210.

A concurrence of all these circumstances of illegality and fraud—juncta juvant.

The above considerations apply with equal force to the deeds of 1849 and 1851, for these were based on and grew out of the same original transaction of 1844, and are infected with all its vices.

Wood v. Downes, 18 Ves., 122, 123; Reynell v. Sprye, 8 Hare, 269, 270; S. C., 13 Eng. L. & Eq., 100, 101.

The deeds of 1849 and 1851 were also void, on the ground that they were obtained by persons standing in confidential relations to Collins, and by undue influence and abuse of confidence.

Cooke v. Lamotte, 11 L. & Eq., 33, 34; Osmand v. Fitzroy, 3 P. Wms., 129; Whelan v. Whelan, 3 Cow., 537; Purcell v. Macnamara, 14 Ves., 91, 107.

Of surprise and circumvention under a pressure of circumstances, which deprived appellant of that free agency and self protecting ability essential to fair dealing.

Pickett v. Loggon, 14 Ves., 215; 1 Story Eq., secs. 239, 251.

Gross inadequacy of consideration, accompanied by the circumstances of fraud and imposition above referred to.

Wood v. Abrey, 3 Madd., 417; Byers v. Surget, 19 How., 311; Huguenin v. Baseley, 14 Ves., 273; Harding v. Handy, 11 Wheat., 124; 1 Story Eq., sec. 246.

IV. There has been no confirmation.

Savery v. King, 35 Eng. L. & Eq., 100, 110; Butler v. Haskell, 4 Desaus., 651, 712, 714; McCants v. Bee, 1 McCord, Ch., 383, 391; Broddus v. McCall, 3 Call, 546; Cherry v. Newsom, 3 Yer., 369.

V. There is no bar to relief from lapse of time. Appellant was not fully informed of the circumstances of the fraud till about January, 1855.

Veazie v. Williams, 8 How., 134, 158.

Messrs. R. H. Smith and J. P. Benjamin, for appellees:

The charge is not only one of actual fraud stated with care and deliberation, but it is a case of submission and award, and an execution of that award by complainant, and of long acquiescence in it. The bill assumes the position of assailing a binding decision; of claiming a second adjudication, because the first was made in fraud, executed and acquiesced in under ignorance of, and delusion by reason of, this fraud, of which, in all its eelements and proportions, complainant asserts he was informed when he filed his bill, and the features of which he pretends to exhibit to the court, and which exhibition, in its detail and whole, is false.

The following extract from the opinion of the court in Eyre v. Potter, 15 How., 56, furnishes the rule applicable to this cause:

The case made by the bill "is one of actual, positive fraud charged, and to be judged of according to its features and character as delineated by complainant and according to the proofs adduced to establish that character. Although cases of constructive fraud are equally cognizable by a court of equity with cases of direct or positive fraud, yet the two classes of cases would be met by a defendant in a very different manner. It seems to be an established doctrine of a court of equity, that when the bill sets up a case of actual fraud, and makes that the ground of the prayer for relief, the plaintiff will not be entitled to a decree by establishing some of the facts quite independent of fraud, but which might of themselves create a case under a totally distinct head of equity from that which would be applicable to the case of fraud originally stated."

See, also, Price v. Berrington, 7 Eng. L. & Eq., 254, 259, 260; Curson v. Belworthy, 22 Eng. L. & Eq., 1, 5, 11.

The plaintiff shows that there was a matter between the parties to be determined; that a reference of it was made—an award given; that plaintiff performed it and has acquiesced in it.

He stands in his pleadings in the position of a party seeking to assail a judgment for actual fraud, and must come under the rule applicable to such a case.

Price v. Williams, 1 Ves., Jr., 365, and cases referred to in the notes; Knox v. Symonds, 1 Ves., Jr., 369, and cases in note; Herrick v. Blair, 1 Johns. Ch., 101; Brown v. Green, 7 Conn., 542; Bumpass v. Webb, 4 Port. (Ala.), 70; 2 Hen. & Munf., 408; Head v. Muir, 3 Rand., 131; Dougherty v. Mc Whorter, 7 Yerg., 258.

The following cases are instances of ratifications, or of acquiescence in awards.

Johnson's Exrs. v. Ketchum, 3 Green's Ch. (N. J.), 369; McRae v. Bucks, 2 Stew. & P., 158; McDaniel v. Bell, 3 Hayw. (Tenn.), 264.

The bill is of the character of a bill for a new trial, and the rule in reference to such bills is strict. There must be fraud or accident unmixed with neglect. See the foregoing authorities.

Mr. Justice Nelson delivered the opinion of the court.

This is an appeal from a decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Alabama.

The bill was filed by Collins, to set aside certain conveyances of a tract of land situate in the City of Mobile, and particularly a deed from him to the defendants, bearing date the 15th February, 1851, on the ground of fraud and imposition in the procurement of said conveyances.

The pleadings and proofs are very voluminous the pleadings alone covering nearly one hundred, and including the proofs, exceeding five hundred, closely printed octavo pages. The bill is very inartificially drawn, being stuffed with minute and tedious detail of what might have been proper evidence of facts constituting the ground of the complaint, instead of a concise and orderly statement of the facts themselves. This has led to an equally minute and extended statement of the grounds of the defense in the several answers of the defendants.

In looking closely, however, into the case, and into the nature and grounds of the relief sought, and principles upon which it must be sustained, if at all, it will be found that the questions really involved, as well as the material facts upon which their determination depend, are few and simple, and call for no very extended discussion.

The father of Collins, the complainant, died in 1811, seised of an interest in the tract of land in dispute. He left three sons, the complainant being then some two years old. The tract subsequently passed into the possession of one Joshua Kennedy, by collusion between Inerarity, the administrator of Collins the elder, and Kennedy, the latter also afterwards obtaining a deed of the land from the heirs at law by fraudulent representations.

In 1844, Thompson, one of the defendants in the present suit, residing in the City of Mobile, and having some knowledge of the original title of Collins to the land, and of the means by which the heirs had been deprived of it, visited the complainant, then residing in Texas, and being the only surviving heir, with a view to purchase his title, or to obtain an arrangement with him in respect to it, so that a suit might be instituted for the recovery of the estate. An arrangement was agreed to accordingly, and a conveyance of the land executed by the complainant and his wife to Thompson; also a power of attorney, authorizing him to institute suits for the recovery of the land—Thompson, at the same time, executing a bond of indemnity to the complainant against all costs and responsibilities, in consequence of the suit. The complainant was to receive $10,000 in the event of a recovery. A suit was subsequently instituted in the name of the complainant against the heirs of Kennedy, in April, 1844, in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Alabama; was heard upon the pleadings and proofs at the April Term of the court, in 1847, and a decree rendered in his favor; which, on an appeal to this court, was affirmed at the December Term, 1850. The case, as reported in this court, will be found in 10 How., 174.

The litigation extended over a period of some seven years; and, in the progress of it, besides Thompson who had made the original arrangement with the complainant, three other persons had become interested, and had contributed their services and money in bringing it to a successful termination.

After the affirmance of the decree in this court, and confirmation of the title in complainant, all the parties concerned met in the City of Mobile, at the office of the solicitors, for the adjustment of their respective claims to the property recovered. Its value had increased, during the progress of the suit, from about $100,000, according to the estimate, to some two or three times that amount. The complainant had originally stipulated for the sum of $10,000. In this adjustment, one third of the whole estate was set apart to him, and one sixth to each of the other four persons. Conveyances according to this division were executed on the 15th February, 1851. The complainant, therefore, according to the general estimate, received $100,000, and the other four associates $50,000 each.

Now, the fraud alleged in the bill, and which is mainly relied on for setting aside this adjustment and division of the estate between the parties, is placed on two grounds: 1. In obtaining the deed of the land, powers of attorney and other stipulations relating to the title, dated the 13th January, 1844, preparatory to the institution of the suit in which the property was recovered; and 2. In the adjustment and division of the property among the several parties above mentioned, after the recovery had taken place, and which was consummated by the deed of 15th February, 1851.

1. It is insisted, on behalf of the complainant, that, at the time he executed the deed, powers of attorney, and the other writings, in 1844, he was unacquainted with the value of the property or the condition of the title; that Thompson, who procured these instruments, and the authority to commence the suit, was well acquainted with both; that he fraudulently depreciated the value of the property, and exaggerated the difficulties and expense attending the litigation, and thereby deceived the complainant. This is the substance of the charge.

There is, however, a very brief but most conclusive answer to it, upon the pleadings and proofs in the case. It is, that Mr. Justice Campbell, whose firm had been subsequently employed by Thompson to bring the suit against the heirs of Kennedy, declined the retainer, and refused to have anything to do with it, unless the complainant should not only be made sole plaintiff in the suit, but should have a substantial interest in the estate sought to be recovered; should attend as the party in interest in conducting the proceedings, and take part in the preparation for trial; and insisted that the preliminary arrangement made by Thompson, including the deed of the property and agreement for the payment of the $10,000, should be abrogated and given up. All of which was agreed to by Thompson and the other parties concerned; and the suit was commenced and carried on to a final determination under this new arrangement. The complainant attended and participated in the preparation of the case, assisted in procuring and in the examination of the witnesses, and admits, in his bill, that he attended every term of the court at Mobile, while the cause was pending, and until the decree in his favor.

The whole arrangement, therefore, between the parties, in respect to the property, entered into with a view to the institution of the suit, which is complained of, having been given up, and a new one substituted, which was not only unexceptionable, but highly equitable and just as concerned the complainant, the charge of fraud and imposition depending upon it, even if originally it had any foundation, falls with it. We shall not stop to inquire into the merits or justice of that arrangement, for, having been given up, they are wholly immaterial in any view of the case, as presented upon the evidence before us.

2. The remaining ground of fraud relied on in the bill, is that on the day of the arrival of the complainant at the City of Mobile, from his residence in Texas, and which was his first visit to the city after the judgment in his favor in this court, he was requested to attend at the office of the solicitors, in the evening, and attended accordingly, where he met the defendants, and was then, for the first time, informed that they had been interested in the prosecution of the suit, and had expended much time and money in the litigation, and were, therefore, expected to participate in the division of the property recovered. That complainant was taken by surprise when the suggestion was made at the meeting, by the solicitor, that, in the division, one sixth part of the estate should be given to each of the defendants, and including Primrose, and only one third to himself. That he was unprepared to act with judgment in the matter, having been wholly unadvised of the object of the meeting, or of the persons who were to be present; that no time was given him for reflection or counsel; that he was ignorant of the value of the property, and incapable of acting understandingly upon the subject, and had no information as to the amount he was thus suddenly called on to give away. That a deed was immediately prepared by the solicitor, to carry into effect the division as suggested, and was executed; and that this meeting was arranged by preconcert, and after consultation between the defendants and others, for the purpose of entrapping and deceiving the complainant.

The deed referred to is that of 15th February, 1851, which is sought to be set aside. This is the second ground of fraud substantially as charged in the bill; and it will be necessary to look into the answers and proofs in the case, with a view to see if it is sustained.

The answer of Thompson, which is responsive to this particular charge, is a denial of every material fact and circumstance upon which the allegation of fraud rests. It states, that one or two days after the arrival of the complainant at Mobile, he requested him (the respondent) to go with him to the office of the solicitor that evening; that he had made an appointment with the solicitor to meet the respondent, and other persons interested in the suit, there, in order to come to an understanding and adjustment of their respective interests. The matters of the adjustment formed the subject of their conversation during the afternoon, and down to the time of the meeting. That the respondent explained to him the understanding he had with his associates, the other defendants, the services they had rendered in the suit, and the advances of money made therein; that, after all the parties had assembled at the office, the subject was again talked over at length, and, in the course of the conversation, the solicitor was referred to, and desired to suggest what, in his judgment, would be a reasonable adjustment and division of the property. Whereupon, he suggested a division into six parts—two parts to the complainant, and one to Thompson and each of his three associates; that this appeared to be generally acquiesced in, and it was proposed by some one that the papers should be drawn and executed. But the solicitor objected, and advised them to postpone the execution, and reflect upon the matter, and when they had come to a determination among themselves, it would be time enough to make out the papers; that the complainant expressed great pleasure and satisfaction at the division; other of the parties were not satisfied. But, in a few days, all met at the office of Primrose, one of the parties in interest, when the deed of the 15th of February, 1851, was voluntarily executed, carrying into effect the division.

The answer of Cleveland, another of the defendants, is equally explicit. He states that the subject of the division was talked over at the office of the solicitor; that all expressed satisfaction at the division suggested, except Primrose, who objected to the allowance of two shares to the complainant, he insisting that the time and labor of others had chiefly contributed to the success of the suit; and that complainant had originally expressed a willingness to be content with a small sum; that the solicitor repelled the idea, and said, that although others had been chiefly instrumental in carrying the case through, the title was in the complainant, and he ought to have the largest share; that the solicitor advised the parties to consider the matter, and if he could aid them to call on him; that the deed carrying into effect the division was not executed till several days, and respondent thinks a week, after this, at the office of Primrose.

James Campbell, another of the defendants, states that, after the meeting at the office, the subject of the interests of the parties was talked over; that upon the division suggested by the solicitor all concurred, except Primrose, who represented his claims higher than those of complainant; that he had rendered greater services, and was entitled to a greater share. He depreciated complainant's title to the estate, insisting that he alone could have made nothing out of it, and had always said he would be satisfied with some negroes and cattle; that the solicitor replied to him, that without complainant's title there could have been no recovery; and that, whatever others had done, still the title was in the complainant, and that he, the solicitor, had undertaken the suit with the distinct understanding and agreement that complainant was to have a substantial interest in the recovery. The respondent denies that the deed was drawn or executed the evening of the meeting, nor until several days afterwards.

These several answers are directly responsive to the charges in the bill, and are to be taken as true, unless overcome by the proofs. Instead of impeaching, the proofs are all in support of them.

Primrose, a witness on the part of the complainant, and who was one of the parties in interest, and present at this meeting, confirms the facts as above stated. In his answer to 43d interrogatory, he says, in substance, that, after conversation at the meeting relating to the subject before them, all seemed willing to leave the division to the solicitor, who thereupon suggested one third to the complainant, and one sixth to each of the others; that he (the witness) objected, as giving too great a share to the complainant, and that he made some remarks about the condition of the title, when he and the others undertook the suit; that complainant at that time had said he would be satisfied with a comparatively small sum, and that the solicitor replied to him, that the title to the property was in the complainant, besides making other observations which he (the witness) did not recollect.

This witness further says, in answer to the 43d cross interrogatory, speaking of the division, "All but myself did acquiesce. So far as I could judge the complainant was satisfied, and I was disappointed." "Judge Campbell maintained Collins' right to two shares against me. The parties talked some of the matters over freely and considerably. It consumed a winter's evening, or greater part of it." "I do know Collins was pleased, and considered the settlement fair, just, and liberal towards him."

Judge Campbell, the solicitor, has also been a witness in the case. He states, that after some reference to the subject at the meeting, and interchange of views, one of the parties stated that he was willing to abide by his opinion as to the share he should be entitled to, and others indicated a wish that he would make some suggestions as to the proper adjustment. In answer to which, he suggested a division of the property into six parts, and that two should be assigned to the complainant; that Primrose expressed dissatisfaction, insisting the part to be assigned the complainant was too large; that his title was good for nothing, and that the success in the suit was owing to the ability with which it was prosecuted; that complainant did not expect so large a share; that he had said all he wanted was a few negroes and some cattle.

The witness further states that he took pains to answer these objections; and after some further conversation, the parties left his office; that he told them when they left to take into consideration what had been said, and that if he could be of any service to them, to call at his office again; that no agreement was arrived at that evening, and no papers drawn up of any agreement between the parties; that the deed of February, 1851, was not prepared by him till several days after this, and that he had not learned of its execution till the week after its preparation.

It is useless to pursue the inquiry further, as the proofs in the case are all one way, and show that there is no foundation whatever, not even colorable, for the charge of fraud set forth in the bill.

Besides the entire want of proof to sustain it, the evidence shows that possession of the property was taken by the parties jointly, after the settlement, in the summer of 1851. Extensive and valuable improvements were made in the course of the years 1852-'53, under the direction of the complainant and others. The sales in 1853 had amounted to $92,000, as stated in the bill.

The property continued under the joint management of the parties for the period of some three years, without complaint or dissatisfaction on the part of Collins, when suddenly, without any apparent reason or changed condition of affairs between him and his associates, he seems to have taken up the delusion that he had been circumvented and deceived into an inequitable settlement of the estate among the parties, in February, 1851, and for the first time set up a claim to the whole of it.

It is suggested in the bill, that the large sales made of the property in 1852-'53 afforded the complainant the first evidence of the great value of the estate; and it appears, from other portions of the case, that the increased and increasing value of the property had the effect to unsettle the views and opinions upon which he had acted in the settlement with his associates in February, 1851, and led to a strong desire to recall and review them.

But this suggested ignorance of the great value of the property at the time of the settlement is against all the proof in the case. His bill, filed against the heirs of Kennedy in April, 1844, for the recovery of this property, contains the following allegation: "Your orator charges that the said property was worth $20,000 and upwards in 1820, $75,000 in 1830, and is probably worth $200,000 at this time."

The great value of the property, compared with the consideration paid by Kennedy, was a very material fact in the case. Besides, the complainant had spent much of the time pending that litigation in the City of Mobile, in which the property was situate, and must have been familiar with its value, present and prospective. He was then in the prime of life, and possessed of more than ordinary intelligence in business matters, as is apparent from his correspondence, to be found in the record.

Having succeeded in the recovery, and obtained possession of the estate, he seems to have forgotten the obligations he was under to his associates. Their exertions and means had been mainly instrumental in raising him from poverty to affluence. They had advised him of his claim or title to the property, collected the necessary evidence to establish it, employed the counsel, and even furnished him (Collins) with the means of support, to enable him to coöperate in the prosecution of the suit ng the litigation. The suit was severely ted, and was of some seven years' dura-stronger evidence that, after his success, ready to forget his obligations to those contributing to it, is the fact that his r has not even escaped his insinuations faith in his connection with the suit, gh it was disclaimed on the argument by his counsel; thus contradicting all his opinions and feelings, strongly and repeatedly expressed pending the suit, and long after its termination and the settlement between the parties. The solicitor had no interest in the property or its distribution. His fee was not dependent upon it. He was, therefore, wholly disinterested in the matter, and well situated to act as the friend of all parties in the settlement.

As we have already stated, before the commencement of the suit, he refused to be connected with it, unless the complainant should be permitted to have a substantial interest in the estate, and repudiated the arrangement by which he was to receive only $10,000. After the recovery, and in the settlement among the parties, he stood firmly by this original understanding, and insisted that he should have a double share. So far as appears from the evidence, it is entirely owing to the sense of justice and firmness of Judge Campbell (the solicitor) that the complainant is now in the possession and enjoyment of some $100,000 of his patrimonial inheritance, instead of the $10,000 for which he himself had stipulated.

The decree of the court below is affirmed.

JOHN OVERTON, ROBERT C. BRINKLEY, ROBERTSON TOPP AND JAMES JENKINS,

v.

ELIJAH CHEEK & GEORGE U. CHEEK.

(See S. C., 22 How., 46–48.)

Writ of error without seal, is void—omission of writ, effect of.

When no writ of error has been certified with the transcript, and the paper purporting to be a writ of error, being without seal, was void, and two terms of this court have intervened, not including the present term, since the transcript was certified without a writ of error, the cause must be dismissed.

Argued Jan. 23, 1860. Decided Jan. 24, 1860.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of West Tennessee.

This action was brought in the court below by the defendants on a bond, in the penal sum of $10,000

The trial in the court below resulted in a verdict and judgment in behalf of the plaintiffs for $4,750; whereupon defendants sued out this writ of error. The facts upon which the judgment of this court depend, appear in the opinion of the court.

On motion to dismiss.

Mr. R. H. Gillet, for plaintiffs in error.

Messrs. Davidge and Ingle, for defendants in error:

It is submitted—

1. That in order to give jurisdiction to this court, the writ of error must be under the seal of the circuit court, whose clerk is authorized to issue it.

Act of Congress of May 8th, 1792, sec. 9; 1 Stat. at L., 278.

2. That the writ of error must be returned at the ensuing term. If a term intervene, the objection is fatal.

Hamilton v. Moore, 3 Dall., 371; The Virginia v. West, 19 How., 182; Villalobos v. United States, 6 How., 18; U. S. v. Curry, 6 How., 106.

3. That there must be annexed to and returned with the writ, an authenticated transcript of the record. Without the writ, the transcript is filed without authority of law; and a writ of error without the record of the court to be reviewed, or reasons for not returning it, is not returned. Here the writ of errror comes back as it went out. There is no return, and hence no jurisdiction.

4. The writ does not appear to have been filed in the circuit court.

Brooks v. Norris, 11 How., 204.

5. There was no citation and no legal evidence of the waiver of the citation. The transcript filed does show that the citation was waived; but that transcript is not legally before this court, not having been returned in obedience to process.

6. That the transcript was not returned in conformity with law and the rules of this court.

For the above reasons a motion is made that this cause be dismissed.

Mr. Justice McLean delivered the opinion of the court:

This purports to be a writ of error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of West Tennessee.

By reference to the transcript, it appears that the judgment of the circuit court was rendered the 16th of April, 1857. At the ensuing term of the Supreme Court, the transcript was filed.

It appears that a writ of error in the circuit court was allowed, in open court, and signed by the clerk the 17th day of April, 1857, which was returnable to the Supreme Court on the first Monday of December, 1857. But this writ had no seal, nor was it returned with the transcript to the Supreme Court. But on the 27th of December, 1859, a paper was filed in the clerk's office, in form of a writ of error, but without a seal, and having no authenticated transcript annexed.

From this it appears that no writ of error has been certified with the transcript, and that the paper purporting to be a writ of error, which was filed in December last, being without seal, was void. Two terms of this court have intervened, not including the present term, since the transcript was certified, without a writ of error.

The cause must, therefore, be dismissed for these irregularities, without noticing others apparent on the record.

JOEL PARKER, Plff. in Er.,
v.
ALONZO L. KANE.

(See S. C., 22 How., 1-19.)

State decision in partition action, not inquirable into in collateral action—jurisdiction of Wisconsin court—state decree in former chancery suit, for same cause of action, conclusive—unrecorded deed is inoperative as to bona fide purchasers in Wisconsin—complete description in deed, not controlled by more general one, nor by declarations or prior negotiations of parties.

In ejectment to recover land in Milwaukee, this court, conformably to their established doctrine, recognize the validity and binding operation of the orders and decrees of a Wisconsin court in a partition action, and determine that this court cannot inquire whether errors or irregularities exist in them in this collateral action.

The jurisdiction of the Circuit Court of Milwaukee, under the Statute of Wisconsin, extends to the ascertainment and determination of the rights of the parties in matters of partition, and its decree is final and effectual for their adjustment. That court also has power to quiet a disputed title.

The reversal of the decree of the Circuit Court by the Supreme Court in a chancery suit to quiet the title, and its decision that the guardian should account for the proceeds of the sale in his hands, implies that the recorded deed did not convey a legal title.

Whether the voluntary dismissal of the bill, as to the guardian, subsequently to its return in the circuit court, will qualify this decree, or limit its effect as res judicata of the legal right, quære.

Where a bill in chancery cause was for the same as this ejectment suit, and the decrees of the courts of Wisconsin in the chancery suit embraced the decision of the same questions as involved here, they are conclusive of this controversy.

A deed destroyed and never placed upon record as to bona fide purchasers without notice, is inoperative, under the Statutes of Wisconsin in relation to the rigistry of deeds.

Where the description of the property conveyed, as lots numbers one and six of the fractional quarter, is a complete identification of the land, a more general and less definite description cannot control this: but whatever is inconsistent with it will be rejected, unless there is something in the deed, or the local situation of the property, or the possession enjoyed, to modify the application of this rule.

It cannot be controlled by the declarations of the parties, or by proof of negotiations or agreements on which the deed was executed.

Argued Jan. 9, 1860. Decided Jan 30, 1860.

IN ERROR to the District Court of the United States for the District of Wisconsin.

This was an action of ejectment brought in the court below by Parker, the present plaintiff in error, against the defendant in error, to recover a certain tract of land situated in the County of Milwaukee, in the State of Wisconsin. Both parties endeavored to connect themselves with the title of one William E. Dunbar (who had received from the United States a patent for the land in question), by certain conveyances and legal proceedings which are set out in the opinion of the court.

The trial below resulted in a verdict and judgment for the defendant, and the plaintiffs brought the case to this court on a writ of error.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. A. W. Machen and R. J. Gittings, for plaintiff in error:

1. The deed from Dunbar to Montague, dated Dec. 18, 1837, conveys one fourth part of all the northeast quarter section 21, which lies east of the river. The language of the description is, "one equal, undivided fourth part of the following-described parcel or tract of land, to wit: parts 1 and 6, being that part of the northeast quarter lying east of the Milwaukee River, in section —, p. 21," &c.

The grammatical construction refers the words "being that part of the northeast quarter," &c., to the preceding words "parcel or tract of land," and thus shows the parcel intended to be conveyed.

Lots "one and six" may be rejected, and the description is perfect. Reject the latter portion of the description, and nothing would be conveyed.

It seems absurd to say that a part which may be rejected without impairing the efficacy of the deed, should control and limit the part which cannot be rejected, and leave a sufficient description.

NOTE.—What is a sufficient delivery of a deed to pass the title. See note to Tompkins v. Wheeler, 41 U. S. (16 Pet.), 106.

Cancellation or surrender of deed by parties; its effect on title.

Executed and recorded deeds under seal can be surrendered and canceled only by other deeds under seal. Acquiescence expressed by parol and mutual understanding that a title shall be released cannot be made a substitute for a deed of release or surrender. Washington v. Ogden, 1 Black, 450; Suydam v. Beals, 4 McLean, 12.

A deed is not avoided by the seal being torn off by the grantor; or by a third person with his consent. Cutts v. U. S., 1 Gall., 69.

The grant is not affected by cutting out the seals, and signatures and attestation of a deed after acknowledgment and delivery. Frost v. Peacock, 4 Edw., 678.

If a stranger tears the seal from a deed, it will not invalidate it. Rees v. Overbaugh, 6 Cow., 746; Every v. Merwin, 6 Cow., 360.

Where the seals of a deed are torn off it is for the jury to decide with what intent it was done. Palm., 403; 1 Vent., 297; Bull. N. P., 268.

The cancellation of a deed will not devest property which has once vested by transmutation of possession. Marshall v. Fisk, 6 Mass., 32; Bottsford v. Morehouse, 4 Conn., 550; Holbrook v. Tirrell, 9 Pick., 105; Hatch v. Hatch, 9 Pick., 311; Dando v. Tremper, 2 Johns., 87; Lewis v. Payne, 8 Cow., 75.

An unconditional delivery of a deed fairly made cannot be revoked by any act of the party executing it. Woodman v. Coolbrooth, 7 Greenl., 181; Frisbie v. McCarty, 1 Stew. & Port., 61.

Where A conveyed to B and took back a mortgage and they subsequently canceled and gave up the deed and mortgage, it was held that the legal estate was in A. The mortgage passed the legal estate to him; and the canceling of the deeds does not devest property which has vested by transmutation of possession. Jackson v. Chase, 2 Johns., 84.

Title cannot be devested by the destruction or surrender of the grant. Thus, when A held an unrecorded deed from B, and procured him to execute a new deed to C, and destroyed the deed to himself, it was held that the title remained in A, notwithstanding C's deed was recorded. Raynor v. Wilson, 6 Hill, 469.

respecting the reference made by the explanatory words, the deed must be construed most favorably for the grantee.

Hall v. Gittings, 2 H. & J., 380; Hawkins v. Hudson, 1 H. & McH., 523; Cocheco Man. Co. v. Whittier, 10 N. H., 311, and cases cited.

2. If these constructions of the deed of December 18, 1837, is not admitted, the plaintiff contends that he has a good title to that part of the southwest quarter which is in controversy, derived from the conveyance by Dunbar to Montague of one half of the quarter section in question, in the spring of 1836, and the quitclaim deed of Montague to the plaintiff, of December 30, 1850.

(a) It is clear that the legal title to one full half of all that part of the northeast quarter of section 21 which lies east of the river, passed from the original deed from Dunbar to Montague in 1836.

(b) It was not revested or devested by the delivery up of the deed by Montague in 1837, nor by the destruction of it, if indeed it is destroyed. The cancellation of the deed by an agreement of parties does not revest the title.

Parker v. Kane, 4 Wis., 12, and cases cited; Agri. Ins. Co. v. Fitzgerald, 16 Q. B., 423; 4 Eng. L. & Eq., 215.

A grantee who has thus surrendered his deed, may perhaps be estopped from setting up his title, or precluded from giving evidence of its existence, where justice requires it; but the plaintiff is not thus estopped, nor is he, upon any sound principle, in any way precluded from introducing evidence of the execution and delivery of the deed of 1836, and setting up title to the ten acres which he claims under it, five of which are in controversy in this suit, unless the deed of December 18, 1837, embraces this tract, and thus gives him a valid title under that deed.

Blade v. Noland, 12 Wend., 175.

The party is precluded from offering evidence of the deed which has been canceled upon the ground of estoppel.

Farrar v. Farrar, 4 N. H., 195; Mussey v. Holt, 4 Fost. N. H., 248.

The estoppel being founded upon equity, extends no further than equity carries it.

B. & W. R. R. Co. v. Sparhawk, 5 Met., 469; Brewer v. B. & W. R. R. Co., 5 Met., 478; Howard v. Hudson, 2 El. & Bl., 9; 2 Smith's L. C., Am. ed., 1855, 642, 643; Carpenter v. Thompson, 3 N. H., 204.

Again; it was not material that the first deed was not upon record, because the purchases by C. J. Kane were at judicial sales, and no notice was necessary.

The rule caveat emption applies to such sales. The purchaser has no better title than the party whose right is sold.

Bashore v. Whisler, 3 Watts, 493; King v. Gunnison, 4 Pa., 171; Chase v. Woodbury, 6 Cush., 143, 148; Philips v. Johnson, 14 B. Mon., 172; Freeman v. Hill, 1 Dev. & B. Eq., 392; Dudley v. Cole, 1 Dev. & B. Eq., 436; Simmons v. Tillery, 1 Overt. (Tenn.), 274, 286; Bank v. Martin, 7 Md., 342; Georgetown v. Smith, 4 Cranch, C. C., 91.

A. L. Kane takes from C. J. Kane with actual notice; but this is not essential, as he derives his title from the judicial sales.

The bill in equity prosecuted by the plaintiff against Tweedy, Kane, Montague and others, furnishes no bar to this suit. That was a bill to obtain a reformation of the second deed from Dunbar to Montague, and of the deed from Montague to Fisk, in order that those deeds should so describe the land as to relieve the case from further controversy.

In determing the effect of the suit, the court and decree will look to the whole record, and not merely to what the counsel have caused to be filed as a decree.

Bainbrigge v. Baddeley, 2 Phil. Ch., 710; Guest v. Warren, 9 Exch. (Wels., H. & G.), 379; Hob., 53.

The insertion, in a decree, of matter which ought not to be there, cannot affect the right of the party entitled.

Holland v. Cruft, 3 Gray, 187; see Mondel v. Steel, 8 M. & W., 858, 872.

In fact, the Supreme Court of Wisconsin understood the bill to be for a reformation of the deed only. In the opinion it is said: "The cause or matter of complaint to relieve him, from which the complainant filed his bill in this cause, originated in a mistake committed in the descriptive part of the deed executed on Dec. 18, 1837," &c.; and then it is said that the cause for such a bill had occurred, and was complete upon the delivery of the defective deed.

The decree of the Supreme Court affirmed the decree of the court below as to Kane, Waldo and Brown, and reversed it as to all the rest; by which the court doubtless meant to affirm the decree so far only as it determined

Though the cancellation or redelivery of a deed will not reinvest the title, yet it is competent for one who has granted land to A, to convey the same land to B for a valuable consideration, and by the consent and agreement of A; and equity will restrain A from setting up his title against B. Dennison v. Ely, 1 Barb., 610; Schut v. Large, 6 Barb., 373.

Surrender or destruction of a deed duly executed and delivered will not devest the estate conveyed by it. Nicholson v. Halsey, 1 Johns. Ch., 417; Parshall v. Shirts, 54 Barb., 99; Cranmer v. Porter, 41 Cal., 462.

The cancellation or destruction of a deed once duly executed and delivered, so as to become operative, is utterly ineffectual to reinvest the title in the grantor, even though intended so to operate by the parties. To produce this effect, there must be a reconveyance or a decree of cancellation. Girnon v. Davis, 36 Ala., 589; Carver v. McNulty, 39 Pa. St., 473; Schaeffer v. Tithian, 17 Ind., 463; Chessman v. Whittemore, 23 Pick., 231; Rifener v. Bowman, 53 Pa. St., 313.

Surrender of a deed given on a secret trust, does not devest the title nor free the trustee from the trust. Kimball v. Greig, 47 Ala., 230.

Tearing off the names of the grantors in a deed with the mutual consent of all parties, will not operate to reinvest the title, although done under the supposition that such will be the effect. Steel v. Steel, 4 Allen, 417.

Canceling of an unrecorded deed, by agreement of the parties, with intent thereby to revest the title in the grantor, as between them and all subsequent claimants under them, is, in some of the States, permitted to operate as a reconveyance and revest the title in the grantor. Mussey v. Holt, 24 N. H., 248; Nason v. Grant, 21 Me., 160; Faulks v. Burns, 16 N. J. Eq., 250; Beauchamp's Will, 4 T. B. Mon., 361; see, also, Farrar v. Farrar, 4 N. H., 191; Commonwealth v. Dudley, 10 Mass., 403; Barrett v. Thorndike, 1 Greenl., 78.

Where one voluntarily surrenders a deed to be destroyed, he cannot afterwards avail himself of any obscurity or uncertainty in its contents. Jackson v. Gardner, 8 Johns., 394.

the matters in issue. Brown had disclaimed, and his disclaimer was not controverted. Kane and Waldo had insisted upon the Statute of Limitations of ten years, applicable to remedies for mistakes; and the decree of the court below and the court above, gave them the benefit of it. A decree was entered against Tweedy, because he had not pleaded the statute.

The plaintiff submits, therefore, that the plaintiff's equitable title to have relief, on account of the mistake in the second deed, Dunbar to Montague, and the deed Montague to Fisk, were the only matters in issue in that suit, and that he failed to sustain his suit against Kane and Waldo, only upon the ground that that remedy was barred by the statute. This furnishes no bar to any other remedy which he seeks, and no decree which the court could enter would bar the present suit.

Bainbrigge v. Baddeley, 2 Ph. Ch., 705; Mason's Exrs. v. Alston, 9 N. Y., 28; Callander v. Dittrich, 4 Scott, N. C. C., 198, 202.

(a) The opinion, therefore, expressed by the judge respecting the right of Montague and the plaintiff to assert a title at law under the first deed, may be regarded only as a mere dictum.

(b) As to the 8-16, the plaintiff could not set up a legal title under the first deed, when the bill was filed, unless the deed of 1837 covered the whole. He obtained Montague's quitclaim deed by filing that bill. He was, therefore, remediless at law, unless the description in the deed from Montague to Fisk were construed to pass the legal title to all the northeast quarter 21, and the plaintiff was not contending for that construction in that case, because he was not then asserting his legal title.

After all the discussion which the court saw fit to offer upon that subject, its view of complainant's case was "entirely based upon a mistake made in the description contained in the deed from Dunbar to Montague, dated Dec. 18, 1837, and not at all affected by the cancellation of the prior deeds, showing that all the opinion, excepting the first deed, was extrajudicial.

(c) It is clear that the decree of a court of equity cannot be evidence of a legal title, or operate as a bar to an action of ejectment.

Hickey v. Stewart, 3 How., 750; Neafie v. Neafie, 7 Johns. Ch., 4.

(d) Even if the issue had been the same, the decree would be no estoppel, because the object of the suit was different.

Behrens v. Sieveking, 2 N. Y. Cr., 602.

(e) Decision of the court of Wisconsin, founded upon the Statute of Limitations of that State, does not bar a suit in the courts of the United States.

Pease v. Peck, 18 How., 595; Union Bank v. Jolly, 18 How., 503; Suydam v. Broadnax, 14 Pet., 67.

The second branch of the case relates to the title of the plaintiff in lot one, and what is claimed by the defendant to be lot six.

The question arising is, whether any valid and binding partition has been made.

The plaintiff claims that in these proceedings the Circuit Court of the first circuit in Wisconsin, exceeded its jurisdiction.

D'Arcy v. Ketchum, 11 How., 165.

It does not follow, because a court has authority to render a judgment in a cause, that any judgment which it may render in that cause is within its jurisdiction, and therefore, if wrong, merely erroneous.

8 How., 542; 11 Pick., 508.

It is a familiar principle of law, that any court, when it is in the exercise of a special jurisdiction conferred by statutes, and quoad hoc like an inferior court. The statutory bar must appear by the proceedings to have been strictly pursued.

Thatcher v. Powell, 6 Wheat, 119; Shriver v. Lynn, 2 How., 43; Williamson v. Berry, 8 How., 495; Watson v. Bodell, 14 M. & W., 69; Shivers v. Wilson, 5 Harr. & J., 133; Gittings v. Hall, 1 Harr. & J., 23; Johnson v. Kraner, 2 H. & McH., 243; Jackson v. Brown, 8 Johns., 459; Denning v. Corwin, 11 Wend., 647; Mayhew v. Davis, 4 McLean, 219; Hardy v. Summers, 10 Gill & J., 323; Boswell v. Otis, 9 How., 336, 348; 4 McLean, 262.

Upon these principles, the plaintiff alleges that the judgment and proceedings in the admitted partition are void, and he alleges further, that no partition has ever been completed.

See Elliott v. Peirsol, 1 Pet., 340; Wilcox v. Jackson, 13 Pet., 511; Reg. v. St. George, 4 El. & B., 520, 525.

The action of the Supreme Court of Wisconsin upon the appeal, except that part reversing the decree of the circuit court establishing the acts of surveyor, cannot serve to cure any of the defects of jurisdiction.

Pease v. Peck, 18 How., 598; Latham v. Edgerton, 9 Cow., 227; Carroll v. Carroll, 16 How., 275.

Upon the third branch of the case, the plaintiff claims the sale by the administrator of Dunbar is void, because the guardian had not been appointed to protect the interests of his minor children.

Laws of Wis., 1839, p. 317, sec. 29; p. 325, sec. 4; p. 211, sec. 97; p. 298, sec. 13; Messinger v. Kintner, 4 Binn., 97; Smith v. Rice, 11 Mass., 507; Bennett v. Hamill, 2 Sch. & Lef., 566, 577:

Mr. James S. Brown, for the defendant in error:

1. Can a man who, receiving the deed of some piece of land, voluntarily destroys it and resorts to parol proof of its contents and of the extent of the grant to him, thus obtaining by indirection what the law prohibits? We do not deny that the title vested by a deed cannot be revested by its destruction, nor do we deny that the contents of the lost deed could be proven by parol; but when a party seeks to recover real estate, he must establish his title by legal proof. If it was evidenced by a deed, and the deed be not produced, he must show its loss without his default, or he will be prohibited from giving parol proof of its contents. In this case, the testimony of the plaintiff shows that it was destroyed by the grantee voluntarily, with the very object of preventing its use as testimony. He, therefore, was excluded by his own act, in destroying the highest evidence, from a resort to secondary evidence.

Farrar v. Farrar, 4 N. H., 491.

This was established by the Supreme Court of Wisconsin, as a rule of right and title between these very parties, and the plaintiff is bound by it.

Parker v. Kane, 4 Wis., 12.

2. All the questions raised by the plaintiff in his suit of ejectment, have been decided against him in the state courts and the highest tribunals of the State.

A suit was instituted for the partition of lots one and six, in which both the plaintiffs in this suit and the grantor of the defendant, were parties.

See Rev. Stat. of Wis., 49, p. 570.

Counsel reviewed the proceedings in this action, and contended that they were final.

3. A bill for the partition of the southwest 40 acres was filed, in which Kane and Parker were parties.

For the purpose of enabling the court properly to adjudicate upon the interests of the parties, and of establishing his rights to the ten acres in question in this ejectment suit, Parker filed his bill in chancery, in the nature of a cross-bill, setting forth substantially the same facts upon which he here seeks to recover.

To this bill Kane and others filed answers, and a decree was entered confirming the title of Kane, under the deed of the guardian, and also disaffirming every right of Parker under the alleged deed from Dunbar.

From this decree the plaintiff in this suit (Parker) appealed to the Supreme Court of Wisconsin; and by them the decree of the court below was affirmed as to Kane, and the whole matter was thereby disposed of.

Parker v. Kane et al., 4 Wis., 1.

The whole matter thereby became res adjudicata, and no court can collaterally set aside those decrees. Gould v. Stanton, 16 Conn., 12; Wendell v. Lewis, 6 Paige, 283; Woodruff v. Cook, 2 Edw. Ch., 259; *Bank of the U. N. C., 450; Manchester Mills, Doug., 222.

And this court has, in cases where adjucations have been made by inferior tribunals, recognized the necessity of leaving titles undisturbed.

S.* v. Booth, 21 How., 506; Haskell v. Raoul, 1 McCord Ch., 22; Kennedy v. Meredith, 4 Mon., 409; Campbell v. Price, 3 Munf., 227; White v. Atkinson, 2 Call. 376; Dodd v. Astor, 2 Barb. 5. The grantor of the defendant was a purchaser in good faith at the sale by the guardian. The Stat. of Wisconsin protected him against an unrecorded deed.

Rev. Stat. 1849, p. 329, sec. 24; Rev. Stat. 1839, p. 180, sec. 10.

The language of the statute is so strong as almost to exclude the question somtimes raised as to judicial sales; but the effect given by statute to the deeds both of guardian and administrator, places them in the same condition with deeds by parties.

Rev. Stat. 1849, p. 420, sec. 58; Rev. Stat. 1839, p. 284, sec. 21; p. 316, sec. 25.

6. At the hearing, an objection to the sale by the administrator was made, because no guardian had been appointed by the court to represent the minor heirs. Our answer to this is that all the steps prescribed by the statutes are conceded to have been taken, and that the appointment of the guardian for that purpose was not required. The administrator represented the estate.

Rev. Stat. 1839, p. 316; Grignon v. Astor, 2 How., 319.

Mr. Justice Campbell delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff sued in ejectment to recover certain parcels of land included in the northeast fractional quarter of section twenty-one, in township seven north, of range twenty-two east, in the district of lands subject to sale at Green Bay, and are situated in the City of Milwaukee.

The fractional quarter is subdivided into three lots. Lot number one is north of a line running east and west, that bisects the quarter section; lot number six corresponds to the southeast quarter of the quarter section; and the third lot is a tract of forty acres, and is known as the southwest quarter of the northeast quarter of the section, township and range above mentioned.

A patent issued to William E. Dunbar for this fractional quarter, in 1837, from the United States, in which the land is described as "the lot number one, and south half of the northeast quarter of section twenty-one, in township number seven north, of range twenty-two east, of the district of lands," &c. In the same year, Dunbar and wife conveyed to Richard Montague "one equal undivided fourth part of the following-described parcel or tract of land, viz.: Lots one (1) and six (6), being a part of the northeast quarter lying east of the Milwaukee River, in section number twenty-one, in township number seven (7) north, of range twenty-two east," &c.

The plaintiff, upon the trial of the cause in the district court, connected himself with this deed (which was duly recorded) by legal conveyances. Besides the title under this deed, he exhibited a title from Dunbar and wife to an undivided fourth of the whole fraction; all of which lies east of Milwaukee River. That the plaintiff had, at one time, a title to an undivided half of lots one and six, was not disputed; but his claim to an undivided fourth of the southwest quarter of the fraction, under the deed of Dunbar to Montague, was a matter of controversy.

The defendant connected himself with the patent of Dunbar, by showing a sale by the administrator of his estate, under the authority of the Court of Probate of Milwaukee, of an undivided one half of the entire fractional quarter patented to him, and a sale and conveyance by the guardian of the heirs of Dunbar, of an undivided fourth part of the southwest quarter of the fraction, under a decree of the Circuit Court of Milwaukee, sitting in chancery, and a purchase by persons under whom he claims

The defendant, to repel the claim of the plaintiff to any interest in the land possessed by him in lots numbers one and six, produced the record of proceedings and decrees in the Circuit Court of Milwaukee County, in chancery, for the partition of those lots among the plaintiff and his co-tenants, with the latter of whom the defendant is a privy in estate. This record shows that a petition was made by the cotenants of the plaintiff for a partition of these lots, according to their rights and interests. The plaintiff was made a party, appeared and answered, and there was a decretal order for a partition. Commissioners were appointed to divide the lots, who made a report to the court that appointed them. That the plaintiff made objections to the proceedings; was overruled, and afterwards appealed to the Supreme Court. That the Supreme Court revised the proceedings of the circuit court, and affirmed its decree in the most important particulars, and gave some directions, which, being fulfilled to the satisfaction of the circuit court, a final order of confirmation, and to vest the title in the the parties to their several allotments, was made.

The plaintiff objects to these proceedings:

1st. That there was no authority to make a several partition between the complainants. 2d. There was no authority to make a partition subjecting the land set off as his share to an easement. 3d. There was no authority to make a partition by a plat, without the establishment of permanent monuments. 4th. There was no reference to a proper person to inquire into the situation of the premises, after the decree settling the rights of the parties. 5th. The commissioners had no power to set apart and designate any portion of the land for sale, as they undertook to do. 6th. The court did not ascertain and distinctly declare whether any part or what part should be sold; but its language was hypothetical and uncertain. All the subsequent proceedings must fall, for want of the foundation of such a decree. 7th. It does not appear that all the commissioners met together, in the performance of their several duties, as required by the statute.

The Statutes of Wisconsin provide for the partition of estates held in common, by a bill in equity, filed in the circuit court of the county in which the land is, and for sale of the premises when a partition would be prejudicial to the owners. The court, upon the hearing, may determine and declare the rights titles and interests of the parties to the proceedings, and order a partition. It may appoint commissioners to execute the decree, who are required to make an ample report of their proceedings to the court, in which it can be confirmed or set aside. When a partition is completed, the court may enter a decree; and thereupon the partition is declared to be "firm and effectual forever," and "to bind and conclude" all the parties named therein.

The decrees are subject to the revising power of the Supreme Court. In reference to the objections made by the plaintiff, it is sufficient to say that some of them were made in the courts of Wisconsin without effect, and all might have been urged there at a proper stage in the proceedings. Kane v. Parker, 4 Wis., 123.

That it sufficiently appears that the subject was within the jurisdiction of those courts, and the proper parties were before them; and this court, conformably to their established doctrine, acknowledge the validity and binding operation of these orders and decrees, and determine that this court cannot inquire whether errors or irregularities exist in them in this collateral action. Thompson v. Tolmie, 2 Pet., 157; Grignon v. Astor, 2 How., 319; Beauregard v. New Orleans, 18 How., 407.

At the time that the partition of lots numbers one and six was sought for, a petition was filed in the same court by the same parties for a partition of the southwest quarter of the fractional quarter section described in Dunbar's patent. The plaintiff had an acknowledged interest in that parcel, independently of his claim under Montague, and was made a party to that suit.

In his answer to the petition he refers to this claim under Montague, and the mesne conveyances that connect him with the deed of Dunbar to Montague. He stated that, it being uncertain whether that deed of Dunbar would be sustained as sufficient by the court to convey a legal title to a fourth part of that parcel, he designed to file a bill in equity, for the purpose of having his title ascertained, and to have his conveyances reformed, if need be, so that his claim under that deed could be established and confirmed. In the same month he filed in the same court a bill in equity against the heirs of Dunbar and their guardian, and the purchasers under the decrees, obtained by the administrator and guardian, for the sale of the parcels in the fractional quarter described in Dunbar's patent.

He charges in this bill that Montague was equally interested with Dunbar, at the date of his entry in the Land Office, in the entire fraction, and furnished the money for the purpose of making it; that Dunbar gave to Montague a deed for one half, according to the description in the certificate of purchase from the Register of the Land Office. That by a subsequent contract his interest was reduced to one fourth. That his first deed not being recorded, he surrendered it to Dunbar, who destroyed it. That the deed for the fourth part was made to fulfill the agreement for title to a fourth of the whole fraction; and that Dunbar represented this deed to be sufficient, and during his life acknowledged that it was sufficient, and that Montague was a joint and equal owner with him.

He avers that these facts constitute him the owner of one fourth of the entire fraction, either at law or in equity. He refers to the sales of a larger interest than they really owned, by the heirs of Dunbar, through their guardian, and to the pendency of the suits of partition. He prays that the court will require the defendants in the bill to release their title to the interest embraced in his claim, and that his conveyances may be reformed, if need be, to express his legal and equitable rights; but if the court should decide that the guardian of the children of Dunbar had conveyed a good and valid title as against him, he prayed for a personal decree for the proceeds of his sale. He also prayed that this suit might be heard with the partition suit of the claimants under Dunbar's administrator and the guardian, and for all general and equitable relief.

The purchasers asserted in their answers the superiority of their legal and equitable title, and pleaded that they were bona fide purchasers, and all, except one, also pleaded the Statute of Limitations. The guardian answered, that he had made the sale in good faith, under a valid decree, and under the belief that his wards were entitled to the estate.

The circuit court, upon the pleadings and proofs, dismissed the bill of the plaintiff, and declared in the decree that the defendants had a valid title as bona fide purchasers, not affected by the registered deed from Dunbar to Montague.

From this decree the plaintiff appealed to the Supreme Court. That court affirmed the decree of the circuit court as to all the purchasers except one. They say the plaintiff is not entitled to relief under the first deed of Dunbar to Montague, which had been destroyed; for, admitting that the destruction of the deed did not disturb the title, nevertheless, in view of the Statute of Frauds, and the rule of evidence that Statute established, a grantee in a deed, who had voluntarily, and without fraud or mistake, destroyed his deed, could not establish his title. One of the purchasers, who had notice of the plaintiff's claim, and had failed to plead the Statute of Limitations, was decreed to release his title to the plaintiff, and the guardian was required to account to him for the price he had received. Parker v. Kane, 4 Wis., 1. The defendant is a privy in estate with the successful litigants in this cause, and relies upon the decree as a bar.

We have seen that the jurisdiction of the Circuit Court of Milwaukee, under the Statute of Wisconsin, in matters of partition, extends to the ascertainment and determination of the rights of the parties in matters of partition, and that its decree is final and effectual for their adjustment. That court is also clothed with power, at the suit of a person having a legal title and possession, to call any claimant before it, to quiet a disputed title. Rev. Stat. Wis., 573, sec. 20; 417, sec. 34.

The bill seems to have been framed on the distinct and declared purpose of obtaining from the courts of Wisconsin an authoritative declaration of the legal as well as equitable rights of these parties under their conflicting titles, with a view to the partition of the entire fractional quarter section, suits for which were then pending; and the prayer of the bill, that if the conveyance of the guardian "passed a good and valid title against the plaintiff," that then he might be indemnified by a decree for the proceeds of the sale in the hands of the guardian, submitted the legal as well as the equitable relations of the parties, under their respective titles, to the judgment of the court.

The reversal of the decree of the circuit court by the Supreme Court, and their decision that the guardian should account for the proceeds of the sale in his hands, is a direct response to this prayer, and implies that the recorded deed of Dunbar to Montague did not convey a legal title to this fraction. We question whether the voluntary dismissal of the bill, as to Martineau, the guardian, subsequent to its return in the circuit court, will qualify this decree, or limit its effect as res judicata of the legal right. 30 Miss., 66; 2 Freem. Ch., 158; 9 Simon, 411; Eng. Orders in Ch., 1845, n. 117.

In Great Britain, a Chancellor might have considered this as a case in which to take the opinion of a court of law, or to stay proceedings in the partition and cross suits until an action of law had been tried, to determine the legal title. Rochester v. Lee, 1 McN. & G., 467; Clapp v. Bromagham, 9 Cow., 530. But such a proceeding could not be expected in a State where the powers of the courts of law and equity are exercised by the same persons. The parties to this ejectment and the suit in chancery court of Wisconsin are the same, or are privies in estate. The same parcel of land is the subject of controversy, and the object of the suit, if not identical, is closely related.

The object of the bill in chancery, as we have seen, was to obtain from the court a decision upon the legal and equitable titles of the plaintiff, with the immediate view to a partition. If the decision had been made in his favor, it is true that a change of possession would not have taken place, as an immediate consequence, but it would have conclusively established the right of the plaintiff, either in an action of ejectment or upon a writ of right

The object of the suit of the plaintiff in chancery was to obtain a recognition of the sufficiency of his deeds, as entitling him to the land, or to supply their defects, or to afford him indemnity, by subjecting the price that his adversaries had paid for the land to a tortious vendor having the legal title.

The object of the ejectment suit is to recover the land by means of the title disclosed in the deeds. A portion of the judges find in the two suits eandem causam petendi, and that the decrees of the Circuit and Supreme Courts of Wisconsin embraced the decision of the same questions, and are conclusive of this controversy. Bank of U. S. v. Beverly, 1 How., 135. But if the plaintiff is not concluded by the proceedings of the courts of Wisconsin, the question arises, whether his legal title will support his claim to the interest in the southwest quarter of the fraction.

The first deed from Dunbar to Montague was destroyed before the second was made, and it never was placed upon record. The decree of the courts of Wisconsin shows that the purchasers of the guardian were bona fide purchasers without notice. That deed is, therefore, inoperative, under the Statutes of Wisconsin, in relation to the registry of deeds. Territorial Statutes of Wisconsin, 179, sec. 10; Rev. Stat. of Wis., 329, 350, secs. 24, 34, 35.

We agree with the Supreme Court of Wisconsin, that the recorded deed from Dunbar to Montague did not convey any part of the fractional quarter, except that contained in lots numbers one and six. Lot number one is a subdivision of the fractional quarter section, and is designated in the plat of survey, as well as in the patent. Lot number six is referred to in the pleadings and proofs as a known and recognized parcel, corresponding with an official subdivision; and, upon referring to the official surveys in the General Land Office, we find that it is, as we had supposed it from the evidence in the record to be, noted there. The deed of Dunbar designates these subdivisions as the corpus of his conveyance; and, as a further description, adds, "being that part of the north-east quarter lying east of the Milwaukee River."

The defendant, to repel the claim of the plaintiff to any interest in the land possessed by him in lots numbers one and six, produced the record of proceedings and decrees in the Circuit Court of Milwaukee County, in chancery, for the partition of those lots among the plaintiff and his co-tenants, with the latter of whom the defendant is a privy in estate. Louisiana, as seems to be the case, for the sales of plantations, such usage being reasonable, should govern in the absence of a special agreement.

Nothing is more common in our large cities than to charge brokerage for procuring the loan of money. This varies as the money market rises or falls. One per cent., and sometimes two, is charged for this service. The same rule applies as to the sale of property. Where the contract is fair, it is not perceived why such compensation should not be paid, as agreed by the parties, or by an established usage.

Where the vendor is satisfied with the terms, made by himself, through the broker, to the purchaser, and no solid objection can be stated, in any form, to the contract, it would seem to be clear that the commission of the agent was due, and ought to be paid. It would be a novel principle if the vendor might capriciously defeat his own contract with his agent by refusing to pay him when he had done all that he was bound to do. The agent might well undertake to procure the purchaser; but this being done, his labor and expense could not avail him, as he could not coerce a willingness to pay the commission which the vendor had agreed to pay. Such a state of things could only arise from an express understanding that the vendor was to pay nothing, unless he should choose to make the sale.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

v.

WILLIAM CHAPMAN ET AL., Claimants of the Steamer CAPITOL, and DANIEL EDWARDS AND JOSEPH MAILLOT, Sureties.

(See S. C., 22 How., 129–132.)

Contract for building ship or supplying her materials, is not a maritime contract—local laws cannot confer jurisdiction.

A contract for building a ship or supplying engines, timber, or other materials for her construction is, clearly, not a maritime contract.

People's Ferry Co. v. Beers, 61 U. S. (in B. 15), affirmed.

Although the law of Kentucky may create a lien in favor of the libelants, yet the local laws can never confer jurisdiction on the courts of the United States.

Submitted Jan. 18, 1860. Decided Jan. 30, 1860.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of then United States for the Eastern District of Louisiana.

The libel in this case was filed in the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Louisiana, by the appellants, who claimed a lien under the general admiralty law, and the law of the State of Kentucky, for $2,947.48, part of the price of the engines and boilers of the steamer Capitol, built for and furnished said steamer at Louisville, Kentucky.

The said court entered a decree in favor of the libelants. The circuit court, on appeal, reversed this decree, and dismissed the libel; whereupon the libelants took an appeal to this court.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court:

Mr. J. P. Benjamin, for appellants:

1. As to the existence of a lien in favor of the builder under the general maritime law, the adverse opinion of the circuit court will not be called in question, as the decision of this court in the case of The People's Ferry Co. of Boston v. Beers, 61 U. S. (in Book 15), 393, must be considered as conclusive on this point.

2. But a lien in this case was given, both by the law of the State of Kentucky, where the boat was built, and by that of the State of Louisiana, where she was intended to be employed, and where the libel was filed.

Rev. Stat. of Ky., 143, sec. 2; La. Civ. Code, 3204.

This lien under the law of Kentucky, where the contract for the work was made, was available for one year only from the time the cause of action accrued, as against a purchaser without actual notice.

The cause of action accrued on Jan. 5, 1855, and the libel was filed within the year, viz.: on Dec. 15, 1855.

3. The district court had jurisdiction to enforce this lien.

Read v. The Hull of a New Brig, 1 Story, 244; Davis v. A New Brig, Gilp., 478, 536; The Young Mechanic, 2 Curt., 404; The Richard Busteed, 21 Law Rep., 601; 1 Pars. Mar. 4. The lien thus created, was not devested by the departure of the vessel from the port of Louisville, nor by any subsequent change of ownership, nor by virtue of any provision of the law of Louisiana.

Liens of material men follow the vessel into whatever hands it passes.

But in the present case there has been no bona fide change of ownership.

5. The taking of drafts for the unpaid balance for the price of the engines, was no waiver of the lien. The drafts were offered to be surrendered at the hearing of the district court.

No counsel appeared for appellees.

Mr. Justice Grier delivered the opinion of the court:

The libelants claim to have a lien on the steamboat Capitol, for a balance due them for machinery furnished in her construction. The boat was built at Louisville, Kentucky, and the libelants furnished the boilers and engines. Payments were made as the work progressed, and bills of exchange taken for the balance due after the vessel was completed. These were not paid. The boat left the port and the State, and was afterwards sold, and became the property of the claimants.

Among other things, the claimants pleaded to the jurisdiction of the court. This plea was sustained by the circuit court.

A contract for building a ship or supplying engines, timber, or other materials for her construction, is clearly not a maritime contract.

Any former dicta or decisions which seemed to favor a contrary doctrine were overruled by this court, in the case of The People's Ferry Co. v. Beers, 20 How., 400.

It is said here, that the law of Kentucky creates a lien in favor of the libelants; and that, as this case originated before the adoption of our rule, which took effect on the 1st of May, 1859, it may, upon the principles recognized by this court in Peyroux v. Howard, 7 Pet., 343, be enforced in the admiralty. But (to quote the language of the court in Orleans v. Phœbus, 11 Pet., 184), "that decision does not authorize any such conclusion. In that case, the repairs of the vessel for which the state laws created a lien, were made at New Orleans, on tide-waters. The contract was treated as a maritime contract, and the lien under the state laws was enforced in admiralty, upon the ground that the court, under such circumstances, had jurisdiction of the contract, as maritime: and then the lien, being attached to it, might be enforced according to the mode of administering remedies in the admiralty. The local laws can never confer jurisdiction on the courts of the United States."

It is clear, therefore, that the judgment of the Circuit Court, dismissing the libel for want of jurisdiction, must be affirmed, without noticing other questions raised by the pleadings.

THE CITY OF NEW ORLEANS, Plff. in Er.,
v.
MYRA CLARK GAINES.

(See S. C., 22 How., 141-144.)

Where record shows nothing but regular judgment, it will be affirmed.

Where a cause, as presented to this court, simply shows a judgment in favor of defendant in error, with regular pleadings to warrant it, and beyond this, contains nothing that this court can notice, as a court of error, the judgment below will be affirmed.

Argued Jan. 10, 1860. Decided Jan. 30, 1860.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Louisiana.

The history of the case and a statement of the facts appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. J. P. Benjamin, for plaintiff in error:

1. The judgment in the suit of Durell in the state court, formed res judicata against Mrs. Gaines.

C. C., 2365; Plicque v. Perrett, 19 La., 318.

When cited by the city to contest the claim of Durel, the judgment by default taken against her was equivalent to a joinder of issue with him as to the right in question.

C. P., 360.

And upon the issue thus joined there was final judgment against her.

Even if the proceedings and judgment in said suit be not technically res judicata, they form a valid estoppel.

Mrs. Gaines was cited and personally informed by the City that Durell claimed payment of a sum which was supposed by the City to be due to her. The court ordered her to become a party and defend her rights, if any. She chose to remain silent; to waive objection to any payment to Durell; to permit the City to pay him; and is thereby estopped from now pretending that the payment should be made to her, and that Durell had no right to receive it.

Levistones v. Claiborne, 5 Rob. La., 196; Ducros v. Fortin, 8 Rob. La., 165.

Messrs. F. Perin and P. Phillips, for defendant in error:

It is doubtful whether any record ever came up from the circuits so perfectly barren of questions upon which a court of errors could base the authority or propriety of its revision, as the one now presented. There is nothing in the record to show anything that was done upon the trial. The final decree merely recites that "this cause having been argued and submitted on a former day, and the court having considered the same, doth now order, adjudge and decree," &c. There was no note of evidence, no objections made or reserved, no bill of exceptions taken, and no facts even returned by the court. The facts in the opinion of the judge justified his decision, whatever they were: but what they were can never be ascertained by this record.

Mr. Justice Catron delivered the opinion of the court:

The City of New Orleans instituted proceedings by suit in a city court, pursuant to a Statute of Louisiana, for opening two streets in the City, and appropriating the private property requisite for that purpose; and on the tableau of assessment certain squares of ground were put down as belonging to Mrs. Gaines, and the damages done to owner fixed at $2,363.

The assessment was decreed to Mrs. Gaines by the court where the proceeding was had; and she brought suit on this judgment against the City, in the United States Circuit Court.

The defendant (the City), by its answer, admitted the proceeding, and the damages assessed on the property described in the petition; but, in avoidance of the demand, averred that a suit had been brought by one Durell against the City, claiming that he was the true owner of the property through which the streets run, and which the commissioners of assessment had supposed to be owned by Mrs. Gaines, and demanding payment to him of the damages claimed by her; that in the suit so brought by Durell Mrs. Gaines had been personally cited as a party, at the instance of the City, for the purpose of having the question decided between her and Durell, as to the ownership of the property, and as to their respective claims on the City for the sum awarded; and that in said suit judgment was rendered, determining the question in favor of Durell; and this judgment is pleaded in bar of the present suit.

Various documents were exhibited with the answer, and filed in the Circuit Court, on behalf of the City, including a record of the suit by Durell against the City, and the recovery of the damages for extending the streets; but nothing appears in the record showing that these documents were given in evidence on the trial; nor did the judge before whom the cause was heard make any statement of the facts found by him, as the usual practice is, where the circuit court in Louisiana tries issues of fact without the intervention of a jury.

The cause, as presented to us, simply shows a judgment in Mrs. Gaines' favor, with regular pleadings to warrant it; and beyond this, contains nothing that this court can notice, as a court of error.

It is ordered that the judgment below, be affirmed.

v.
THE BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS OF THE COUNTY OF DAVIESS.

(See S. C., 22 How., 364–380.)

County subscription to railroad, when subject to Indiana Constitution of 1851.

By the Act of Incorporation of the Ohio and Mississippi Railroad Company of the 14th February, 1848, and the amendment thereto of January 15th, 1849, no such rights to county subscriptions vested in said Company as excluded the operation of the new Constitution of Indiana, which took effect on the 1st day of November, 1851.

By virtue of the said Acts, and of the election in favor of subscription to the stock, the said Company acquired no such right to the subscription of the defendants as would be protected by the Constitution of the United States against the said new Constitution of Indiana.

Argued Jan. 16, 1860. Decided Feb. 6, 1860.

ON a certificate of division of opinion between the Judges of the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Indiana.

The case is fully stated by the court.

Messrs. Samuel Judah, S. F. Vinton and J. P. Benjamin, for plaintiffs:

On the first Monday in March, 1849, an election was held in the County of Daviess, to determine whether the said county should subscribe for stock in the O. & Miss. R. R. Co.

At such election a majority decided in favor of subscription.

By virtue of this election, it became the duty of the County Commissioners to subscribe for $30,000 of the stock, and it became the right of the Company to have such subscription.

On Sept. 10, 1852, the defendants subscribed for the stock, and afterwards issued the bonds with the coupons which are the subject of this suit.

The new Constitution of Indiana took effect after the election and before subscription, Nov. 1, 1851.

The only question is, does it operate in this case? It forbade such a subscription unless on cash payment. The O. & Miss. R. R. Company was incorporated by an Act of Indiana, approved Feb. 14, 1848. The power of the Company as to stock is very ample. By section 2, five millions of capital is authorized, with power to the directory to add shares without limit by subscriptions or by sale. By section 6, all persons of lawful age, and all corporations of the United States, may subscribe for stock, and the Company may, at any time or place, sell stock to any amount on such terms as shall be thought proper. Sec. 12 is as follows:

"It shall be lawful for the county commissioners of any county in the State through which said Railroad passes, for and in behalf of said county to authorize by order on their records so much of said stock to be taken in said railroad as they may deem proper, at any time within five years after the opening of the books of subscription to said stock. To this provision there is this further: "that it shall be the duty of said County Commissioners in any county, so to subscribe for and on behalf of said county, if a majority of the qualified voters of said county, at any annual election within five years, &c., shall vote for the same."

The Commissioners did not subscribe, the people did not vote at any annual election; so an amendment to the Act of Incorporation was enacted Jan. 15, 1849. By this Act, special provision was made for a special election on the first Monday of March, 1849, and it was provided "that if a majority of the votes given be in favor of subscription, the Commissioners shall subscribe for Daviess County not less than $30,000; and in the last section of these Acts, it is declared that each shall be considered a public Act and shall receive a liberal construction.

There is another remark to be noticed. The Acts are in pari materia, and to be construed together.

The first question on which the judges differed, relates to the nature of the right granted by the Act of Incorporation, and by the amendment to that Act to the Railroad Company, to receive county subscriptions. In other words: was it a vested right, beyond the reach of a law or Constitution made afterwards?

There is no provision in the new Constitution of Indiana as to existing rights, either personal or corporate, except the ordinary declarations: "no man's property shall be taken by law without just compensation" (art. 1, sec. 21), and, "no law impairing the obligation of contracts shall ever be passed."

Art 1, sec. 24.

We assume that the property of private corporations is protected by section 21.

By the Act of Incorporation, a capital of five millions is contemplated; but the Company is allowed to organize on the subscription of $200,000, and a payment at the time of subscription is required. By the 12th section, counties are authorized to subscribe for stock, as by the 6th section all persons of lawful age, and all corporations of the U. S., may subscribe. Does the power exist anywhere to restrain these rights against the will of the Company? If the company may be deprived of one of these classes of subscribers, it may be deprived of all, and thus its entire capacity may be destroyed, and itself in effect annihilated.

But it is argued that counties are municipal corporations; that municipal corporations are under the control of state legislation; and that those who contract with them, contract subject to this control. And we answer: it is true that municipal corporations are subject to the control of the Legislature. If the Legislature creates a municipal corporation and endows it with other powers; with powers "to contract and be contracted with;" with powers of a private, and not of a political nature; with powers including the rights and duties and obligations of private corporations and individuals; does it not create an exception as to such rights, duties and obligations? In such case the Legislature may control, may dissolve the Corporation; but the rights, the duties and obligations will remain chargeable on its property.

Mumma v. Potomac Co., 8 Pet., 281; Curran v. State of Arkansas, 15 How., 310.

The second question covers more ground than the first.

The question is: whether by virtue of the Act of Incorporation, and the amendment, and the election, the Railroad Company acquired such right to the subscription as would be protected by the Constitution of the United States.

This only differs from the first question, in being, if anything, stronger than the first in favor of the plaintiffs. In the first, a mere right dependent on a certain discretion is claimed; in this, a right is claimed so perfected that nothing remained but the discharge of a ministerial duty.

The law is plain: "And if a majority of the votes given shall be in favor of subscription, the County Board of said County shall subscribe.

Sec. 2, Act Jan. 15, 1849.

There is no discretion. There is only a duty; and this, by the law of Indiana, may be enforced by mandamus.

Sec. 789; sec. 745, 2 Rev. Stat., pp. 197, 198.

Hence, when the new Constitution took effect, there was an absolute vested right in the company to $30,000 subscription from the County of Daviess, to be paid in bonds of a certain description; and we submit, that this right is a matter of contract, secured by the Constitution of the United States.

Messrs. McDonald & Porter, for defendants:

By the Statutes of Indiana, county commissioners are bodies "corporate or politic."

1 R. S. of 1852, p. 225.

Touching the matter in controversy, the first Act which they performed—that of subscribing the stock—they performed as a Corporation on Sept. 10, 1852. And the question is: did the Constitution of 1850 prohibit that Act? We say it did. And in support of this view, we suggest the following considerations:

I. The constitutional prohibition is, that "No county shall subscribe for stock in any incorporated company, unless the same be paid for at the time of such subscription." The spirit and intent of this clause seem very plain. Certainly the design was to prohibit counties from involving their people in debt for corporation stocks. And it is equally certain that any subscription by which such a debt is created, is within the prohibition. Nor is it less clear that the prohibition applies to all such debts, whether created directly or indirectly, for such stocks. The mischief intended to be guarded against, was the burdening of the people with taxes to pay debts contracted for corporation stocks. And the power to impose that burden in any manner, is the thing prohibited.

II. Was the stock paid for at the time of the subscription?

The existence of this suit is an answer to the question.

The phrase "paid for at the time" in the Constitution, certainly means more than the making of a promise or obligation to pay.

Payment is a technical term, and in strictness implies the discharge of a debt by the delivery of money. Thus in pleading, if the defense is that we have done what we engaged to do, we allege in cases of engagement to do something besides paying money, performance, and in cases of money debts, we plead payment. The Supreme Court of Indiana has held, that a plea of payment in anything else than money is a bad plea.

Sinard v. Patterson, 8 Blackf., 353.

The two words "debt" and "payment," always refer to money.

The constitutional provision in question requires that the stock subscribed "be paid for at the time of such subscription." Payment must be simultaneous with the subscription. If in this we were wrong, still it does not appear that the payment alleged in the declaration was made "at the time" of the subscription. The averment is that "afterwards, to wit: on the day and year aforesaid, in payment for said stock," the bonds were issued.

The declaration says, that "in conformity with said Acts, the defendants subscribed for 600 shares," &c., "of the value of $30,000." The subscription, then, was "in conformity with the Acts." These Acts give the form of the subscription. It is found in the 5th section of the charter of 1848 thus:

"We whose names are subscribed hereto, do promise to pay to the President and Directors of the Ohio and Mississippi Railroad Company, the sum of fifty dollars for every share of stock set opposite to our names respectively, in such manner, proportions and times as shall be determined by said Company, in pursuance of the charter thereof."

This is the only form of subscription given in the two Acts. Section 5 of the charter requires this form to be pursued. Both by the declaration and the charter, it must be supposed to have been pursued in the subscription under consideration.

Now, as the engagement was to pay in money, the delivery of something else—bonds, for example—could not in any event amount to pay ment, unless accepted by the company as payment.

Maze v. Miller, 1 Wash. C. C., 328.

The Supreme Court of Indiana has given a construction to the prohibitory clause in the Indiana Constitution. They say: "This section by implication concedes the power to counties to take stock, at all events by permission of the Legislature, in companies chartered to construct works of internal improvements, under the new Constitution, by making cash payment at the time."

The City of Aurora v. West, 9 Ind., 78.

Cash payment is the meaning of the section.

Even if the stock was paid for at the time, still the transaction was clearly in violation of that part of the Indiana Constitution which declares that no county shall "loan its credit to any incorporated company."

Undoubtedly the issuance of the bonds in question, was lending the credit of the county to this Railroad Company. This was the prime object of the transaction. The bonds were drawn in the usual form to be put into the market. They were put into the market or the plaintiffs would never have got them; and putting them into the market was using the credit of the county, which it had loaned to the Company.

III. It is said by the plaintiffs that the vote to take stock given by the people of Daviess County, before the Constitution of 1850 took effect, amounts to a contract, the obligation of which is protected by the Federal Constitution against the prohibition in the Constitution of Indiana.

The plaintiffs claim, first, that the vote amounted to a "contract" within the 10th sec- of the 1st article of the Federal Constitution; and second, that the prohibition in the Indiana Constitution is in violation of the Company's charter, which permits "the county commissioners of any county through which the railroad passes" to subscribe stock. Let us examine each of those points:

1. Did the vote of the people amount to a "contract" which the Federal Constitution protects? We say no; for that vote was not a contract at all. "A contract is an agreement, upon a sufficient consideration, to do or not to do a particular thing." "An agreement" is the binding assent of both parties. This aggregatio mentium is indispensable to every contract. In this sense the people of the county could not by vote enter into an "agreement," for they are not a body politic; and they cannot be sued. It is the Board of Commissioners that can agree, not the voters. This contract is not alleged to have been made with the voters, but with the Commissioners. Not the voters, but the Commissioners are sued. If the vote amounted to a contract, it was the contract of the voters; and it will be time enough when these voters are sued, to inquire whether they contracted. It is for the present enough to know that the present defendants, the Board of Commissioners, never contracted till after the Constitution of 1850 took effect.

And if the voters had power to make a contract by a vote to take stock, still their vote could not amount to a contract, till the Company also agreed. To a contract there must of course be the assent of both parties. Now, it does not appear by the record that the Railroad Company ever assented to this supposed contract, till the time of the subscription on which, as we have seen, was long after the constitutional prohibition took effect. As, then, there was no assent by both parties till after the first day of November, 1851, there could have been no contract till after that day. And as the making of the contract after that day was prohibited by the Indiana Constitution, there could not have been in the case any contract protected by the Federal Constitution.

Balt. and Sus. R. R. v. Nesbit, 10 How, 396.

2. Is the prohibition in the Indiana Constitution in violation of the Company's charter, which provided that county subscriptions of stock might be taken? In other words, since a charter is in some respects and in some sense a contract, is the provision in the charter of the Ohio and Mississippi Railroad Company, allowing counties to subscribe for stock therein, such a contract as is contemplated by the Federal Constitution?

The provisions of the charter give no vested right of property to the Company; they merely bestow on counties the power to subscribe for stock—a power which, by the general laws of Indiana, did not before exist. They merely operate as enabling Acts—as Acts removing disabilities.

"That the framers of the Constitution did not intend to restrain the States in the regulation of their civil institutions adopted for internal government, is admitted; and it has never been so construed."

Story, Const., sec. 1392.

Undoubtedly the Indiana Legislature might at any time repeal all laws incorporating counties and county boards, and thus disable them from subscribing for any stock or making any contract. Nor is it to be for a moment tolerated, that the Legislature of Indiana, by granting a charter to a railroad company, could have intended to abandon any portion of its legislative power over the counties of the State.

As every charter stands, all natural persons not laboring under disabilities, may take stock. But who ever thought that the Legislature may not, after the grant of the charter by law, impose liabilities on some of these natural persons? Suppose that at the time of the passage of a charter, married women were by law capable of contracting by subscribing for stock, can it be said that the Legislature cannot afterwards by law impose on them the usual disability of femes covert? So we think it clear that the Constitution of Indiana might impose on the counties the disabilities in question.

In the case of Richmond, &c., R. R. Co. v. The Louisa R. R. Co., 13 How., 71, where the Legislature of Virginia, in a charter, gave a pledge not to allow any other railroad to be constructed near the one chartered, and afterwards another railroad was chartered contrary to that pledge, it was held that the first charter was not violated within the meaning of the United States Constitution touching the obligation of contracts. That was certainly a much stronger case than the one now under discussion; and as long as it stands for law, surely the defendant in this case is safe.

The case of Cov. and Lex. R. R. Co. v. Kenton Co. Court, 12 B. Mon., 144, is in point on this question. There the charter of the Company had authorized the county court, under a certain vote of the people, to subscribe stock. The people had voted for it, but the county court refused to subscribe, and in the meantime the Legislature repealed the provision of the charter authorizing county subscriptions. This repeal was held no violation of a contract, because "until an actual subscription of the stock was made no right to it vested in the Company."

Upon the whole, we submit that it is perfectly clear that the question propounded in this case for the decision of the court, ought to be decided in the affirmative.

The following direct answers to the questions certified to this court are from the order of the court made in this cause:

"It is the opinion of this court:

1st. That by the Act of Incorporation of the Ohio and Mississippi Railroad Company, of Feb. 14, 1848, and the amendment thereto of Jan. 15, 1849, no such right to county subscriptions vested in said Company as excluded the operation of the new Constitution of Indiana which took effect on Nov. 1, 1851.

2d. That by virtue of the said Acts, and of the said election in the declaration set forth, the Ohio and Mississippi Railroad Company acquired no such right to the subscription of the defendants as would be protected by the Constitution of the United States against the new Constitution of Indiana, which took effect on Nov. 1, 1851.

Mr. Justice Nelson delivered the opinion of the court:

The case comes up from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Indiana.

This suit was brought by the plaintiffs against the Board of Commissioners of the County of Daviess, to recover two installments of interest accruing upon certain bonds issued by the Board for stock subscribed to the Ohio and Mississippi Railroad Company; and on the hearing the following questions arose, upon which the judges of the court divided in opinion:

1. Whether, by the said Act of Incorporation of the said Railroad Company, and the amendment thereto of January 15, 1849, any such right to county subscriptions vested in said Company as would exclude the operation of the new Constitution of Indiana, which took effect on the 1st day of November, 1851.

2. Whether by virtue of the said Acts, and of the said election in the declaration set forth, the Ohio and Mississippi Railroad Company acquired any such right to the subscription of the defendants as would be protected by the Constitution of the United States against the new Constitution of Indiana, which took effect on the 1st day of November, 1851.

The charter of the Railroad Company, passed February 14, 1848, provides that it should be lawful for the county commissioners through which the road passed to subscribe for stock on behalf of the county, at any time within five years after the opening of the books of subscription, if a majority of the qualified voters of said county, at an annual election, shall vote for the same.

The amended Act of January 15, 1849, made the holding of the election in the county peremptory on the first Monday of March (then) next, to determine the question of subscription or not to the stock.

The election was held in pursuance of this law, and a majority of the votes of the county cast in favor of the subscription. This was on the first Monday of March, 1849; and on the 10th September, 1852, the Board of Commissioners, in pursuance of the Acts and of election aforesaid, subscribed for six hundred shares of the stock of the Railroad Company, of the value of $50 per share, in the whole amounting to $30,000, and in payment of said stock issued thirty bonds, of $1,000 each, duly signed and sealed by the president of the Board of Commissioners, and attested by the auditor of the county, and delivered the same to the president and directors of the railroad company. By the terms of the obligations, they were made payable at the North River Bank in the City of New York, twenty five years from date, to the Railroad Company or bearer, with interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum, payable annually on the 1st March, at the bank aforesaid, upon the presentation and delivery of the proper coupons attached, signed by the auditor of the said county. The plaintiffs are the holders and owners of sixty of these coupons.

The new Constitution of the State of Indiana contains the following provision:

"No county shall subscribe for stock in any incorporated company, unless the same be paid for at the time of such subscription; nor shall any county loan its credit to any incorporated company, nor borrow money for the purpose of taking stock in any such company."

Sec. 6, art. 10, Constitution of Indiana.

This Constitution took effect on the 1st November, 1851. The subscription was not made nor bonds issued by the Board of Commissioners of the county, as we have seen, until the 10th September, 1852. The question therefore arises, whether the subscription and bonds, thus made and issued after the Constitution went into effect, were not forbidden by the 6th section of of the 10th article above cited and, therefore, null and void.

The precise question first presented by the court below, upon which the judges divided, is as follows:

Whether, by the said Act of Incorporation of said Railroad Company, and the amendment thereto of January 15, 1849, any such right to county subscriptions vested in said Company as would exclude the operation of the new Constitution of Indiana, which took effect on the 1st November, 1851.

The question admits, at least by implication, that this 6th section of the Constitution applies to the acts of the Board of Commissioners, in making the subscription and issuing the bonds; but presents the question, whether, at the time it went into effect, there was not such a right to the subscription and bonds vested in the Railroad Company as could be upheld, notwithstanding the constitutional prohibition?

This view is sought to be sustained by force of the 10th section of the 1st article of the Constitution of the United States, which provides that no State shall pass any law "impairing the obligation of contracts."

The argument is, that the provisions in the railroad charter and amendment, conferring power upon the Board of Commissioners of the county, and making it their duty to subscribe for stock, and issue bonds therefor if a majority of the qualified voters of the county should determine at an election in favor of the same, import a contract with the Railroad Company on behalf of the State, which is protected by the clause referred to in the Constitution of the United States; and hence the state constitutional prohibition is inoperative to annul the subscription or the bonds That this right to the subscription and bonds, resting upon a contract in the charter, is unaffected by any subsequent statute or organic law of the State.

Without stopping to inquire whether or not the power conferred upon the Board of Commissioners in the charter and amendments of the Railroad Company, in the form and with the conditions therein mentioned, constitutes a contract, the court is of opinion that, in view of the body upon which the power is conferred, and of the nature of the power itself, no such contract existed, if any, as is contemplated by this clause of the Federal Constitution. The power or authority contained in the charter, and out of which the right in question is claimed to arise, is conferred upon the county, a public corporation or civil institution of government, and upon public officers employed in administering laws; and the power or authority itself concerns this body in its public political capacity.

Chief Justice Marshall observed, in Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 4 Wheat., 627, that the word "contract," in its broadest sense, would comprehend the political relations between the Government and its citizens; would extend offices held within a State for state purposes, and to many of those laws concerning civil institutions, which must change with circumstances and be modified by ordinary legislation, which deeply concern the public, and which, to preserve good government, the public judgment must control. But, he observes, the framers of the Constitution did not intend to restrain the States in the regulation of their civil institutions adopted for internal government, and that the instrument they have given us is not to be so construed (p. 629). And Mr. Justice Washington observed, in the same case (p. 663), in respect to public corporations, which exist only for public purposes, such as towns, cities, &c., the Legislature may, under proper limitations, change, modify, enlarge, or restrain them; securing, however, the property for the use of those for whom, and at whose expense, it was purchased. See, also, pages 693, 694.

It would be difficult to mention a subject of legislation of more public concern, or in a greater degree affecting the good government of the county, than that involved in the present inquiry. The power conferred upon the Board of Commissioners by the provisions in the charter, among other things, embraced the power of taxation, this being the ultimate resort of paying both the principal and interest of the debt to be incurred in the subscription and issuing of the bonds.

The second question presented, upon which the judges differed, is as follows:

Whether, by virtue of said Acts, and of the said election in the declaration set forth, the Ohio and Mississippi Railroad Company acquired any such right to the subscription of the defendants as would be protected by the Constitution of the United States against the new Constitution of Indiana, which took effect the 1st November, 1851.

The Acts of 1848 and 1849, already referred to, made it the duty of the Board of Commissioners to subscribe for the stock, if a majority of the qualified voters at an election determined in favor of the subscription.

The election took place on the first Monday of March, 1849, when a majority of the votes was cast for the subscription. The Constitution of Indiana took effect 1st November, 1851. But the subscription was not made till the 10th September, 1852, and the bonds were issued after this date. It is insisted that the contract of subscription became complete when, at the election, a majority of the votes was cast in its favor, and did not require the form of a subscription on the books for the stock of the Railroad Company to make it obligatory upon the parties; and which, if true, it is agreed the contract would be protected within the Constitution of the United States, as it would then have been complete before the constitutional prohibition of Indiana. But the court is unable to concur in this view. It holds, that a subscription was necessary to create a contract binding upon the county, on one side, to take the stock and pay in the bonds; and upon the other, to transfer the stock, and receive the bonds for the same. Until the subscription is made, the contract is unexecuted, and obligatory upon neither party.

We have arrived at the conclusion that both of the questions presented to us by the court below must be answered in the negative with some reluctance, as, for aught that appears in the case, the subscription to the stock by the Board of Commissioners was made and the bonds issued in good faith to the Railroad Company, and also sold by it, and purchased by the plaintiff in confidence of their validity; but, after the best consideration the court has been able to give the case, it has been compelled to hold, for the reasons above stated, that the subscription was made, and the bonds issued, in violation of the Constitution of Indiana and, therefore, without authority, and void.

We have not been able to find that the courts of Indiana have passed upon this clause of their Constitution, and have, therefore, been obliged to expound it with the best lights before us. We should have felt very much relieved, if a construction had been given to it by the judicial authorities of the State, and have readily followed it.

Whereupon it is now here ordered and adjudged by this court that it be so certified to the said circuit court."

JOSEPH S. CUCULLU, Plff. in Er.,

v.

LOUIS EMMERLING.

(See S. C., 22 How., 83-87.)

Objection not made below will not be heard here—where judge finds facts, evidence not reviewed.

The objection, that a contract cannot be proved by one witness, according to the law of Louisiana, should have been made to the court below.

Where the case stated, made by the judge to whom the cause was submitted, finds facts, and not evidence of facts, this court cannot inquire, unless upon some bill of exceptions properly taken, whether the evidence was sufficient to justify the finding of the court.

Argued Jan. 23, 1860. Decided Feb. 13, 1860.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Louisiana.

This case arose upon a petition filed in the court below, by the defendant in error, to recover commissions alleged to be due him as a broker.

The cause having been submitted to the court, a judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiff for $2,700, with interest and costs; whereupon the defendant sued out this writ of error.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Miles Taylor, for plaintiff in error:

The agreement or contract under which Emmerling pretends to claim the payment by Cucullu of $2,700, as his commissions, cannot be proved in the State of Louisiana by one witness, and the judgment of the court below must be reversed for want of sufficient evidence to sustain it, as disclosed by the statement of facts in the case.

Cormier v. LeBlanc, 8 Mart. N. S., 458; 3 La. Ann., 214; Gasquet v. Kokernot, 5 La., 268; Lallande v. McMaster, 16 La., 352; Gillispie v. Day, 19 La., 203; Brent v. Slack, 10 Rob. La., 371.

Mr. J. P. Benjamin, for defendant in error:

Louis Emmerling recovered a judgment in the circuit court against J. S. Cucullu, for $2,700, for brokerage on the sale of a plantation. The statement of fact shows that the commissions were earned by Emmerling, and the writ of error seems to have been prosecuted solely to vex and delay the defendant in error, who prays the court to allow him damages under the 23d rule.

Mr. Justice Grier delivered the opinion of the court:

The declaration charges that the plaintiff below was employed by Cucullu, as a broker, to sell a plantation; that he effected a sale on terms satisfactory to Cucullu; that the sale was consummated by delivery of the property and receipt of the purchase money; and that for these services the plaintiff was entitled to a brokerage of two per cent., which Cucullu refused to pay.

The facts of the case are stated by the court below in the nature of a special verdict, finding the allegations of the declaration to be supported by the evidence.

It has been objected here, that such a contract cannot be proved by one witness, according to the law of Louisiana. That objection should have been made to the court below, if it is worth anything. But the case stated, made by the judge to whom the cause was submitted, finds facts, and not evidence of facts; consequently, this court cannot inquire, unless upon some bill of exceptions properly taken, whether the evidence was sufficient to justify the finding of the court. It would be granting a new trial, because the verdict is not supported by the evidence, without any bill of exceptions to the admission of testimony or to the charge of the court.

The judgment of the court below is, therefore, affirmed.

WILLIAM WAKEFIELD.

(See S. C., 22 How., 118-129.)

Interest on notes after due—appeal, when proper—laws of Territory cannot regulate process of this court—what parties need not join in appeal—defendant with separate interest.

By the construction of a statute of the Territory of Minnesota, after the day specified for the payment of notes, the interest is to be calculated at the rates therein mentioned or according to the rate established by law, when there is no written contract on the subject between the parties.

The contract being entirely silent as to interest after due, if the notes should not be punctually paid, the creditor is entitled to interest after that time by operation of law, and not by any provision in the contract.

In a proceeding in the nature of a bill in equity to foreclose a mortgage, an appeal, and not a writ of error, is the appropriate mode of bringing the case before this court.

The laws or practice of a Territory cannot regulate the process by which this court exercises its appellate power.

It is not necessary that parties who acquired liens on the mortgaged premises subsequent to the mortgage in question, should join in the appeal.

A defendant in equity, whose interest is separate from that of the other defendants, may appeal without them.

Argued Dec. 8, 1859. Decided Feb. 20, 1860.

APPEAL from the Supreme Court of the Territory of Minnesota.

The history of the case and a statement of the facts appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. J. B. Brisbin, H. L. Stevens and H. W. Merrill, for appellant:

1. It is submitted that the court below erred in allowing the plaintiff interest, at the rate specified in the notes, after their maturity.

Our Statutes (Vide Rev. Stat. of Minn., p. 155, ch. 35) fix the legal rate of interest at seven per cent. per annum, in all cases where no other rate is agreed upon by the parties in writing.

The appellant agreed in writing to pay a certain sum at a certain time, with interest thereon at a certain rate, or a certain other sum at interest at the same time. His contract to pay interest, did not extend beyond the time at which he agreed to pay it. The plaintiff, therefore, although entitled to interest upon his demand until the same is satisfied, is not so entitled by virtue of the defendant's contract to pay it, but by virtue of the law which allows interest upon all liquidated demands, from the time they become due until they are paid.

Bander v. Bander, 7 Barb., 560, and cases there cited.

NOTE.—Interest, when recoverable as damages or on money. See note to Sneed v. Wistar, 21 U. S. (8 Wheat.), 690.

2. Authorities directly in point upon the question raised in this case, are not numerous.

In Macomber v. Dunham, 8 Wend., 550, it was held that a loan company, which was authorized by its charter to charge interest for a full month where a loan was for a period over fifteen days and less than one month, was not entitled, where a loan made for twenty days remained unpaid, to demand interest at the same rate for any subsequent time.

In U. S. Bank v. Chapin, 9 Wend., 471, it is held that a bank, which by law is limited to six per cent. interest upon all discounts, is entitled to recover at the rate of seven per cent. from the time the debt becomes due.

The case of Ludwick v. Huntzinger, 5 Watts & S., 51, 60, it seems to us is directly in point. In that case it was held, that "a note payable at a future day with three per cent. interest from the date, carries that interest till the day of payment, and after that, carries lawful interest."

This case is cited in a note to Chit. Bills (11 American, from 9th London ed.), 682, marginal paging.

There are several cases in the reports of the State of Alabama.

Clay v. Drake, Minor, 164; Heury v. Thompson. Minor, 209; see, also, Kitchen v. Br. Bank of Mobile, 14 Ala., 233.

"The policy of all usury laws of modern times is to protect necessity against avarice, and to fix such a rate of interest as will enable industry to employ with advantage a borrowed capital, and thereby to promote labor and national wealth." Per Ch. J. Best, in the House of Lords (3 Bing., 193).

Messrs. Joseph H. Bradley and M. E. Ames, for appellee:

The appeal from the decree of the Supreme Court taken by William Brewster alone.

It is manifest that the other defendants, if they claimed under Brewster, were equally interested with him in receiving the demand of Wakefield, and the judgment or decree is against all, foreclosing them from any equity of redemption.

Two preliminary questions arise on the face of this record:

First. Can the case be brought to this court on appeal?

Second. Can Brewster alone take the appeal, and without making the other defendants parties?

As to the first: this is a final judgment in a civil action other than a case in equity or of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction and as such, is, by statute, the subject of a writ of error.

Act 24th Sept., 1789, sec. 22; 1 Stat., 83; 3d March, 1803, sec. 2; 2 Stat., 244.

Courts of equity are distinct in their forms and modes of proceeding, as well as their jurisdiction, from courts of common law, and they are peculiarly placed under the direct control of this court; with this limitation they are understood to be governed by the principal usages and rules of the English Court of Chancery at the time of the Revolution.

See 1 Stat., 276; 4 Stat., 278; 5 Stat., 499; Vattier v. Hinde, 7 Pet., 274.

Their jurisdiction, rules of decision and remedies, are the same in all the States.

Boyle v. Zacharie, 6 Pet., 658; Neves v. Scott, 13 How., 268.

From any other court except a court of equity or admiralty jurisdiction, a case can be brought to this court by writ of error only.

The San Pedro, 2 Wheat., 132; McCollum v. Eager, 2 How., 61; Parish v. Ellis, 16 Pet., 451.

As to the second question: it is a case in which there are several defendants claiming in the same right immediately or derivatively, against whom the same joint decree was passed, finally settling their rights, and the appeal is prayed by one only.

An appeal will not lie in such a case by one.

Owings v. Kincannon, 7 Pet., 399; Todd v. Daniels, 16 Pet., 521.

It is submitted that the case ought to be dismissed.

If the case is properly before this court, the points following will be relied on by the defendant in error upon its merits:

First. The rate of interest having been agreed on by the parties and reduced to writing, the contract is authorized by the statute.

Rev. Stat. Minn., p. 155, ch. 35.

Second. The contract being in writing, it is the province of the court to interpret and carry it into effect, according to the intentions of the parties.

See cases and authorities in defendant's brief in the record, to wit: Story, Cont., p. 556, sec. 633, 634; 7 Barb. S. C., 560; Chit. Cont., 74, 7 Am. Ed.

Third. If the terms are ambiguous or the intention is doubtful, they are to be taken most strongly against the promisor.

The maxim "verba chartarum fortius accipiuntur contra proferentem" (Co. Litt. 36, a) is as applicable to contracts not under seal, as to those of greater solemnity.

Mayer v. Isaac, 6 Mees. & W., 612; Hargreave v. Smee, 6 Bing., 248; Stevens v. Pell, 2 Cromp. & M., 710; Edis v. Bury, 6 B. & C., 433.

Fourth. This is an express contract for the use of money. The terms import a continuance of the same rate for its detention.

1. It uses the word "interest;" "interest from date."

These words have a definite signification. They show that it was made with reference to an understood compensation, the right to which would continue until payment of the principal sum with all the accumulated interest, or until judgment recovered. Nor could the promisor have paid the debts of either of them, before the appointed time, so as to stop the interest; for the time is a part of the contract and of the consideration on which the money was lent, and was made so for the benefit of the creditor.

Ellis v. Craig, 7 Johns. Ch., 7.

2. The interest is to run from the date of the note in one case, at the rate of twenty per cent. per annum; in the other, at the rate of two per cent. per month. Language could with difficulty be found more clearly to import that the parties contemplated the possibility of the non-payment of the debts at their maturity, and intended, at that event, to fix the rate of interest to be allowed and paid for its detention.

Fifth. It is to be construed as every other contract, to make compensation for the use of another man's property. The hire of labor, the rent of a house or machinery, stand on the same principle. If there is no contract, the owner is entitled to recover whatever the jury may find he should reasonably receive. But if there is a contract for a definite period at a certain rate, the relation of the parties continues unchanged—the rate of compensation likewise continues. So here, the hire of this money and the rate of compensation being fixed by agreement, the rate must continue so long as the money is detained in the use or employment of the borrower. The statute does not come to the relief of the party who has made his own law.

It is therefore submitted, that there is no error in the decree of the court below.

Mr. Chief Justice Taney delivered the opinion of the court:

This case comes before the court upon appeal from the judgment of the Supreme Court of the Territory of Minnesota, before its admission into the Union as a State.

It appears that a suit was instituted in the District Court, in the County of Ramsey, by Wakefield, the appellee, against the appellant and others, in order to foreclose a mortgage made by the said Brewster and his wife, of certain lands, to secure the payment of three promissory notes mentioned in the proceedings. The notes are not set out in full in the transcript, but are stated by the complainant in his petition, or bill of complaint, to have been all given by Brewster on the 11th of July, 1854, whereby, in one of them, he promised to pay, twelve months after the date thereof, to the order of Wakefield, the appellee, the sum of $5,583.25, with interest thereon at the rate of twenty per cent. per annum from the date thereof, for value received; and in another, promised to pay to the order of the said Wakefield the further sum of $2,000, twelve months after the date thereof, with interest thereon at the rate of two per cent. per month from the date; and by a third one, promised to pay to the order of the said Wakefield, six months after date, the further sum of $1,000, with interest at the rate of two per cent. per month. This last mentioned note is admitted to have been paid, and these proceedings were instituted to recover the principal and interest due on the first two.

No defense appears to have been made by the appellant, and the notes were admitted to be due. But when the court was about to pass its decree for the sale of the mortgaged premises, and ascertain and determine the sum due, the appellant, by his counsel, appeared and objected to the allowance of more than the legal rate of interest (seven per cent.) after the notes became due and payable. Wakefield, on the contrary, claimed that interest should be allowed at the rate mentioned in the notes, up to the time of judgment or decree for the sale. And of this opinion was the court, and by its decree, dated June 20th, 1855, adjudged that the sum of $10,670.77 was then due and owing for principal and interest on the said two notes, and ordered the mortgaged premises, or so much thereof as might be necessary, to be sold to raise that sum.

This decree or judgment was carried by writ of error, according to the practice in the Territory before the Supreme Territorial Court; and was there, on the 29th of January, 1857, affirmed, with ten per cent. damages, and also legal interest on the sum awarded by the district court, amounting altogether to the sum of $12,538.09. For the payment of that amount, with costs, the mortgaged premises were ordered to be sold.

From this last mentioned decision an appeal was taken to this court.

There is no question as to the validity of the notes or mortgage; and it is admitted that no part of the debt has been paid. The question in controversy between the parties, is whether, after the day specified for the payment of the notes, the interest is to be calculated at the rates therein mentioned, or according to the rate established by law, when there is no written contract on the subject between the parties. The question depends upon the construction of a statute of the Territory, which is in the following words:

"Sec. 1. Any rate of interest agreed upon by the parties in contract, specifying the same in writing, shall be legal and valid.

Sec. 2. When no rate of interest is agreed upon or specified in a note or other contract, seven per cent. per annum shall be the legal rate."

Now, the notes which formed the written contracts between the parties, as we have already said, are not set out in full in the record. We must take them, therefore, as they are described by the complainant, as his description is not disputed by the appellant; and according to that statement, the written stipulation as to interest, is interest from the date to the day specified for the payment. There is no stipulation in relation to interest, after the notes become due, in case the debtor should fail to pay them; and if the right to interest depended altogether on contract, and was not given by law in a case of this kind, the appellee would be entitled to no interest whatever after the day of payment.

The contract being entirely silent as to interest, if the notes should not be punctually paid, the creditor is entitled to interest after that time by operation of law, and not by any provision in the contract. And, in this view of the subject, we think the territorial courts committed an error in allowing, after the notes fell due, a higher rate of interest than that established by law, where there was no contract to regulate it. The cases of Macomber v. Dunham, 8 Wend., 550; United States Bank v. Chapin, 9 Wend., 471; and Ludwick v. Huntzinger, 5 Watts & S., 51, 60, were decided upon this principle, and, in the opinion of this court, correctly decided.

Nor is there anything in the character of this contract that should induce the court, by supposed intendment of the parties or doubtful inferences, to extend the stipulation for interest beyond the time specified in the written contract. The law of Minnesota has fixed seven per cent. per annum as a reasonable and fair compensation for the use of money; and where a party desires to exact, from the necessities of a borrower, more than three times as much as the Legislature deems reasonable and just, he must take care that the contract is so written, in plain and unambiguous terms; for, with such a claim, he must stand upon his bond.

A question has been raised by the appellee, as to the jurisdiction of this court. The laws of the Territory have abolished the distinction between cases at law and cases in equity, and both are blended in the same proceeding, without any regard to the forms and rules of proceeding, either at law or in equity, and a case cannot be removed from an inferior to an appellate territorial court, except by writ of error. And it is urged that this case, under the laws of Minnesota, ought to be regarded as a case at law, and removable to this court by writ of error only, and not by appeal.

But the case presented by the record is not a case at law, according to the meaning of those words, in courts which recognize the distinction between law and equity. On the contrary, it is a proceeding in the nature of a bill in equity to foreclose a mortgage, in which the facts as well as the law are to be decided by the court; and an appeal, and not a writ of error, was the appropriate mode of bringing the case before this court. The laws or practice of the Territory cannot regulate the process by which this court exercises its appellate power. Nor, indeed, can there be any such thing as a suit at law, as centradistinguished from a suit in equity, in the courts of the Territory, where legal rights and equitable rights must be blended together and prosecuted in the same suit, without any regard to the rules and practice of courts of common law or courts of equity.

Nor was it necessary that the parties who acquired liens on the mortgaged premises subsequent to the mortgage in question should join in the appeal. They were not necessary parties in a proceeding in equity to foreclose the mortgage, and none of them have appeared to the suit to contest the claim of Wakefield. And if it had been otherwise, yet the question in controversy here is the amount of the debt due from the appellant; and in the case of Forgay v. Conrad, 6 How., 201, and 26 How., 653, this court decided that a defendant in equity, whose interest is separate from that of the other defendants, may appeal without them.

We have no doubt of the jurisdiction of the court upon this appeal; and the judgment and decree of the supreme court of the territory must be reversed, for the error above mentioned.

Ex parte IN THE MATTER OF THE UNITED STATES, ON THE RELATION OF RICHARD R. CRAWFORD,

v.

HENRY ADDISON,

NOTE.—Mandamus, when will issue. See note to M'Cluny v. Silliman, 15 U. S. (2 Wheat.), 369.

Supreme Court has power to issue writs of mandamus—power of circuit courts to issue—will not issue, to control discretion of judge, but will, to require him to act—when writ of error operates as a supersedeas—when will lie upon judgment of circuit court awarding mandamus—that writ of error will be ineffectual, is not cause for mandamus.

Crawford was elected Mayor of Georgetown; and Addison, the opposing candidate, defendant, took possession of the office. The circuit court rendered judgment of ouster against said defendant; he sued out writ of error which operated as a supersedeas to the said judgment. Crawford, alleging that this court has no jurisdiction of the writ of error, applied for a mandamus commanding the circuit court to issue process for the execution of the judgment aforesaid. Held, that under the 13th sec. of the Judicary Act of 1789, the Supreme Court has "power to issue writs of mandamus, to any courts appointed or persons holding office under the United States."

The power of the circuit courts to issue the writ of mandamus, is confined exclusively to those cases in which it may be necessary to the exercise of their jurisdiction.

This court will not, by mandamus, direct a judge as to the exercise of his discretion; but it will require him to act.

The writ of error, to operate as a supersedeas, must be issued within ten days after the rendition of the judgment, and on security being given for a sum exceeding the amount of the judgment.

A writ of error will lie from this court upon judgments of the circuit courts awarding a peremptory mandamus, if the matter in controversy is of sufficient value.

The salary of the Mayor of Georgetown is $1,000 per annum; and if this be a matter of controversy, it settles the jurisdiction.

That the remedy by writ of error is inappropriate and ineffectual, as the office of the relator will expire about the time the writ of error is made returnable, may be a defect in the law; but we must administer the law as we find it.

The writ of error is the legal mode of revising the judgment of the circuit court in this case; and security having been given on the judgment, as the law requires, it is superseded.

Argued Jan. 6, 1860. Decided Feb. 20, 1860.

ON THE petition of Richard R. Crawford for a peremptory mandamus, or for a rule to show cause.

Upon the filing of the petition, and the transcript of the record therewith exhibited, a motion is submitted by Mr. Brent and Mr. Carlisle of counsel for the petitioner, that a peremptory mandamus be issued, directed to the Judges of the Circuit Court of the District of Columbia, commanding them to execute, by due process of law, the judgment of ouster, and for costs, which appears by the said record to have been rendered by the said court, in the matter of the United States, on the relation of the said Richard R. Crawford v. Henry Addison.

Or, in the alternative that a rule be granted to show cause, at a short day to be named therein, why a mandamus shall not issue as prayed.

The case is very fully stated by the court, the petition being there set out.

Messrs. R. J. Brent and J. M. Carlisle, for petitioner.

Messrs. J. H. Bradley and H. W. Davis, for respondent.

Mr. Justice McLean delivered the opinion of the court:

This a writ of error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Columbia.

Richard R. Crawford, of the City of Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, states that on the fourth Monday of February, 1857, in pursuance of an Act of Congress to amend the charter of Georgetown, approved the 31st May, 1830, and an Act to amend the same charter, approved the 11th August, 1856, by ballot, to elect some fit and proper person, having the qualifications required by law, to be Mayor of the Corporation of Georgetown, to continue in office two years, and until a successor shall be duly elected, said Crawford, being duty qualified, received the greatest number of legal votes, and was elected Mayor of the said Corporation, and took the oath as Mayor, and continued to discharge the duties for two years.

On the fourth Monday of February, 1859, another election was held for mayor, at which he received the greatest number of legal votes, and was by the judges declared to be duly elected; on which he presented himself in the presence of the two Boards of the common council of the said Corporation, and claimed that the oath should be administered; but the said two boards, alleging there was a mistake in the returns, and that there was in fact a majority of one vote in favor of Henry Addison, who was the opposing candidate, and to whom the oath of office was administeerd, and who took possession of the office, and continues to exercise the duties of the same.

And your petitioner represents, that at the ensuing term of the Circuit Court of the District of Columbia, being the court then and still having jurisdiction in the premises, an information, in nature of quo warranto, upon the relation of your petitioner, was filed in the said court by Robert Ould, Esq., the Attorney of the United States for the District of Columbia, on which due process was issued against the said Henry Addison, requiring him to answer before the said court by what warrant he claimed to exercise the said office of Mayor of the Corporation of Georgetown.

And the said Addison having pleaded to the said information, and certain replications having been made to said plea by the said Attorney of the United States, certain issues were joined thereon at the October Term, 1859, of the said court, and amongst others the issue to try whether the said Henry Addison had, as alleged by him in his plea, received the greatest number of legal votes for Mayor at the said last mentioned election; and upon the issue it was found by the jury, duly impaneled and sworn to try the same, that the said Henry Addison did not receive the greatest number of legal votes for mayor at the said election; and thereupon the said court rendered judgment of ouster against the said defendant, and for the costs of your petitioner, as relator in the in the said proceeding, to wit: on the —— day of December instant.

Whereupon, due process for the execution of the said judgment, to remove the defendant and for the recovery of the costs aforesaid, was duly prayed of the said court; but the said Henry Addison, pretending that the proceedings upon the said imformation in matter of law may be reviewed by this honorable court upon writ of error, sued out such writ of error, filed a bond, and caused a citation to be issued and served upon your petitioner, to appear and answer to the said writ of error on the return thereof, to wit: at the December Term, 1860. And thereupon the said circuit court, for the express and sole reason that such writ of error and bond operated as a supersedeas (which is expressed in their order in that behalf), refused to execute the said judgment, or to issue any process to remove the said defendant or for the recovery of the costs aforesaid.

Your petitioner is advised, and humbly submits, that this honorable court hath no jurisdiction of the matter of the said writ of error, and that the same must be dismissed on the return thereof. But, as hereinbefore stated, the said writ is not returnable until December Term, 1860, and the term of office for which your petitioner was elected as aforesaid will then be about to expire.

Your petitioner is advised that his only adequate and proper remedy is by a mandamus from this honorable court, directed to the Judges of the said Circuit Court of the District of Columbia, commanding them to issue process for the execution of the judgment aforesaid. And for that the transcript of record herewith filed plainly expresses on its face the sole cause for the refusal of such process, so as distinctly to present the whole matter of law for the consideration of the court, he prays that a peremptory mandamus may issue, or, in the alternative, that such interlocutory order may be passed to that end, as this court may direct.

Under the 13th secion of the Judiciary Act of 1789 (1 Stat. at L., 72), the Supreme Court has "power to issue writs of mandamus, in case warranted by the principles and usages of law, to any courts appointed of persons holding office under the United States." The power of the circuit courts to issue the writ of mandamus is confined exclusively to those cases in which it may be necessary to the exercise of their jurisdiction. Kendall v. United States, 37 U. S. (12 Pet.), 524.

On a mandamus, a superior court will never direct in what manner the discretion of an inferior tribunal shall be exercised; but they will, in a proper case, require the inferior court to decide. Life Insurance Co. v. Wilson, 8 Pet., 294. It has repeatedly been declared by this court that it will not, by mandamus, direct a judge as to the exercise of his discretion; but it will require him to act. 38 U. S. (13 Pet.), 279.

A mandamus is a remedy where there is no other appropriate relief, and it is only resorted to on extraordinary occasions.

The writ of error is a common law writ, and is almost as old as the common law itself. This writ, to operate as a supersedeas, must be issued within ten days after the rendition of the judgment, and on security being given for a sum exceeding the amount of the judgment. Where no supersedeas is required, security for the costs of the Supreme Court must be entered. So that, in these respects, the writ of error is said to be a writ of right, though regulated by statute.

The condition on the supersedeas bond is: "that the said Henry Addison shall prosecute the said writ of error to effect, and answer all damages and costs if he shall fail to make his plea good; then the above obligation to be void, otherwise to be and remain in full force and virtue."

In the Columbian Insurance Company v. Wheelright, 7 Wheat., 534, it was held that a writ of error will lie from this court upon the judgments of the circuit courts awarding a peremptory mandamus, if the matter in controversy is of sufficient value. But in that case, it did appear that the office of director of the insurance company, which was the matter in controversy, was of less value than $1,000 and that its value was to be ascertained by the salary paid; the court held it had no jurisdiction.

The weight of this authority is not lessened by the fact on which the question of jurisdiction turned. The salary of the Mayor of Georgetown was established by law at $1,000 per annum; and if this be the matter of controversy, it settles the jurisdiction.

But it is contended that a year's salary cannot be regarded as the amount in controversy, as the salary is paid monthly or quarterly, as may be most convenient to the mayor. The law regulates the pay of all salaried officers by the year, and the estimates are so appropriated in the reported bills. Any departure from this annual allowance would derange, more or less, the fiscal of a government or corporation.

But it is said that the remedy by writ of error is inappropriate and ineffectual, as the office of the relator will expire about the time the writ of error is made returnable. This may be a defect in the law, which the legislative power only can remove. A writ of error returnable instanter would give more speedy relief, and might be more satisfactory, but we must administer the law as we find it.

The bond and security given on the writ of error cannot be regarded as an idle ceremony, It was designed as an indemnity to the defendant in error should the plaintiff fail to prosecute with effect his writ of error.

We can entertain no doubt that the writ of error is the legal mode of revising the judgment of the circuit court in this case; and that security having been given on the judgment, as the law requires, it is superseded.

Dissenting, Mr. Justice Wayne and Mr. Justice Grier.

v.

THE STATE OF ARKANSAS, CHARLES B. BERTRAND ET AL.

(See S. C., 22 How., 193-214.)

State judgment as to title, when examinable—entry procured by fraud may be reviewed—Decision as to Statute of Limitations not reviewable—where evidence contradictory, verdict conclusive.

Under the 25th section of the Judiciary Act, it is not material whether the invalidity of a title was decreed in the State court upon a question of fact or of law.

The fact that the title was rejected in that court, authorizes this court to re-examine the decree.

The adjudication of the register and receiver, which authorized the entry of land, is subject to revision in the courts, on showing that the entry was obtained by fraud and false testimony as to settlement and cultivation.

The Act of Limitations of the State is a defense having no connection with the title, and this court cannot revise the decree below in this respect, under the 25th section of the Judiciary Act.

Where the evidence is contradictory on the question of fraud and imposition on the officers, this court will not overrule the finding of fact by the courts below.

Argued Jan. 18, 1860. Decided Feb. 20, 1860.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Arkansas.

The history of the case, and a sufficient statement of the facts, appear in the opinion of the court.

See, also, Lytle v. Arkansas, 9 How., 314; Lytle v. Arkansas, 17 Ark., 610, from which the present writ of error is prosecuted.

Of the elaborate arguments presented in this court, but little can be here given, except on the question of jurisdiction.

Messrs. J. H. Bradley, A. Fowler and J. Stillwell, for plaintiff in error:

It may be insisted that this court has no jurisdiction of the case.

The right set up by the plaintiffs in error arises under an Act of Congress, and the decision of the Supreme Court of Arkansas was against that right, consequently this court has jurisdiction of the case, without regard to the particular ground upon which the decree of the state court is based.

Cunningham v. Ashley, 14 How., 389; City of Mobile v. Emanuel, 1 How, 95; 14 How., 98.

The right grows out of an Act of Congress, and is sanctioned against all laws and judicial decisions of the States.

Owings v. Norwood, 5 Cranch, 344; Fisher v. Cockerell, 5 Pet., 257; Martin v. Hunter's Lessee, 1 Wheat.; 304, 322, 352.

The evidence for the defense was admitted for the purpose of impeaching the right claimed under the Act of Congress, and granted to them by the land officers acting under it; consequently the decision of the state court upon the effect of such evidence may be fully considered here, and the decree reversed or affirmed.

Mackay v. Dillon, 4 How., 447.

The power to revise and reverse a decision of a state court, depriving a party of his right to transfer his case from the state court to the circuit court of the United States for trial, has been exercised.

Gordon v. Longest, 16 Pet., 103.

In Neilson v. Lagow, 7 How., 775, the plaintiff claimed the land under an authority exercised by the Secretary of the Treasury in behalf of the United States, and the decision was against the validity of the authority thus exercised, and on motion to dismiss, Chief Justice Taney said: "We think it is evidently one of the cases prescribed for in the 25th section of the Act of 1789."

In this case the decision was against the authority exercised by the Register and Receiver, subordinates of the Secretary of the Treasury, but under the same authority.

The jurisdiction exists wherever the laws of Congress and the acts of officers executing them in perfecting titles to public lands, have been drawn in question and construed by the Supreme Court of a State, and the decision is against the title set up under the laws of Congress and the authority exercised under them.

Cousin v. Blanc's Ex'r, 19 How., 207; McDonogh v. Millaudon, 8 How., 704.

The plaintiffs in this case claim under the authority exercised under a statute of the United States, and a right set up under it, and the decision was against them. Garland v. Wynn, 20 How., 7, was similar to this in every respect, and the question was passed over without notice.

In order to give jurisdiction, it is sufficient if the record shows that it is clear, from the facts stated by just and necessary inference, that the question was made, and that the state court must, in order to have arrived at the judgment pronounced by it, have decided that question as indispensable to that judgment.

Crowell v. Randell, 10 Pet., 392; Wilson v. The Black Bird C. M. Co., 2 Pet., 250; Martin v. Hunter's Lessee, 1 Wheat., 355; Miller v. Nichols, 4 Wheat., 311; Williams v. Norris, 12 Wheat., 117.

The jurisdiction must be determined by reference to the record. And in doing so, the court will refer to the opinion of the state court, where it is made a part of the record by the laws of the State

Cousin v. Blanc's Exrs., 19 How., 207.

In this case there is no necessity in the first instance of looking behind the decree of the Supreme Court of Arkansas, to determine the ground of the decision; but if need be, we may look back to the decision of the Chancellor, whose decree was affirmed by the Supreme Court of Arkansas, and shall find that he overruled all the defenses set up, except the invalidity of the preemption claim of Cloyes.

The decision being against the right, the Supreme Court has jurisdiction to re-examine the case and determine, not whether the decision was right upon the particular ground, but whether the right was properly denied. The decree of the state court would not have been what it is, if there had not been a decision against the right set up by the plaintiffs; and this is all sufficient.

Williams v. Oliver, 12 How., 124; 3 Pet., 292, 302.

And the decision of the state court need not be confined exclusively and especially to the construction of the Treaty, Act of Congress, &c., in order to give jurisdiction.

Williams v. Oliver, 12 How., 124.

Points may arise growing out of and connected with the general question, and so blended with it as not to be separated, and therefore falling equally within the decision contemplated by the 25th section. The case of Smith v. The State of Maryland, 6 Cranch, 281; and Martin v. Hunter's Lessee, 1 Wheat., 305, 355, afford illustrations of this principle.

Here the record shows affirmatively that the decision was against the right set up and the authority of the land officers, excluding the idea that the decison was made upon the other defense set up by the defendants, such as purchasers for a valuable consideration without notice, statutes of limitation, lapse of time, &c.

And it follows, as a matter of course, that if the decisions of the state court upon that point was wrong, the decree must be reversed.

The effect of the decision of that court reversing the decree of the Supreme Court of Arkansas; the right of the defendants to question the validity of the preemption claim of Cloyes, and whether, if they have the right, they have done so by proper pleading, are the next questions presented. There are other questions which will be discussed, though it is not supposed the court will, under the circumstances, feel called upon to decide them.

The idea seemingly entertained by some of the counsel for the defense in this case, and also by the Chancellor, that the former decree in this case by the Supreme Court of the United States is not the law of the case "—to govern it absolutely, as far as that decree went—because amendments and not parties were subsequently made, is at least a novel one.

The issue is substantially the same now as presented before; and such changes as have been made only present the complainant's rights much more clearly and strongly, and render the former adjudication much more emphatically "the law of the case," and more conclusive now than it could possibly have been without such change.

And the law in all cases is well settled and without any exception, that an adjudication of the Supreme Court of the United States is conclusive down to the very point decided, and becomes unchangeably "the law of the case," and nothing behind that point can ever be opened or revived afterwards.

See Nelson v. Hubbard, 18 Ark., 256; Ex parte Story, 12 Pet., 339; Fortenberry v. Frazier, 5 Ark., 202; Sibbald v. The U. S., 12 Pet., 492; West v. Brashear, 14 Pet., 54; Porter v. Hanley, 10 Ark., 191; Boyce v. Grundy, 9 Pet., 200; Walker v. Walker, 7 Ark., 556; Pulaski Co. v. Lincoln, 13 Ark., 104; Rector v. Danley, 14 Ark., 307; Story v. Livingston, 18 Pet., 367.

In this case, then, what can be inquired into under that former decision, but the question of fraud and purchase bona fide without notice? And by the well understood principles of equity, we think both of these must be determined against the defense.

As a general principle of law, it is well settled, that where the matter adjudicated is by a court of peculiar and exclusive jurisdiction, and where no appeal is allowed or revising power given by law, such adjudication is final and conclusive upon all the other courts and persons, until successfully impeached upon the ground of fraud.

Lessee of Rhoades v. Selin, 4 Wash. C. C., 721; Wilcox v. Jackson, 13 Pet., 511; Gelston v. Hoyt, 1 Johns. Ch., 546; Voorhees v. U. S. Bank, 10 Pet., 478; U. S. v. Arredondo, 6 Pet., 729; Blount v. Darrach, 4 Wash. C. C., 650; Foley v. Harrison, 15 How., 448; Borden v. The State, 11 Ark., 547.

And embraced within this general principle are the adjudications of the register and receiver of the land offices, as to the facts of possession, cultivation and other acts essential to the validity of the preemptor's right—questions directly submitted to them and adjudicated upon and within their exclusive jurisdiction.

See Wilcox v. Jackson, 13 Pet., 511; Nick's

And is binding on a court of chancery, as well as other courts.

16 Ill., 557.

Even a surveyor appointed by Act of Congress to make a partition of lands, becomes in that matter virtually a judge; and his act is final and conclusive in the absence of fraud.

See Haydel v. Dufresne, 17 How., 30.

Such judgments or any other final judgments, may be impeached in equity for fraud; but never on account of irregularity.

See Shottenkirk v. Wheeler, 3 Johns. Ch., 275.

And however grossly ignorant such a court or officer may be of the duties confided or regardless of the right of parties, yet this cannot affect the jurisdiction or impair the judgment, in the absence of fraud.

See Woodruff v. Cook, 2 Edw. Ch., 261.

We insist, as to the attempted imputation of fraud made by wholesale in many of the answers—that none of them occupy a position to give them the right in law or equity, to avail themselves of the charge even were it as true as it is untrue.

None of them had any interest in the land or any claim to it, of any sort at the time that the grant of the preemption was obtained; and even were it done by fraud, what right had any of them to complain? Was any one of them injured by it? It was a question between Cloyes and the United States, alone.

Fraud must be accompanied by injury in order to entitle a party to redress. The party seeking relief must be damaged by the alleged act.

Messrs. S. H. Hempstead, A. Pike and Geo. C. Watkins, for defendants in error:

In Miller v. Kerr, 7 Wheat., 1, the court held that where an equitable title was asserted, against a patent, the equitable title was first open to examination, and the complainant failed because his supposed prior equity was founded upon a mistake. So in this case when before the court in 9 How., it was held that the alleged equity acting on the offensive, might be impeached on the ground of fraud or unfairness. In Garland v. Wynn, 20 How., 1, where the equitable claimant assailed a title which had ripened into a patent, it was announced as the settled doctrine of the court, and which a fortiori would apply as against the alleged equity of a complainant asserting an imperfect title, "that where several parties set up conflicting claims to property with which a special tribunal may deal, as between one party and the government, regardless of the rights of others, the latter may come into the ordinary courts of justice and litigate the conflicting claims." That was a writ of error from a state court, and those are the ordinary courts of justice referred to.

The distinct question was presented, whether the court below had authority or jurisdiction to set aside or correct the decision of a register and receiver, on the ground that the witnesses were induced to swear ignorantly, and what was untrue as to the locality of the cultivation, and upon which depended the existence and validity of the pre-emption claimed, and which the land officers, acting upon that false testimony, had adjudicated and allowed.

The Supreme Court of Arkansas, in their decision in Lytle v. Arkansas, 17 Ark., 610 (from which the present writ of error is prosecuted), yielded implicit obedience to the opinion of this court in 9 How., as the law of the case.

The rights of a bona fide preemptor are fully recognized, but in the new aspect of the case, that court was called upon to decide whether the preemption claim was bona fide. The testimony was again reviewed and carefully considered.

The judgment in the Supreme Court was, "that the preemption claim set up in the bill was and is fraudulent in fact and in law, and there is no error in the proceedings and decree of said chancery court in this cause.

The proposition contended for is, that on a writ of error from a state court, where no question of law is presented, it is not the province or duty of this court to review the decision of an issue of fact merely, made by the court below with its superior facilities for determining the fact, according to the weight or credibility of testimony.

By the Judiciary Act of 1789, appeals were only allowed from the district to the circuit courts. There was no mode of bringing up any case to this court, except by writ of error.

Blaine v. Ship Carter, 4 Dall., 22.

The terms "appeal" and "writ of error," though used by the Act, were not confounded. An appeal is a civil law proceeding which removes the cause entirely, and is a rehearing on the facts as well as the law.

Wiscart v. Dauchy, 3 Dall., 321.

The great object of the Judicary Act of 1789, was to confine the appellate jurisdiction of this court to the examination and decision of questions of law, on errors assigned and made to appear upon the record. By section 19, the circuit courts in equity were required to cause the facts upon which they founded their decree to appear upon the record, either by a statement of such facts by the parties, or by the court where they could not agree, being analogous to a special verdict or case stated in trials at law. This regulation appears to have been regarded with some jealousy, according to the report of the case last cited, Wiscart v. Dauchy, as conferring a power on the circuit courts in chancery, which might be abused by the determination of facts contrary to or not warranted by the evidence. That feeling probably led to the passage of the Act of March 3, 1803, providing for an appeal in chancery causes from the circuit courts to this court, and that on such appeal the transcript should contain all the pleadings, depositions and documentary evidence in the cause.

The policy of the Act of 1808, as apparent from its history, was to enable this court to review and correct any gross error of the circuit courts, in determining questions of fact against or without evidence. The principle pervading the exercise of appellate jurisdiction by this court, is only partially innovated upon. We apprehend that no appeal in chancery was ever decided by this court, without deference to the opinion of the circuit court which tried the cause upon the facts which the evidence conduced to establish; while on the other hand, their errors or misconstructions of law are freely examined.

In all the cases, from Parsons v. Bedford, 3 Pet., 444; to Minor v. Tillotson, 2 How., 392, and Fenn v. Holme, 21 How., 481, this court has perseveringly resisted all efforts to engraft upon the federal judiciary the civil law practice, or the mongrel systems of Texas and other new States.

But in any view of it, the Act of 1808 does not apply to writs of error from the state court, under the 25th section of the Judiciary Act. And according to the construction repeatedly given by this court, touching the distinction between an appeal and a writ of error, where those terms are used in Acts of Congress, nothing is examinable on a writ of error by this court, as one of appellate jurisdiction, except questions of error in law. When this cause was tried in 9 Howard, the facts confessed by the demurrer lay in a nut shell. The decision is interesting and important as an affirmance of the doctrine that an inchoate right of preemption vested under law, is not defeated by a subsequent Act of Congress granting the land. But on this record, suppose the court were to enter upon a re-examination of facts, and after a patient and laborious collation of the testimony, and without, indeed, those aids attendant upon the court which tried the cause, and breathing the atmosphere of the witnesses, could instinctively appreciate their worthy credibility, should arrive at the conclusion that the claim of Cloyes was unfounded in fact, and fraudulent; the decision, settling no question of law, would not be worthy of a place in the reports. We take it that amid all changes and fluctuations in the jurisprudence of the States, the principle governing the appellate jurisdiction of this court should remain unchanged; so that, whatever mode of trial may be provided in the local tribunals, and to which the parties have resorted, the ascertainment of a fact according to the mode provided, is to be regarded as final and conclusive of the fact.

We venture to submit that it is only according to a technical view of the Judiciary Act that this court has any jurisdiction in the premises. It is true that because the plaintiffs in error claim under a law of Congress, and the decision is against the right claimed, they come literally within the terms of the 25th section, so that the court, according to its practice, might refuse to entertain a motion to dismiss for want of jurisdiction, and out of abundant caution, reserve the question until the final judgment. Doubtless, if the plaintiffs in error can put their finger on any error or misconstruction of law by the Chancellor in the determination of the fact, or in other words can show that he regarded those acts of the claimant as fraudulent, which, in the opinion of this court and according to its construction of the law, were not so; then the decision of the court below would be examined for that error. But apart from the consideration of all other elements of mala fides, one essential fact ascertained and decided by the court below, is that Cloyes did not cultivate in 1829. While that determination stands, there never was any right, and consequently there is no jurisdiction.

Mr. Justice Catron delivered the opinion of the court:

The first question presented on the record, is whether this court has jurisdiction to examine and revise the decision of the Supreme Court of Arkansas by writ of error, under the 25th section of the Judiciary Act. The question arises on the following facts:

Nathan Cloyes, ancestor of the principal complainants, entered as an occupant, at a Land Office in Arkansas, a fractional quarter section of land, in 1834, under the preemption Acts of 1830 (4 Stat. at L., 420) and 1832 (4 Stat. at L., 603). The fraction adjoined the Village of Little Rock on its eastern side, and was for twenty-nine acres. The same land had been patented in 1833 by the United States to John Pope, Governor of the Territory of Arkansas, to be appropriated to the erection of public buildings for said Territory. The heirs of Cloyes claimed to have an earlier equity, by force of their preemption right, than that of the Governor of Arkansas.

They filed their bill in equity in the proper state court, to enforce this equity. That bill contained appropriate allegations to exhibit an equitable title in the plaintiffs, and the opposing right of the patentee, and thus to enable the courts to compare them. Some of the defendants demurred to the bill; others answered, denying the facts of the settlement and cultivation, and pleading the bona fides of their purchase and the Statute of Limitations.

The courts of Arkansas dismissed the bill on the demurrer; which judgment was reversed in this court, and the cause remanded for further proceedings. Lytle v. Arkansas, 9 How., 314. It was prepared for hearing a second time, and the courts of Arkansas have again dismissed the bill, and the cause is a second time before us.

The cause was fully heard on its merits below; and the claim of Cloyes rejected, on the ground that he obtained his entry by fraud in fact and fraud in law; and the question is, can we take jurisdiction, and reform this general decree. It rejected the title of Cloyes; and in our opinion, it is not material whether the invalidity of the title was decreed in the Supreme Court of Arkansas upon a question of fact or of law. The fact that the title was rejected in the court authorizes this court to re-examine the decree. 14 Pet., 360.

The decision in the Supreme Court of Arkansas drew in question an authority exercised under the United States, to wit: that of admitting Cloyes to make his entry; and the decision was against its validity, and overthrew his title, and is, therefore, subject to be re-examined, and reversed or affirmed in this court, on all the pleadings and proofs which immediately respect the question of the proper exercise of authority by the officers administering the sale of the public lands on the part of the United States.

In the case of Martin v. Hunter, 1 Wheat., 352, the foregoing construction of the 25th section of the Judiciary Act of 1789 was recognized, and has been followed since, in the cases of Chouteau v. Eckhart, 2 How., 372; Cunningham v. Ashley, 14 How., 377; Garland v. Wynn, 20 How., 8, and other cases.

Another preliminary question is presented on this record, namely: whether the adjudication of the Register and Receiver, which authorized Cloyes' heirs to enter the land, is subject to revision in the courts of justice, on proof, showing that the entry was obtained by fraud and the imposition of false testimony on those officers, as to settlement and cultivation. We deem this question too well settled in the affirmative for discussion. It was so treated in the case of Cunningham v. Ashley, 14 How., 377; again in Barnard v. Ashley, 18 How., 43; and conclusively in the case of Garland v. Wynn, 20 How., 8.

The next question is, how far we can re-examine the proceedings in the state courts.

In their answers, the respondents rely on the Act of Limitations of the State of Arkansas for protection. As this is a defense having no connection with the title of Cloyes, this court cannot revise the decree below in this respect, under the 25th section of the Judiciary Act (1 Stat. at L., 72).

Many of the defendants also relied in their answers on the fact that they were bona fide purchasers of the lots of land they are sued for, and therefore no decree can be made here to oust them of their possessions. The state courts found that a number of the respondents were purchasers without notice of Cloyes' claim, and entitled to protection as bona fide purchasers, according to the rules acted on by courts of equity. With this portion of the decree we have no power to interfere, as the defense set up is within the restriction found in the concluding part of the 25th section, which declares "that no other error shall be assigned or regarded by this court as a ground of reversal, than such as immediately respects the beforementioned questions of validity or construction of the Constitution, treaties, statutes, commissions, or authorities in dispute." Mr. Justice Story comments on the foregoing restraining clause, in the case of Martin v. Hunter, 1 Wheat., 358, which construction we need not repeat.

Whether Cloyes imposed on the register and receiver by false affidavits, when he made proof of cultivation in 1829, and residence on the land in dispute on the 29th of May, 1830, is the remaining question to be examined. He made oath (23d April, 1831) that he did live on said tract of land in the year 1829, and had done so since the year 1826. Being interrogated by the Register, he stated: I had a vegetable garden, perhaps to the extent of an acre, and raised vegetables of different kinds, and corn for roasting ears; and I lived in a comfortable dwelling, east of the Quapaw line on the before mentioned fraction. Being asked, did you continue to reside, and cultivate your garden aforesaid, on the before named fraction, until the 29th of May, 1830? he answers: "I did; and have continued to do so until this time."

John Saylor deposed on behalf of Cloyes in effect to the same facts, but in general terms. Nathan W. Maynor and Elliott Bursey swore that the affidavit of Saylor was true. On the truth or falsehood of these depositions the cause depends.

In opposition to these affidavits, it is proved, beyond dispute, that Cloyes and his family resided at a house, for a part of the year 1828, occupied afterwards by Doctor Liser. In the latter part of 1828, they removed from that place to some log cabins, situate on the lots afterwards occupied by John Hutt, and where the Governor of Arkansas resided in 1851, when the witnesses deposed. Both places were west of the Quapaw line—the cabins standing probably one hundred yards west of the line, and which line was the western boundary of the fractional quarter section in dispute. Cloyes resided at these cabins when he swore at Batesville, before the Register; and continued to reside there till the time of his death, which occurred shortly after his return from Batesville, say in May or June, 1831, and his widow and children continued to reside at the same cabins for several years after his death.

Cloyes was by trade a tinner, and in December, 1826, rented of William Russell a small house, constructed of slabs set upright, in which he carried on his business of a tin-plate worker. He covenanted to keep and retain possession for Russell of this shop against all persons, and not to leave the house unoccupied, and to pay Russell $2 per month rent, and surrender the house to Russel or his authorized agent at any time required by the lessor.

Under this lease, Cloyes occupied the house until the 19th day of June, 1828, when he took a lease from Chester Ashley for the same, and also for a garden. He covenanted to pay Ashley $1 per month rent; to put and keep the building in repair; to keep and retain possession of the same, until delivered back to said Ashley by mutual consent, either party having a right to terminate the lease on one month's notice. The house and garden were rented by the month.

Under this lease, Cloyes occupied the house, as a tin-shop, to the time of his death. Both the leases state that the shop was east of the Quapaw line, and on the public lands.

This slab tenement was built by Moses Austin, about 1820. On leaving Little Rock, he sold it to Dr. Matthew Cunningham; it passed through several hands, till it was finally owned by Col. Ashley. Buildings and cultivated portions of the public lands were protected by the local laws of the Arkansas Tertory; either ejectment or trespass could have been maintained by Ashley against Cloyes to recover the premises, nor could an objection be raised by anyone, except the United States, to these transfers of possession—neither could Cloyes be heard to disavow his landlord's title. He held possession for Ashley, and was subject to be turned out on a month's notice to quit.

Cunningham and other witnesses depose that the shop rented to Cloyes stood west of the Quapaw line. It however appears from actual survey, that it was on the section line, which ran through the house, taking its southeast corner on the east side, but leaving the greater part of the shop west of the line.

Another pertinent circumstance is, that when Cloyes heard the Preemption Law of 1830 (4 Stat. at L., 420) was about to pass, or had passed (it is uncertain which, from the evidence), he removed his wife and children, with some articles of necessary furniture, to the tinner's shop, from his residence at the Hutt place, and kept his family at the shop for a few months, and then they returned to their established home. This contrivance was probably resorted to at the instance of Benjamin Desha, who had agreed with Cloyes to pay into the Land Office the purchase money, and all incidental expenses, to obtain a title from the Government for an interest of one half of the land. These evasions were mere attempts to defraud the law, and to furnish some foundation of the necessary affidavits to support his preemption claim at the Land Office.

On this aspect of the case, the question arises whether Cloyes' possession as lessee and tenant of Ashley, occupying a shop as a mechanic, the corner of which accidentally obtruded over the section line, upon the public land, and who was subject to removal by his landlord each month, was "a settlement" on the public lands, within the true intent and meaning of the Act of May 29th, 1830, 4 Stat. at L., 420.

That Cloyes never contemplated seeking a home on the public lands as a cultivator of the soil, is manifest from the proof; he worked at his trade, when he worked at all (say the witnesses), and followed no other avocation. Our opinion is, that the affidavits, on which the occupant entry was founded, were untrue in fact, and a fraud on the Register and Receiver; and that Cloyes had no bona fide possession as tenant of the tinner's shop, within the true meaning of the Act of 1830.

We are also of opinion, that the affidavits are disproved, as respects the fact of cultivation in 1829. There was no garden cultivated in that year, adjoining or near to the shop. To say the least, it is quite doubtful whether there was such cultivation east of the Quapaw line; and the state courts having found that there was none, it is our duty to abide by their finding, unless we could ascertain from the proof that they were mistaken, which we cannot do, our impressions being to the contrary.

The question of cultivation in May, 1830, depended on parol evidence of witnesses. The judges below knew them; they decided on the spot, with all the localities before them; and as the evidence is contradictory, it would be contrary to precedent for this court to overrule the finding of a mere fact by the courts below.

On the several grounds stated, we order that the decree of the Supreme Court of Arkansas be affirmed, with costs.

Dissenting, Mr. Justice McLean and Mr. Justice Clifford.

Mr. Justice McLean, dissenting.

I dissent from the opinion of the court, as now expressed, and shall refer to the former opinion, to show the nature of the case:

"After the refusal of the Receiver to receive payment for the land claimed, an Act was passed, 14th July, 1832, 4 Stat. at L., 603, continuing the Act of the 29th May, 1830, 4 Stat. at L., 420, and which specially provided that those who had not been enabled to enter the land, the preemption right of which they claimed, within the time limited, in consequence of the public surveys not having been made and returned, should have the right to enter such lands, on the same conditions in every respect as prescribed in said Act, within one year after the surveys shall be made and returned. And this Act was in full force before Governor Pope selected said lands. That the public surveys of the above fractional sections were made and perfected on or about the 1st of December, 1833, and returned to the Land Office the beginning of the year 1834. On the 5th of March, 1834, the complainant paid into the Land Office the sum of $135.76¼, in full for the above named quarter section."

That a certificate was granted for the same, "on which the Receiver indorsed, that the northwest fractional quarter section two was a part of the location made by Governor Pope in selecting 1,000 acres, adjoining the Town of Little Rock, granted by Congress to raise a fund for building a courthouse and jail for the Territory; and that the indorsement was made by direction of the Commissioner of the General Land Office." "That the Register of the Land Office would not permit the said fractional quarter sections to be entered."

It appeared that "the patentees in both of said patents, at the time of their application to enter the lands, had both constructive and actual notice of the right of Cloyes, and that the present owners of any part of these lands had also notice of the right of the complainants."

In his dissenting opinion, Judge Catron says: "The proof of occupancy and cultivation was made in April, 1831, under the Act of 1830, pursuant to an instruction from the Commissioner of the General Land Office having reference to that Act. The Act itself, the instruction under its authority, and the proofs taken according to the instruction, expired and came to an end on the 29th May, 1831. After that time, the matter stood as if neither had ever existed; nor had Cloyes more claim to enter from May 29, 1831, to July, 1832, than any other villager in Little Rock."

Now, although it may be true that, until the Act of 1832 had passed, the Act of 1830 having expired, the preemptive right of Cloyes could not be perfected, yet the policy of the law was, where vested rights had accrued, which, by reason of delays in the completion of surveys, could not be carried out, the Government gave relief by extending the law. And the inchoate right was secured by the policy of the Government. It is, therefore, not strictly accurate to say, the party entering a preemption has no right. He has a right, recognized by the Government, by which he is enabled to perfect his right; and under such circumstances, no new entry could interfere with a prior one, though imperfect.

This court say, the proof of the preemption right of Cloyes being entirely satisfactory to the land officers, under the Act of 1830, there was no necessity of opening and receiving additional proof under any of the subsequent laws. The Act of 1830 having expired, all rights under it were saved by the subsequent acts. No steps which had been taken were required again to be taken.

"Did the location of Governor Pope, under the Act of Congress, affect the claim of Cloyes? On the 15th of June, 1832, one thousand acres of land were granted, adjoining the Town of Little Rock, to the Territory of Arkansas, to be located by the Governor. This selection was not made until the 30th of January, 1833. Before the grant was made by Congress of this tract, the right of Cloyes to a preemption had not only accrued, under the provisions of the Act of 1830, but he had proved his right, under the law, to the satisfaction of the register and Receiver of the Land Office. He had, in fact, done everything he could do to perfect this right. No fault or negligence can be charged to him."

"By the grant to Arkansas, Congress could not have intended to impair vested rights. The grants of the thousand acres and of the other tracts must be so construed as not to interfere with the preemption of Cloyes."

From the citations above made in the original opinion in this case, the following facts and principles of law are too clear to admit of doubt by anyone:

1. That Cloyes' preemption to fractional quarter section No. 2 was clearly established, by the judgment of the land officers and of this court.

2. That the location of Governor Pope, being subsequent to the right of Cloyes, could not affect, under the circumstances, that right, and that the conveyance was subject to it. This appears by the certificate of the Land Office, by the uniform action of the Government in all such cases, and the good faith which has characterized the action of Government, in protecting preemption rights, by giving time to protect such right, where the Government officers had failed in doing their duty. And in addition to these considerations, in the solemn declaration of this court, "that Congress could not have intended to impair vested rights." And the court say, "the grants of the thousand acres and of the other tracts must be so construed as not to interfere with the preemption of Cloyes."

This court say, "The Supreme Court of the State, in sustaining the demurrers and dismissing the bill, decided against the pre-emption right claimed by the representatives of Cloyes; and as we consider that a valid right as to the fractional quarter on which his improvement was made, the judgment of the state court was reversed."

"Now, the defendants demurred to the original bill, which they had a right to do, and rest the case on the demurrer's appearing on the face of the bill. But this court held Cloyes' right valid, and consequently reversed, on this head, the judgment of the state court. And the cause is transmitted to the state court for further proceeding before it, or as it shall direct on the defense set up in the answers of the defendants, that they are bona fide purchasers of the whole or parts of the fractional section in controversy, without notice, and that that court give leave to amend the pleadings on both sides, if requested, that the merits may be fully presented and proved, as equity shall require."

Now, it is perfectly clear that nothing was transmitted under the direction of this court to the state court, except the latter part of the sentence beginning, "and the cause is transmitted to that court," &c. And that part relates wholly to the inquiry whether the defendants were bona fide purchasers of the whole or parts of the fractional section in controversy. And for this purpose, leave was given to amend the pleadings.

If there is anything in this bill which afforded any pretense to the state court to open the pleadings, and examine any matters in the bill, except those specified in its close, it has escaped my notice.

It is said in the bill, "the Register and Receiver were constituted, by the Act, a tribunal to determine the right of those who claimed pre-emptions under it. From their decision no appeal was given. If, therefore, they acted within their powers, as sanctioned by the Commissioner, and within the law, the decision cannot be impeached on the ground of fraud or unfairness; it must be considered final."

The court here was speaking of its own powers of jurisdiction and investigation, and not the powers of any other tribunal. It was supposed that no superior court would willingly permit its judicial powers to be subverted, new parties made, new subjects introduced, and the whole proceedings reversed, at the will of an inferior jurisdiction, without the exercise of a controlling power.

This State Record of Arkansas seems to have been a prolific source of controversy, as its proportions have grown to about a thousand pages, not including briefs and statements of facts. It certainly must require some skill in legislation, to draw into the state court so large an amount of business under the laws of Congress. And it may become a matter of public concern, when such a mass of judicial action is not only thrown into the state court, but new rules and principles of action are liable to be sanctioned, in disregard of the laws of the United States.

Without any authority, it does appear that the judgment of the Supreme Court has been reversed by the Arkansas court, its proceedings modified in disregard of its own judgments and opinions clearly expressed, and new rules of proceedings instituted and carried out; and this under an authority given to the Arkansas court to ascertain whether certain purchases had been made bona fide.

Cloyes, in his lifetime, by his own affidavit, and the affidavits of others, made proof of his settlement on, and improvement of, the above fractional quarter, according to the provisions of the Act, to the satisfaction of the Register and Receiver of said land district, agreeably to the rules prescribed by the Commissioner of the General Land Office; on the 20th May, 1831, Hartwell Boswell, the Register, and John Redman, the Receiver, decided that the said Cloyes was entitled to the preemption right claimed. "On the same day, he applied to the Register to enter the northwest fractional quarter of section two, containing thirty acres and eighty-eight hundredths of an acre." But the Register very properly decided that Cloyes could only be permitted to enter the fraction on which his improvement was made.

The Commissioner of the General Land Office, and the Register and Receiver, declare they were satisfied with the proof made in the case; but the Supreme Court of Arkansas decided against the preemption right claimed by the representatives of Cloyes; and the Supreme Court of the United States say, "as we consider that a valid right as to the fractional quarter on which the improvement was made, the judgment of the state court is reversed."

How does this case now stand? It stands reversed upon our own records by the Supreme Court of Arkansas, and by no other power. A majority of this bench entered the judgment, as it now stands, in 1849. But, through the reforming process, of a record of a thousand pages, not including notes and statements of facts, it has become a formidable pile, enough to fill with despair the first claimant of the preemption right.

It is true, the cause was sent down for a special purpose, every word of which I now copy:

"And the cause is transmitted to that court (the Supreme Court of Arkansas) for further proceedings before it, or as it shall direct, on the defense set up in the answers of the defendants, that they are bona fide purchasers of the whole or parts of the fractional sections in controversy, without notice, and that that court give leave to amend the pleadings on both sides, if requested, that the merits of the case may be fully presented and proved, as equity shall require."

Several of the defendants alleged they were bona fide purchasers of a part or the whole of the fraction, without notice; and the object in sending the case down was to enable persons to show they were purchasers of this character. This did not necessarily involve fraud. And this embraces the whole subject of inquiry.

It would have been inconsistent for this court to say, we consider the preemption claim by the representatives of Cloyes as a valid right, as to the fractional quarter on which his improvement was made, and on that ground to reverse the judgment of the State court, and at the same time send the case down, open to the charge of fraud and every conceivable enormity. The object was to know who were purchasers without notice. That this was the intention of the Supreme Court, is palpable from the language of the entry.

The majority of the Supreme Court had full confidence in the validity of Cloyes' claim, and consequently they reversed the judgment of the state court, leaving the question open, whether the defendants were purchasers without notice. It may be that this entry would have protected all the purchasers.

From the nature of preemption rights, it is presumed, a person desirous of such a right is the first applicant. And the proof of such a right, if sustained by the Register and Receiver and the Commissioner of the Land Office, the proof required, is deemed satisfactory. It is only where a fortunate selection appears to be made, by the prospect of a city, or some great local advantage is anticipated, that a consent arises as to such a claim.

The officers of the Land Department, whose peculiar duty it was to protect the public rights, seemed to have discharged their duty to the satisfaction of the Government. This was also entirely satisfactory to a majority of the judges of this court, with the single exception, that, from the answers, it was probable that there may have been purchasers of this right without notice. And from the evidence introduced, it would seem to have been considered that anyone who at any time desired to purchase, considered himself as having a right to complain, although he had no means to make the purchase, or had no desire to make it.

If I mistake not, evidence was heard from witnesses from twenty to twenty-five years after the preemption right was sanctioned by the government. Such a course tends greatly to embarrass land titles under the General Land law. Every one knows that a man who endeavors to obtain a preemption, must, in the nature of things, be a man of limited means, and incapable of maintaining an expensive suit at law; and it has always appeared to me the true policy to limit those questions to the Land Department of the Government. At all events, they should be limited to the federal tribunals, where, it may be presumed, the Land Department will have an uniform administration.

As this case now stands, I think the judgment of the Arkansas Supreme Court must be reversed on two grounds:

1. Because it has reversed the judgment of this court, entered by a majority of the members at December Term, 1849, in these words: "The Supreme Court of the State, in sustaining the demurrers and dismissing the bill, decided against the preemption claimed by the representatives of Cloyes; and as we consider that a valid right, as to the fractional quarter on which his improvement was made, the judgment of the state court is reversed."

This is the judgment of this court as it now stands upon our docket. And,

2d. The judgment of the state court must be reversed, because it wholly disregarded the directions of this court in trying the issues transmitted to it.

JOSEPH KIMBRO, Plff. in Err.,

v.

CUTHBERT BULLITT, THOMAS D. MILLER AND LLOYD D. ADDISON, Partners in Trade, under the Name and Style of BULLITT, MILLER & CO.

(See S. C., 22 How., 256-269.)

One partner may draw bills in firm name—each partner has general authority—restrictions thereto, by private agreement between partners, do not affect the public—farming partnerships—what is a trading firm—firm, bound as drawers of bill, although the money is applied by one partner to unlawful purpose.

NOTE.—Liability of partners on bills and notes. Power of partner, as agent, to bind the firm as party to negotiable instruments, and otherwise. See note to LeRoy v. Johnson, 27 U. S. (2 Pet.), 186. How far partners are liable for each other's acts. See note to Nelson v. Hill, 46 U. S. (5 How.), 127.

One of several partners composing a trading firm, has power to draw bills of exchange in the name of the firm, unless restricted from so doing by the terms of the copartnership agreement.

Each partner of a trading firm is presumed to be intrusted by his copartners with a general authority in all the partnership affairs.

A restriction which, by agreement among the partners, is attempted to be imposed upon the authority which one partner possesses, as a general agent for the other, is operative only between the partners themselves.

It does not limit the authority as to third persons, who acquire rights by its exercise, unless they know that such restriction has been made.

Farming partnerships, when strictly confined to that purpose, are held to be within the exception to the above stated general rule.

Where farming was not sole business of the partners composing the firm, but they were also engaged in running a steam saw-mill, for manufacturing purposes; held, they were a trading firm.

Where bills were drawn by the firm, and were duly accepted and paid by the plaintiffs at maturity, on account of the firm, their right to recover the amount cannot be affected by the fact that one of the drawers applied the money to an unlawful purpose.

Submitted Feb. 8, 1860. Decided Feb. 20, 1860.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Middle District of Tennessee.

The case is stated by the court.

See, also, the opening statement in the abstract here given of Mr. Benjamin's argument.

No counsel appeared for plaintiff in error.

Mr. J. P. Benjamin, for defendants in error:

This is an action instituted in the Circuit Court for the Middle District of Tennessee, for the recovery of the amount of three bills of exchange drawn by Morgan McAffee and Dement Kimbro & Sons, to the order of, and indorsed by, Morgan McAffee, and alleged to have been accepted and paid by Bullitt, Miller & Co., the drawees, for the accommodation of the drawers.

The action was brought against Joseph Kimbro alone, the partner of the firm of Dement, Kimbro & Sons, and the grounds of defense as shown by the pleadings and bill of exceptions were two, viz.:

1. That Dement, the principal acting partner of the firm of Dement, Kimbro & Sons, had no power to draw the bills sued on.

2. That the bills of exchange were drawn and accepted for the purpose of raising money to be laid out in the purchase of slaves, to be imported from some other State or Territory of the United States, for sale into the State of Mississippi, which slaves were afterwards purchased with said money and imported as aforesaid into the State of Mississippi, and there sold according to the original intent, contrary to the form of the Statute of Mississippi, in that behalf made and provided.

On the trial the Judge charged the jury in the following words:

"The court charge the jury that Dement, the principal acting partner of the firm of Dement, Kimbro & Sons, had power to draw the bills given in evidence according to the proof adduced to them, if true; that if the bills were accepted and paid at maturity by the plaintiffs for said firm, the defendant Joseph Kimbro, was responsible; and it mattered nothing to the plaintiffs how the proceeds of the bills were disposed of, as this was a fact the plaintiffs could not know, and were not bound to prove."

The case comes before this court on exceptions taken to the above charge.

1. The charge that Dement had power to draw bills was correctly given, and is sustained by the proof.

From the foregoing testimony it is plain, that even inter se there was such a trading partnership as authorized the drawing of bills by one partner in the name of the firm; although the farming business might not authorize the exercise of such a power, running a saw-mill for two years necessarily required the purchase of the requisite stock of wood, and its resale as boards, planks, scantling, &c.

In mining partnerships and farming partnerships, it has been held that such powers are not vested in the partners, and the reason is, that their business is simply to sell the produce of the real estate, to make profits out of the soil by gathering its fruits; but wherever the business imports in its nature the necessity of buying and selling, the partnership is in its essence a trading partnership.

The general doctrine is admirably summed up in the opinion of Ch. J. Marshall, in the case of a manufacturing partnership.

Winship v. Bank of the U. S., 5 Pet., 529.

So it was held that one partner could bind the firm by a promissory note, where the partnership was for carrying on the business of farming and coopering.

McGregor v. Cleveland, 5 Wend., 475.

And although there be no partnership in real estate, the parties being tenants in common, yet if they are common tenants of timber land and do a lumber business, they are trading partners in the timber cut from the land.

Baker v. Wheeler, 8 Wend., 505; Coles v. Coles, 15 Johns., 160.

Partners in a steam saw-mill are bound by the note of the partnership given by some of the partners for partnership purposes.

Johnson v. Dutton, 27 Ala., 245.

And even where the partnership is limited, a note by one of the partners, in the name of the firm, is prima facie for the firm's account.

Holmes v. Porter, 39 Me., 157.

See, also, Story Part., sec. 102.

And it makes no difference as to the power of a partner to bind the firm, that the trade was a particular and limited trade.

Chit. Bills, 10th Am. ed., p. 44.

II. But independently of the question as to the powers of the partners in controversies inter se as regards the present case, where the holders of the bills are third persons ignorant of the special partnership agreement, the partnership is bound, because it was actually engaged in general trading, and Dement, who signed the bills, was the ostensible and principal business partner. It was in the light of a general trading partnership that this firm exhibited itself to the public. It was quite immaterial whether or not there existed a secret contract limiting his powers.

Sto. Part., sec. 111, 126, 130; Coll. Part., sec. 386; Gow. Part., pp. 52–55; 3 Kent Com., 40–45; Winship v. Bank U. S., 5 Pet., 529; Cargill v. Corby, 15 Mo., 425; Nichols v. Cheairs, 4 Sneed, (Tenn). 229; Frost v. Hanford, 1 E. D. Smith, 540.

And in the above case of Cargill v. Corby, the test of the power to draw bills and notes in the name of the firm is stated to be, whether the business was to "buy and sell." It is plain that the business of a steam saw-mill cannot be conducted without buying and selling.

III. Independently of the legal presumption that the bills drawn in the partnership name were for partnership account, the partnership articles show that negroes were necessary for their business, and that the parties promised to furnish them for carrying it on. p. 12.

The only remaining point to be considered, is the legality of the second charge of the judge —"that if the bills were accepted and paid at maturity by the plaintiffs for said firm, the defendant Joseph Kimbro, was responsible, and it mattered nothing to the plaintiffs how the proceeds of the bills were disposed of, as this was a fact the plaintiffs could not know, and were not bound to prove."

In point of law the instruction was clearly right.

The idea that money loaned or advanced cannot be recovered, because the borrower applies it to an unlawful purpose, was never count tnanced by any jurist.

It is true that ex turpi causa non oritur actio. But what is the contract now before the court? A contract for advancing money. There is nothing illegal in that. If the money was to be applied to an unlawful purpose the illegality was in the application, not in the borrowing. The contract for purchasing the slaves might be in contravention of law; and if so, would not be enforced in a court of justice; but on the ground now assumed by plaintiffs in error, it would be incumbent on the court to refuse to maintain an action for the price of goods sold, if the purchaser could prove that the vendor intended to raise money by the sale, to be applied to an unlawful purpose. The proposition will not bear an instant's examination. The whole doctrine on the subject was scrutinized, and the true principles governing it settled by this court in 1826, and the law is now too well established to require any further citation of authorities.

See Armstrong v. Toler, 11 Wheat., 258.

Mr. Justice Clifford, delivered the opinion of the court:

This case comes before the court upon a writ of error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Middle District of Tennessee. It was an action of assumpsit brought by the present defendants against the plaintiff in error, to recover the amount of three several bills of exchange, particularly described in the declaration. As exhibited in the transcript, the several bills of exchange bear date at Lexington, in the State of Mississippi, on the 2d day of April, 1853, and purport respectively to have been drawn and addressed to the original plaintiffs by one Morgan McAffee, and by Dement, Kimbro & Sons. They were each for the sum of $2,000, and were severally made payable to the order of the first named drawer, by whom also they were duly indorsed. Two of them were likewise indorsed with the firm name of the other drawers. At the time the bills of exchange were executed, the original defendant was a member of the firm of Dement, Kimbro & Sons; and it was conceded in the pleadings and at the trial, that the bills of exchange were drawn and negotiated by the senior partner of that firm. All the members of that partnership, except the defendant, were citizens of the State of Mississippi at the time the suit was commenced, and were residing out of the jurisdiction of the court; and for that reason, as alleged in the declaration, the other partners were not sued in this action. In the court below, the plaintiffs claimed to recover against the defendant, upon the ground that the firm, of which he was a member, were the drawers of the bills of exchange, and that they, the plaintiffs, had paid the amount, or the principal portion of the same, out of their own funds, as exceptors, for the accommodation of the drawers. Without attempting to give any very definite analysis of the several pleas filed by the defendant, it will be sufficient for the purposes of this investigation to state that he set up two distinct grounds of defense in answer to the claim of the plaintiffs:

1. To the merits of the claim he pleaded the general issue, and denied specially that he ever drew the bills of exchange described in the declaration, or that he ever authorized anyone to draw them in his name, or in the name of his firm.

2. For a further defense, he also alleged, in his fourth plea to the amended declaration, that the bills of exchange were drawn and indorsed by Dement, and accepted by the plaintiffs, for the purpose of raising money to be laid out in the purchase of slaves, to be imported from some other State or Territory of the United States, for sale, into the State of Mississippi, which slaves he alleged to be afterwards purchased with the money and imported into the State, and there sold, according to the original intent, contrary to the form of the statute of that State in such case made and provided. To that plea the plaintiffs replied, traversing the allegations of fact, and tendering an issue, which was duly joined. Some of the pleas resulted in issues of law, all of which were ruled in favor of the plaintiffs, and the defendants acquiesced in the rulings of the court.

Evidence was then introduced on both sides upon the issues involving the merits of the claim, and the court instructed the jury that Dement, the principal acting partner of the firm, had power to draw the bills given in evidence according to the proof adduced to them, if true; that if the bills were accepted and paid at maturity by the plaintiffs for the firm, the defendant was responsible, and it mattered nothing to the plaintiffs how the proceeds of the bills were disposed of, as that was a fact the plaintiffs could not know, and were not bound to prove.

Under the charge of the court, the jury returned their verdict in favor of the plaintiffs for the amount claimed, deducting certain admitted credits, according to the account exhibited in the transcript, and the defendant excepted to the instructions of the court. It is obvious, on the first reading of the instruction, that it contains two distinct propositions, and no doubt is entertained that both were intended to be controverted by the exceptions. In the first place, it affirms that the evidence adduced, if found to be true, was sufficient to show that the acting partner of the firm, of which the defendant was a member, had power to draw the bills of exchange described in the declaration. According to the proofs introduced by the plaintiffs, the firm commenced business at Lexington, in the State of Mississippi, in January, 1853, and the partnership was continued, without interruption, until the third day of October, of the same year, when it was terminated by the death of the senior partner. They also proved, by two witnesses, that the firm was engaged during that period in farming, carrying on a steam saw-mill, and in general trading. Both of these witnesses testified that the senior partner, who drew the bills of exchange in question, was the active business partner of the firm; and one of them added, that he did the principal trading, and borrowed money, and paid it back in the name of the firm.

Their partnership agreement was introduced by the defendant. It bears date on the 5th day of January, 1853; and the partnership was formed, as recited in the instrument, to continue for the term of two years, for the purpose of farming and of carrying on a steam saw-mill. By its terms, one third of the capital stock was to be furnished by the senior partner, one third by the defendant, and the remainder by his two sons. Those five persons constituted the firm, under the name and style before mentioned. And it was further stipulated that negroes or hands, stock, provisions, and all necessary utensils, should be furnished by the respective parties, according to their interest in the capital stock, and that they should defray the expenses of the copartnership and share its profits in the same proportions. They also designated the farm to be carried on, and stipulated that the steam saw mill should be located at such place as a majority of the partners in interest should determine.

After the partnership agreement was executed by the parties, it was deposited with a third person; and it appeared from his deposition, taken by the defendant, that it remained in his possession from that period to the time of his examination. In the same deposition, the witness testified that the firm, so far as he knew, had never been held out by the defendant as having any more extensive powers than those conferred by the partnership agreement.

Some attempt was made by the defendant to prove that it was the usage, in partnerships of this description, when money was wanted to carry on the business, and the several partners could not be consulted, for the managing partner to raise it on his own credit, and charge it to the partnership; but the proof was not sufficient to show any such general usage.

Such was the substance of the evidence on which the charge of the court was based, and we think it was of a character to justify that part of the instruction under consideration. Our reasons for that conclusion will now be briefly stated.

That one of several partners composing a trading firm has power to draw bills of exchange unless restricted from so doing by the terms of the copartnership agreement, is a proposition which, it is presumed, no one will dispute. Whenever there are written articles of agreement between the partners, their power and authority, inter se, are to be ascertained and regulated by the terms and conditions of the written stipulations. But, independently of any such stipulations, each partner possesses an equal and general power and authority, in behalf of the firm, to transact any business within the scope and objects of the partnership, and in the course of its trade and business.

Acts performed by one of the partners, in respect to the partnership concerns, and in the usual course of its business, differ in nothing, so far as their legal consequences are concerned, from those transactions in which they all concur; and for the reason, that, by the commercial law, each partner of a trading firm is presumed to be intrusted by his copartners with a general authority in all the partnership affairs. Accordingly, it was held, in Hawken v. Bourne, 8 Mees. & W., 710, that one partner, by virtue of the relation he bears to the firm, is constituted a general agent for another, as to all matters within the scope of the partnership dealings, and has conferred upon him, by virtue of that relation, all authorities necessary for carrying on the partnership, and all such as are usually exercised in the business in which they are engaged. Any restriction which, by agreement among the partners, is attempted to be imposed upon the authority which one partner possesses, as a general agent for the other, is operative only between the partners themselves, and does not limit the authority as to third persons, who acquire rights by its exercise, unless they know that such restrictions have been made.

Contracts made by one of several partners, in respect to matters not falling within the ordinary business, objects and scope of the partnership, are not binding on the other partners, and create no liability to third persons, who have no knowledge that the partner making the contract is acting in violation of his duties and obligations to the firm of which he is a member. But whenever credit is given to the firm, within the scope and objects of the partnership, and in the course of its trade and business, whether the partnership be of a general or limited nature, it will bind all the partners, notwithstanding any secret stipulations or reservations between themselves, which are unknown to those who give the credit. Harrison v. Jackson, 7 T. R., 207; Pinkney v. Hall, 1 Salk., 126; Lane v. Williams, 2 Vern., 277; Swan v. Steele, 7 East., 210; Byles, Bills, p. 31; 3 Kent's Com., p. 40; Story, Part., sec. 105; Collyer, Part., sec. 401.

Apply these principles to the facts disclosed in evidence, and it is clear that the power of the acting partner was ample to authorize him to draw the bills of exchange in the name of the firm, unless it can be shown that the firm of which he was a member was not one falling within the general rules of law defining and regulating the rights and obligations of partners engaged in the transactions and business of trade.

All partnerships, says Chancellor Kent, are more or less limited; and there is none that embraces, at the same time, every branch of business. Such limitations are generally to be found in the terms and stipulations of the articles of copartnership; but they may arise from general usage, or, to a certain extent, from the character of the business, and the nature of the objects to be accomplished.

Patnerships are sometimes formed by those who are interested in real estate, for the mere purpose of farming; and in respect to that class of business arrangements, it has been held, that one of the several partners does not possess, by virtue of that relation merely, the right, without the consent of his associates, to draw or accept bills of exchange, for the reason that such a practice is not usual, nor is it necessary for carrying on the farming business. Collyer on Part. (ed. 1848), sec. 402; Greenslade v Dower, 7 Barn. & C., p. 635; Dickinson v. Valpy, 10 Barn. & C., p. 138, per Littledale, J.

In the case last named, it was held that a certain mining company fell within the same exception; and, on the facts disclosed, no doubt the question was well decided. But the mere circumstance that the business consists in making profits out of real estate, as in working a stone quarry, will not necessarily take the case out of the operation of the general rule. Thicknesse v. Bromilow, 2 Crompt. & J., 425.

Farming partnerships, when strictly confined to that purpose, are held to be within the exceptions to the general rule, upon the ground, as assumed by the counsel for the plaintiffs, that their principal object is to make profits out of the soil, by gathering its fruits, and that the partners are in no proper sense engaged in trade; but wherever the business, according to the usual mode of conducting it, imports, in its nature, the necessity of buying and selling, the firm is then properly regarded as a trading partnership, and is invested with all the powers and subject to all the obligations incident to that relation. McGregor v. Cleveland, 5 Wend., 475; Winship v. Bank of the United States, 5 Pet., 529; Baker v. Wheeler, 8 Wend., 505; Coles v. Coles, 15 Johns., 160; Johnston v. Dutton, 27 Ala. R., 245; Hedley v. Bainbridge, 3 Q. B., 321.

Another answer, however, may be given to the objection to this part of the instruction, which is entirely conclusive against it. According to the evidence, farming was not the sole business of the partners composing this firm. They were also engaged in running a steam saw-mill, for manufacturing purposes; and common observation will warrant the remark, that those who engage in that business always want capital to cary it on, and frequently find it necessay to ask for credit. Like those engaged in other branches of manufactures, they buy and sell, and have occasion to remit money and collect it from distant places.

Two witnesses also testified at the trial that this firm was engaged in general trading; and there was no evidence introduced by the defendant to contradict their statements. Whether the witnesses were entitled to credit, and whether, in point of fact, this firm was a trading firm, were questions which were properly submitted to the jury. By the verdict, both questions were found in favor of the plaintiff, and the finding of the jury is conclusive.

2. One other point only remains to be considered, which arises out of the second proposition contained in the charge of the court. It was to the effect, that if the bills of exchange were accepted and paid at maturity by the plaintiffs for the firm, then the defendant was responsible, and it mattered nothing to the plaintiffs how the proceeds were disposed of.

No evidence was offered by the defendant in support of the issue raised by his fourth plea to the amended declaration, and there was none in the case tending to show that the proceeds had been applied to any illegal object, or in any manner misappropriated. Such being the fact, it is obvious that this part of the instruction became entirely immaterial; which, of itself, is a sufficient answer to the objection.

But another answer may be given to the objection, which perhaps will be more satisfactory; and that is, we think it was clearly correct. It will be observed that this part of the charge was based upon the theory that the bills of exchange were drawn by the firm of which the defendant was a member; and properly so, for the reason that the question of authority to draw them had been disposed of in the preceding part of the charge.

In considering this objection, then, it must be assumed that the bills were drawn by the firm, and that they were duly accepted and paid by the plaintiffs at maturity, on account of the firm; and if so, it is not perceived how their right to recover the amount can be affected by the fact that one of the drawers applied the money to an unlawful purpose. Where a contract grows immediately out of and is connected with the illegal or immoral act of the party claiming the benefit of it, courts of justice will not lend their aid to enforce it. Armstrong v. Toler, 11 Wheat., 258.

But the illegal act, if any, in this case, was performed by one of the drawers of the bills, and not by the acceptors. Suppose one of a firm should borrow money of a third person, in the name of the partnership, and apply it to an unlawful purpose, it surely could not defeat the right of the lender to recover on the contract.

Regarding this point as too clear to be the subject of dispute, we forbear to pursue the discussion.

After a careful examination of the exceptions, we think they cannot be sustained.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is, therefore, affirmed, with costs.

THE UNITED STATES, Appts.,

v.

THE WIDOW AND HEIRS of MARCUS WEST, Deceased.

(See S. C., 22 How., 315-318.)

Rights of wife and children of grantee, not affected by fraudulent alteration of grant.

Where fraudulent attempts were made to enlarge the quantity intended to be granted in a Mexican grant, by erasures and interlineations, after California had been ceded to the United States, though the proof of it is undeniable, and was an attempt to defraud the United States, that cannot take away from the wife and children of the grantee their claim to the original grant, which was made before California had been transferred by Treaty.

Argued Feb. 14, 1860. Decided Feb. 27, 1860.

APPEAL from the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of California.

This case arose upon a petition to the Board of Land Commissioners in California, by the appellees, for the confirmation of a claim to a tract called San Miguel.

The Board of Commissioners rejected the entire claim; but, on appeal, the district court allowed it to the extent of one league and a half, and entered a decree accordingly; whereupon the United States took an appeal to this court.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Mr. J. S. Black, Atty-Gen., and Mr. Stanton, for appellants.

Messrs. C. Benham and F. Marbury, for appellees:

The claimants derive title by succession. The grant of November 2d is admitted to be genuine. It must be confirmed to the extent of one league and a half. Its alteration did not devest the rights which vested under it. It is immaterial who made the alteration, although as a matter of fact it was not made by the claimants. or with their knowledge or consent.

There is another grant in the archives, which vested the land (the league and a half) in West.

Lewis v. Payn, 8 Cow., 75, 76; Jackson v. Gould, 7 Wend., 364; Hatch v. Hatch, 9 Mass., top pages 297, 298, 307; Doe v. Hirst, 3 Stark., 60; Herrick v. Malin, 22 Wend., 391; 3 Prest. Abs., 103; 2 H. Bl., 263; Bull. N. P., 267.

The position of the Atty-Gen., that the alteration of the grant is an abandonment of title which will prevent confirmation by this court, is not tenable. It cannot be held there was any abandonment when the claimants continued, as they have always done, to occupy the land.

All the conditions, imposed by the Jimeno grant, were complied with.

The second grant is not forgery, and should be confirmed.

The evidence of genuineness of the second grant is both direct and circumstantial.

That of forgery is negative and inconclusive.

Mr. Justice Wayne delivered the opinion of the court:

All of the documents upon which the defendants rely for a confirmation of their right to the land in dispute, are to be found on file in the archives among the expedientes of the first class. Concerning the genuineness of those which show that a grant for a league and a half was originally made to Marcus West, there can be no denial. They were admitted by the Attorney-General to be genuine; but he resists the confirmation of that title, upon the ground that fraudulent attempts were subsequently made to enlarge the quantity intended to be granted, by erasures and interlineations.

West first petitioned for the land, without stating the quantity. In a few days afterwards, General Vallejo certified that the land asked for was vacant, and that it was not within twenty leagues of the boundary of California, nor within ten leagues of the sea shore. On the 30th of October, 1840, a report was made to the Governor, that the petitioner had the qualifications for receiving a grant, and that the land might be granted.

Jimeno was then acting as Governor ad interim. He declared West to be entitled to the land, to the extent of a league and a half, describing particularly its boundaries; and he made an entry of his executive action in the case, in what is termed Jimeno's Index.

We do not regard that catalogue of grants as authoritative proof of grants enumerated in it, or as a conclusive exclusion of grants not so registered by Jimeno, which may be alleged to have been made whilst California was a part of the Mexican Republic, though they may bear date within the time to which that index relates. But in this case, it may be referred to as an auxiliary memorandum made by Jimeno himself of his action upon the petition of West.

West died before the claim was acted upon by the United States Commissioners.

We have only to observe, that the fraudulent attempts to enlarge the grant were made after California had been ceded to the United States; and though the proof of it is undeniable, and was an attempt to defraud the United States, that cannot take away from the wife and children of West their claim to the grant, which was made to him before California had been transferred by Treaty.

We affirm the decree of the court below, confirming the grant to West for a league and a half.

v.

JAMES McDONALD AND MARY McREE.

(See S. C., 22 How., 334-341.)

Jurisdiction to review state decision as to U. S. title—parol proof admissible, to show which of two equities or titles, is the better.

Where the title to land, under confirmation by U. S. Commissioners, was directly drawn in question and the decision below rejected the title, this court has authority to re-examine the decision of the state court.

Where titles in controversy are equities only, no patent having issued to either claimant on the certificates granted by the Board, as to the priority between these equities, the state courts properly received parol evidence reaching behind the confirmation.

The rule laid down by this court in the case of Garland v. Wynn, "that where several parties set up conflicting claims to property, with which a special tribunal may deal, as between one party and the government, regardless of the rights of others, the latter may come into the ordinary courts of justice, and litigate the conflicting claims," followed.

Where each party has a good title as against the United States, in a contention between double concessions which balanced each other, proof can be heard, and must of necessity be heard, to determine the better right between the contending parties.

IN ERROR to the Supreme Court of the State of Missouri.

This case arose upon a petition in the nature of an action of ejectment at law, filed in the St. Louis Land Court, by the plaintiffs in error, to recover the possession of a tract of land near

NOTE.—Jurisdiction of U. S. Supreme Court where a federal question arises, or where is drawn in question, Statute, Treaty or Constitution of U. S. See note to Matthews v. Zane, 8 U. S. (4 Cranch), 382; note to Martin v. Hunter, 14 U.S., (1 Wheat.), 304; and note to Williams v. Norris, 25 U. S. (12 Wheat.), 117.

St. Louis, containing eighty arpents, equivalent to sixty-eight acres. The trial resulted in verdict and judgment for the defendants.

This judgment having been affirmed, on appeal, by the Supreme Court of Missouri, the plaintiff sued out this writ of error.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Mr. E. B. Washburne, for plaintiffs in error:

1. The confirmation to Charles Gratiot on Nov. 19, 1811, was final and conclusive, so that neither the United States nor any person deriving title from the United States subsequently to that date, could rightfully claim the land against such confirmation.

Act of Congress, March 3, 1807, sec. 41; 12 Sto. St., sec. 1060; Strother v. Lucas, 12 Pet., 458; Chouteau v. Eckhart, 2 How., 344; Les Bois v. Bramell, 4 How., 449; Landes v. Brant, 10 How., 370.

The Supreme Court of Missouri, without denying the general proposition as stated above, attempts to evade its force by distinguishing this case from the cases heretofore decided in this court.

They say that both confirmations were made under one and the same Act of Congress. This is a fallacious statement of the case. Neither of the Acts of 1805, 1806, 1807, which created the Board of Commissioners and regulate its proceedings, confirms by its own force, any Spanish title. The whole subject was referred, by the law, to the Commissioners; their act worked the confirmation, and it was their decision that the law declared to be final. In the nsxt place, the Supreme Court of Missouri objects to the title of the plaintiffs, that the Commissioners were not authorized to grant a confirmation under the 2d section of the Act of 1807, when there was, as in the present case, an adverse claimant of the land.

The answer to this is two-fold:

First. The claim of Gratiot is not confined to any particular section of the law. Granting that the Commissioners ought not to have given a confirmation under the 2d section of the Act of 1807, still the party has obtained no more than his just rights.

Second. The 2d section of the Act of 1807, is merely directory to the Commissioners.

Burgess v. Gray, 15 Mo., 220; 16 How., 48.

That section imposed no limitation on the jurisdiction of the Commissioners to be enforced by any other tribunal, but simply furnished a rule of action. There is no court that can correct their errors, if any.

Landes v. Brant, 10 How., 370; Morehouse v. Phelps, 21 How., 294.

The doctrine of relation does not apply to this case. That doctrine, founded in mere fiction for the advancement of justice, is applied only to effectuate acts and consequences between the parties, and is never to be used to destroy estates, or to work a prejudice to strangers.

Butler v. Baker, 3 Co., 29; Thompson v. Leach, 3 Lev., 284; Jackson v. Bard, 4 Johns., 230.

2. The claim and confirmation in the name of Jeannette, who was dead at the time, are nullities, and cannot, even if otherwise valid, stand in the way of the confirmation to Gratiot. The court below disposed of this point by a simple reference to a prior decision of the same court, in Mercier v. Letcher, 22 Mo., 66. The case referred to will be found to be this: Charles Mercier was proprietor of a tract of land, under an imperfect Spanish title. Mercier died in Spanish times, and Courtois married his widow.

Courtois claimed the land in his own names, as representative of Mercier, and filed with the Commissioners the evidences of Mercier's title. The Commissioners confirmed the land "to Charles Mercier." The court decided that Courtois, who made the claim, took nothing by this confirmation; and that the heirs of Mercier, who made no claim, and who, by the force of the Act of Congress, were barred of all right in the land two years before the confirmation, took title from it. Both branches of this decision seem it to very questionable.

With the former branch, denying the title of Courtois, we have here no concern.

The counsel then reviewed this case at considerable length, criticising and pointing out differences between it and the case at bar.

3. There are no equities appearing in the case that can defeat a recovery by the plaintiffs in the present action, or deprive them of the right to hold the land under the confirmation to their ancestor.

The state of the pleading was such that under the established rule of practice in Missouri, a title merely equitable could not be considered at all.

In Burgess v. Gray, 16 How., 48, this court inaccurately stated the present practice in the State of Missouri.

See Maguire v. Vice, 20 Mo., 429; Conran v. Sellew, 28 Mo., 320; Rev. Stat. Mo., 1825, 1835, 1845.

Messrs. M. Blair and H. R. Gamble, for defendants in error:

The defendants insist that the following positions are sustained by the evidence and law of the case:

1. The objection to the confirmation in the name of Jeannette, on the ground that she was dead when the claim was filed, is not sustained by the evidence, and if it had been, is not a valid objection in law.

Mercier v. Letcher, 22 Mo., 66.

In this case, the dispute is between the parties holding equitable titles with the legal title outstanding in the United States, and is to be determined in favor of the party having the superior equity.

Bagnell v. Broderick 13 Pet., 449; Wilcox v. Jackson, 13 Pet., 516.

3. The facts in evidence show that if the two confirmations cover the same land, the superior equity is in the defendants.

4. The reliance of the plaintiffs on the fact that their confirmation is one day older than that of the defendants, is not warranted by any decision of this court, or by any principle of law, and arises from a mere misapprehension of the language found in the opinion in Landes v. Brant, 10 How., 372. No such case as the present, has ever been before this court.

Strother v. Lucas, 6 Pet., 763; Strother v. Lucas, 12 Pet., 410; Chouteau v. Eckhart, 2 How., 345; Les Bois v. Bramell, 4 How., 449; Bissell v. Penrose, 8 How., 330. None of these decisions apply to this case, where there are two confirmations by the same Board on consecutive days.

5. If the two confirmations are equal as recognitions of the two original titles, then they are to be laid out of consideration, and the parties are to litigate upon their original titles.

Carmichael v. Brisler, 8 Mart., 727; Sanchez v. Gonzales, 11 Mart., 212. In such litigation the defendants must succeed.

6. The doctrine of relation as explained and applied in Landes v. Brant, refers each of the confirmations to the time of filing the notice and in this case, the notice in the name of Jeannette was filed first, and the confirmation in her name becomes the elder by relation.

7. The confirmation for Gratiot, if it in fact covers the land confirmed in the name of Jeannette, is void for want of jurisdiction in the Commissioners, because the land was claimed and possessed by Jeannette, under the Spanish Government.

2 Stat. U. S., 440, sec. 2.

Certainly it was void, as against her and her representatives claiming the land, according to law.

8. The confirmation, when located, does not cover the land in controversy.

Until surveyed, it attaches to no land.

West v. Cochran, 17 How., 416.

The judgment of the Supreme Court of Missouri should be affirmed, because,

1st. If the confirmations are valid, the title of Jeannette is the elder title by relation to her claim.

Landes v. Brant, 10 How., 378; Crowley v. Wallace, 12 Mo., 145.

2d. Whether the confirmations are valid or not, and whether Jeannette's is the elder title or not, it is the equitable title, and must prevail against Gratiot's representatives who have not the legal title.

West v. Cochran, 58 U. S. (17 How.), 403.

3d. The confirmation to Gratiot is void, the Board having authority only to confirm titles of claimants to "lands not claimed by any other persons."

2d sec. Act of 1807, 2 Stat., 440.

4th. Jeannette's representatives have a complete title under the Act of June 13, 1812.

Guitard v. Stoddard, 16 How., 494.

Mr. Justice Catron delivered the opinion of the court:

The Board of Commissioners, sitting at St. Louis to examine claims to lands, according to the Act of March 3d, 1807 (2 Stat. at L., 440), confirmed to Chas. Gratiot, assignee of Jeannette Flore, two arpents in front, by forty back, lying in the Prairie des Noyers, near to St. Louis. This common field lot had been designated by survey, and was well known. The confirmation was made November 19th, 1811.

On the next day (Nov. 20th, 1811) the Board also confirmed the same land to Jeannette, a free negro woman. Patent certificates issued to Gratiot and Jeannette, respectively, dated the same day, 20th November, 1811. Jeannette died about 1803, leaving as her heir a child named Susan Jeannette, who died about 1840.

Gratiot got a deed for the land from a different person, named Florence Flore, who conveyed in the name of Jeannette Flore. This deed was made in 1805, and filed by Gratiot with the Recorder, and on which deed his confirmation by the board was founded. Jeannette had occupied the land for many years before her death. Florence Flore had never occupied it; had no claim to it, at any time; and conveyed in ignorance of what land her deed covered, in all probability. Gratiot died in 1817, leaving a widow and children. Neither he nor his heirs pretended to have any claim to the premises until recently, before this suit was brought by the heirs.

McDonald and Mary McRee, the defendants, claim under Jeannette, who got the second confirmation. This suit was instituted in the land court at St. Louis by petition, in 1854, under the new code of procedure of Missouri, which confounds all distinction between law and equity, and combines both remedies in the same action. The petition was answered, and a trial had on the merits, before the court and a jury.

The court, on motion of the defendants, instructed the jury as follows:

"If the jury find, from the evidence, that the tract of land confirmed to Jeannette by the Board of Commissioners includes the land in controversy, and is the same land which was surveyed for Jeannette by the authority of the Spanish Government; that said Jeannette, and those acting for or under her, were the only persons who inhabited, cultivated, or possessed the said tract, prior to the 20th of December, 1803; that the person who executed the deed in the name of Jeannette Flore, and filed by Charles Gratiot with the Recorder of land titles as one of the evidences of his claim, is not the person for whom the survey of said tract of land was so made, but another and a different person, and that she cultivated and possessed, prior to the 20th of December, 1803, another and different tract in the same common field, surveyed for her, by authority of the Spanish Government, in the year 1788, embracing no part of the land in controversy, the jury ought to find for the defendants."

This instruction was excepted to, and a verdict was found for the defendants.

The cause was brought to the Supreme Court of Missouri by writ of error, where the judgment of the land court was affirmed; and, to revise this judgment, a writ of error was prosecuted out of this court, under the 25th section of the Judiciary Act.

As the title of Gratiot's heirs was directly drawn in question by the foregoing instruction, and as the decision below giving the instruction, rejected the title, no doubt can exist in regard to the authority of this court to re-examine the decision of the state courts.

It was so determined in the case of Lytle et al. v. Arkansas, 22 How., 193, decided here at this term.

The titles in controversy are equities only, no patent having issued to either claimant on the certificates granted by the Board. 10 How., 274. With these equities, the courts of Missouri were dealing on parol evidence, reaching behind the confirmation; and the question is, had they the power to do so.

The rule laid down by this court in the case of Garland v. Wynn, 20 How., 8, is, "that where several parties set up conflicting claims to property, with which a special tribunal may deal, as between one party and the Government, regardless of the rights of others, the latter may come into the ordinary courts of justice, and litigate the conflicting claims." The Board of Commissioners was a special tribunal, within the rule.

The principle was applied in the case of Lytle v. Arkansas, cited above.

In these cases, and in several others, the contest was between claimants under occupant laws, giving a preference of entry to actual settlers; and where an applicant obtained the preference, and was allowed to enter the land on producing false affidavits, by which he imposed on the Register and Receiver, to the prejudice of another's right.

In this instance before us, each of the parties claimed as occupants for ten consecutive years before the 20th of December, 1803. Gratiot and Jeanette both proved that the latter had occupied as required, but Gratiot imposed on the Board by his false deed of assignment for the lot obtained by him from Florence Flore, whose name was untruly signed Jeannette Flore; and by reason of this imposition, he obtained confirmation and a patent certificate, which his heirs make the foundation of their suit.

Each party here has a good title, as against the United States, the Act of 1807 (2 Stat. at L., 440), declaring that a confirmation of the Board shall be conclusive against the government.

As both claims were filed in proper time, and the confirmations were had in due time, the equities are equal, and balance each other, so far as they depend on the confirmations alone; and the question is, can the ordinary courts of justice go behind the right established by the record confirming Gratiot's claim. To do this, proof must be heard impeaching his prima facie title, and which proof existed when the claim was filed with the Recorder and acted on by the Board. In other words, could the state courts go behind Gratiot's confirmation, and on evidence, compare his equity with that of Jeannette, and adjudge who the true owner was.

In the case of Barbarie v. Eslava, 9 How., 421, this court came to the conclusion (although it is not distinctly expressed), that in a contention between double concessions, which balanced each other, proof could be heard, and must of necessity be heard, to determine the better right between the contending parties.

In the cases of Chouteau v. Eckhart, 2 How., 345, and Les Bois v. Bramell, 4 How., 449, it was held that the grant made by the Act of 1812, of the village commons of St. Charles and St. Louis, and of village lots, to possessors, gave a title in fee; and that a claimant, under a Spanish concession subsequently confirmed, could not go behind the Act of Congress, and overthrow the legal title it conferred; and this, for the plain reason that neither Chouteau nor Les Bois had any title, when the Act of 1812 (2 Stat. at L., 728) was passed, that could be asserted in a court of justice; and as the political power from which they alone could take title had cut them off, to that power they must look for redress of the injury, if any existed.

To conflicts of title of the foregoing description, the principles asserted in the case of Landes v. Brant, 10 How., 370, apply.

We have no doubt of the correctness of the decision of the Supreme Court of Missouri in this cause, and order its judgment to be affirmed.

THE UNITED STATES, Appts.,
v.
JAMES D. GALBRAITH, JOHN SINE, DAVID T. BAGLEY AND RICHARD H. STANTON.

(See S. C., 22 How., 89-96.)

Mexican grant—want of merits.

Where the doubtful character of the claim under a Mexican grant, and entire want of any merits upon the testimony appears, the decree of the court below will be reversed, and the case remitted for further evidence and examination.

Argued Feb. 20, 1860. Decided Mar. 12, 1860.

APPEAL from the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of California.

The history of the case and a statement of the facts, appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Black, Atty-Gen., and Messrs. Stanton and Gillet, for appellants.

The brief filed by the Atty-Gen. after reviewing the circumstances of the case, stated following objections to the grant:

1. That the genuineness of the original expediente is extremely doubtful. The probabilities are, as ten to one, that the papers of which it consists were placed among the archives, after the conquest of the country.

2. That the grant is, beyond all doubt, a forgery.

3. That the certificate of approval is also a forgery. It must be observed that Moreno, attesting secretary, was in full life, and within the reach of process, but was not called to prove either the execution of the grant or the signature of Pico to certificate. A witness was called to prove his handwriting, and that witness, of all men in the world, was Covarrubias. If Covarrubias had been a subscribing witness, he would no doubt have kept out of sight, while Moreno testified to his handwriting.

The evidence of the possession is overwhelmingly contradicted.

The following is an abstract of Mr. Gillet's argument:

1. Where a witness is proved to have knowingly sworn false in a cause, his whole evidence must be rejected as unworthy of belief.

2. Where a party alters a written instrument with the intention of changing its character and effect, he destroys it, so that it can have no legal effect.

The effect of alterations of deeds has been settled in the following cases:

In Henman v. Dickinson, 5 Bing., 183, it was held, "Where a party sues an instrument which, on the face of it, appears to have been altered, it is for him to show that the alteration has not been improperly made."

This the claimants did not attempt to show in the case at bar.

See, also, Lewis v. Payn, 8 Cow., 71; Jackson v. Malin, 15 Johns., 293, 297; Prevost v. Gratz, 1 Pet. C. C., 364; Jackson v. Osborn, 2 Wend., 555, 559.

The grant in this case is void, and cannot lay the foundation of a recovery.

3. When a party knowingly, on a trial, introduces false evidence, it taints his whole case, and every presumption is against him.

4. Where a written instrument has become void upon alteration, other evidence to supply its place cannot be admitted.

In the present case, the original grant being excluded, all evidence tending to establish it must be rejected. The claim cannot stand upon the petition and order to report, and the report itself.

See Sutter's, Nye's, and Bassitt's cases in 21 How.

5. Official acts, in granting land and furnishing evidence of title on Sunday, are void.

See Story v. Elliot, 8 Cow., 27.

6. When the facts upon which the claim rests are inconsistent with one another, and out of the ordinary course of events, the claim must be rejected.

Mr. H. P. Hepburn and Robert J. Brent, for the defendants in error:

After reviewing the evidence in the case, the counsel said: defendants endeavored to discredit the title by arguing that Padilla was not procuring a grant at Monterey and Los Angeles in May and June, 1846, because he was pursued for killing Americans on the 21st of June of the same year, in Sonoma.

There are several answers to this:

1. Padilla was not found by Ford and his men on the 21st of June, at Sonoma.

2. The petition of Beadly is the only paper in the record which in any way fixes the whereabouts of Padilla, and this is dated May 14, 1846, and between this and the 21st of June, he could have been several times between Monterey and Sonoma.

3. It is a mistake as alleged on the other side, that the Bear War broke out in May, 1846. It is further objected that Pico, on the 20th of May, made an order of reference to the prefect for a report, when the certificate of Castro, which accompanied the petition, showed that the land was vacant, and that the report was, therefore, unnecessary. These irregularities are to be found in nearly all the espedientes. They were drawn up by the secretaries, who followed a certain routine, without regard to the facts. It is not the business of the claimants to show that the archives are consistent. It is the business of the government to show that they are fraudulent.

It is also objected that the date of the grant has been altered from June 12, 1846, to Feb. 12, 1846.

The motive of this is not easy to understand. The Californians are a simple, ignorant people. The Supreme Court of the State told them that their titles would not support an action, either for the possession or the property; the squatters, who knew Spanish, kindly interpreted the judgment of the court; it merely took the land from the Californians and gave it to them, the squatters.

The rule on the subject of alterations, is this: where an estate which may exist without deed (as a fee simple in land) is conveyed by deed, then the alteration, even though material and fraudulent, destroys the deed, but not the estate.

There are many cases to this effect, but a very strong one is the case of Lewis v. Payn, 8 Cow., 71.

See, also, Jackson v. Gould, 7 Wend., 364; Hatch v. Hatch, 9 Mass., 307.

Herrick v. Malin, 22 Wend., 391, decides that no subsequent alteration of a deed by the grantee, in a material or immaterial point, will avoid the deed, where the controversy relates to a title to land, and the title once vested under the deed in the grantee. In other words, the title once vested will not revert by the alteration, cancellation, or destruction of the muniment of title, whatever may be the law of defense against the recovery on a personal contract.

See Prest. Abs., 103; 2 H. Bl., 263; Bull. N. P., 267.

Applying this principle to the facts of this case, it will be seen that the alteration of the month of the grant, from June to February, 1846, must have been made in the original grant after it was recorded by the Mexican authorities, because there is no such alteration in the copy certified from the Surveyor-General's office.

The original grant, then, has this manifest alteration. If done for a fraudulent purpose, it is clearly immaterial in a point of law, and the fraud could be easily detected, by reference to the record of the grant, and the date of the petition and antecedent documents.

There is no evidence to show by whom or when the date was altered.

As to the charge that this grant is suspicious because made shortly before the change of flags, see Executive Documents, 1846-1847, Vol. III., doc. 19, pages 99 to 106. These documents show when the war did break out; that Frémont did not come over with a hostile force or hostile intention; that Castro undertook to cut him off, because he was afraid of just such a revolution, got up by foreigners, as had placed himself in power.

The Californian government had not a hint of war with the United States, or of the prospect of it, until they received notice of the occupation of Monterey.

Mr. Justice Nelson delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of California.

The appellees, who derived their title from Juan N. Padilla, the original grantee, presented their claim before the Board of Land Commissioners in 1852, for five square leagues of land known by the name of Bolsa de Tomales, situate in the County of Sonoma, California. The Board, after hearing the proofs, decreed in favor of the claim, which, on appeal to the district judge, was affirmed.

The documentary evidence of the title includes a petition to the Governor for the track, dated at Monterey, May 14th, 1846, accompanied with a certificate of Manuel Castro, prefect, that the land was vacant and grantable, dated same place, 10th same month; a marginal reference for information, by the Governor, Pio Pico, dated Los Angeles, 20th May, 1846; a note of concession, dated same place, 12th June, 1846; and a formal title, dated same time and place, both signed by the Governor, and J. M. Moreno, Secretary ad interim.

Proof was given of the signatures of the Governor and Secretary, and that these papers were found among the Mexican archives, which had been transferred to the custody of the Surveyor-General of the United States for California.

The original grant of the formal title to the grantee was given in evidence by the claimants, dated Los Angeles, 12th February, 1846; also, a certificate of the Governor and Secretary, of the approval on the 12th June by the Departmental Assembly, dated 14th June, 1846.

Some attempt was made to prove possession and occupation by Padilla before and since the date of the grant, which were denied by the Government. The clear weight of the proof in the case is against any possession or occupation. The two witnesses in support of it, aside from Padilla, clearly confounded the possession of the ranch of Padilla, called the Roblar de la Miseria, with that of the Bolsade Tomales, both of which are in the same section of country. Padilla states that he had possession of the land in 1844; built on it in that year; that he cultivated the land, and had cattle on it from that time until he sold it to Molena and Berreyesa, in the latter part of the year 1848, or begining of the year 1849. In this he is expressly contradicted by some half a dozen witnesses, some of whom cannot be mistaken as to the facts. It appears, from the evidence, that Padilla, at the breaking out of the disturbances in the early part of 1846, adhered to the Mexican Government, and was charged with having been concerned in killing some Americans in the fore part of that year; was pursued by an American force, and fled from that part of the country, and did not return until after the war. See, also, the testimony of Padilla in the case of the claim of Josefa de Haro and others, No. 101, before the Board of Commissioners; and see his grant of Roblar de la Miseria, 25th November, 1845.

It is admitted that the original grant of the title in form, which was in the hands of the claimants, has been altered so as to bear date the 12th February, instead of the 12th June, 1846. No explanation was given of the alteration, though it was apparent on the face of the paper.

The genuineness of the signature of the Governor, Pio Pico, to the certificate of the approval of the Departmental Assembly, was doubted by the Board of Commissioners.

The Board say, after alluding to the alteration of the date of the grant, "there are many things connected with the claim which, under the conclusion at which the commission has arrived, were not altogether satisfactory. The time when the grant was made, only a few days before the Americans took possession of the country; the evident and palpable attempt to alter the date so as to make it appear several months anterior to the time when it was issued; and the manifest want of similarity in the signatures of Pio Pico to the papers of approval, with the usual mode of signing his name, are circumstances which greatly detract from the good faith of the claim. The evidence, however, they say, makes out a prima facie case, which, in the absence of any rebutting testimony, entitles the petitioners to a decree of confirmation."

The court is of opinion that, in consideration of the doubtful character of the claim, and entire want of any merits upon the testimony, the decree of the court below should be reversed, and the case remitted for further evidence and examination.

THE BANK OF PITTSBURGH, Plff. in Er.,

v.

JOHN S. NEAL AND REUBEN E. NEAL.

(See S. C., 22 How., 96-111.)

Agent, holding blank bill or note, may fill up blanks—bona fide holder may recover on bill or note, invalid between original parties—"second of exchange"—either set may be presented—where both sets are accepted, both may be recovered on—which of two innocent parties must suffer.

Where a party to a negotiable instrument intrusts it to the custody of another, with blanks not filled up, such negotiable instrument carries on its face an implied authority to fill up the blanks and perfect the instrument.

A bona fide holder of a negotiable instrument, for a valuable consideration, without notice of the facts which impeach its validity between the antecedent parties, if he takes it before the same becomes due, holds the title unaffected by these facts and may recover thereon, although, as between the antecedent parties, the transaction may be without any legal validity.

The effect of the words, "second of exchange, first unpaid," which appear on the face of the bills is a question of law and not of fact, for the jury.

Either of two sets of bills of exchange may be presented for acceptance, and if not accepted, a right of action presently arises, upon due notice, against all the antecedent parties to the bill, without any others of the set being presented.

If either of the set be presented, and is accepted, the indorsee may properly negotiate the bill, and a bona fide holder for value, without notice, may acquire a good title.

When two bills were perfected, filled up, and negotiated, by the correspondent of the defendants, to whom the blank acceptances had been intrusted as a single bill of exchange; for the acts of their correspondent, in that behalf, the defendants are responsible to a bona fide holder for value, without notice that the acts were performed without authority.

If the defendant himself had improvidently accepted two bills for the same debt, he is liable to pay both, in the hands of innocent holders for value.

Where one of two innocent parties must suffer, through the fraud or negligence of a third party, the loss shall fall upon him who gave the credit.

Argued Mar. 1, 1860. Decided May 12, 1860.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Indiana.

This was an action of assumpsit brought in the court below, by the plaintiff in error, against the defendants in error, as acceptors of two bills of exchange, one for $1,350, dated at Pittsburgh, August 1, 1857, payable four months after date; the other for $2,168, dated at Pittsburgh August 18, 1857, payable four months after date.

Both bills were drawn by L. O. Reynolds & Son, were payable to the order of L. O. Reynolds, and were indorsed and negotiated by him to the plaintiff in error.

The court below entered judgment, on demurrer, in favor of the defendants, whereupon the plaintiff sued out this writ of error.

A very full statement appears in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. E. M. Stanton and Charles E. Walker, for plaintiff in error:

The acceptance of the bills held by the Bank for value, binds the acceptors. Whether the bills held by the Bank were seconds or any other number in any real or imaginary series of bills, they were accepted, and the acceptors bound themselves thereby to pay the holder the sum therein specified. If the acceptor meant to be bound only on one of the set, he should have accepted that one. The holder was not bound to make any inquiry, or take any notice of the others.

16 Pet., 205; Chit. Bills, 155; Holdsworth v. Hunter, 10 B. & C., 444; Story, B., sec. 226; Byles, Bills, 293, 294.

II. The words "second of exchange, first unpaid" were directions given by the drawer to the acceptors, to notify them of the series and put the acceptors on their guard as to the extent of acceptance. But their own acceptance constitutes the contract of the acceptors, and by it they bound themselves to pay the holder of that identical paper the sum specified therein.

Wells v. Whitehead, 15 Wend., 527; Downes v. Church, 13 Pet., 205.

"The bona fide holder of any one of the set, if accepted, might recover the amount of the acceptor."

Sto. Bills, sec. 226; Byles, Bills, 310; Chit. Bills, 155; Holdsworth v. Hunter, 10 B. & C., 444.

III. There were no firsts of the bills held by the Bank of Pittsburgh. The agent to whom they were delivered in blank made a distinct bill of each blank; and each being accepted, the acceptors are chargeable to any bona fide holder into whose possession they might come.

See Chit. Bills, 11th Amer. from 9th London ed., marg. pp. 155, 156; Byles, Bills, marg. pp. 310, 311; Story, Bills, sec. 226; see, also, Holdsworth v. Hunter, 10 B. & C., 444; Wells v. Whitehead, 15 Wend., 527; Downes & Co. v. Church, 13 Pet., 205.

If the defendants accepted the bills as filled up not to correspond, and delivered them to the payee so accepted, to be put in circulation, and he circulated, the different parts to different persons, for value, before due, 'tis the same as if the defendants themselves had circulated them. They are to be taken to have accepted the bills after the filling up, and are not permitted to show the contrary, as against bona fide holders.

I refer to Montague v. Perkins, 22 Eng. L. & Eq., 516; Hallifax v. Lyle, 3 Exch., 446; Schultz v. Atsley, 2 Bing. N. C., 544; Reported 29 Eng. Com. Law, 414; Russell v. Langstaffe, 2 Doug., 514; Violett v. Patton, 5 Cranch, 142; Putnam v. Sullivan, 4 Mass., 45; Byles, Bills, marg. p. 103; Chit. Bills, same edition as above, pp. 29 and 214; Sto. Prom. N., sec. 122; and Holdsworth v. Hunter, above cited; 1 Greenl. Ev., sec. 207; Trevivian v. Lawrence, 6 Mod., 256.

But it is alleged that the plaintiff was guilty of negligence in not making inquiry for the first parts of said bill, and that such inquiry would have elicited the facts in the case; but mere negligence is not sufficient to defeat the title of the holder of commercial paper.

See Chit. Bills, edition as above, p. 256: 1 Smith, L. C., pp. 512–524; Goodman v. Harvey, 4 Adol. & E., 870; 31 Eng. Com. Law, 212; Uther v. Rich, 10 Ad. & E., 784; 2 Greenl. Ev., sec. 639.

If, however, the bills sued on are the defendants' separate acceptances, there can be no question of negligence arising in the case; will be his security.' It does not lie in his mouth, to say the indorsements were not regular."

In this case the defendant had indorsed his name on the back of five copperplate checks, made in form of promissory notes, but blank as to times of payment, sums or dates, and Galley, the holder, had filled them up as his own notes with different sums, dates, and times of payment, and the indorser was held bound to the plaintiff who had discounted them. This seems to be a leading case, and has been quoted and followed as a precedent, applying equally to maker, indorser, acceptor and drawer. Usher v. Dauncey, 4 Camp., 97; Bulkley v. Butler, 2 Barn. & Cress., 425; Powell v. Duff, 3 Camp., 182; Schultz v. Astley, 29 Eng. C. L., 414; Mahone v. Central Bank, 17 Ga., 111; Fullerton v. Sturgis, 4 Ohio, N. Where one person intrusts to the custody of another a negotiable instrument, with blanks not filled up such negotiable instrument carries on its face an implied authority to fill up the blanks and perfect the instrument; and as between such person and innocent third parties the person to whom it was so intrusted must be deemed the agent of the party who committed it to his custody. Bank of Pittsburgh v. Neal, supra; Davidson v. Lanier, 71 U. S. (4 Wall.), 457.

Where papers indorsed in blank were left with a clerk with authority to use them for certain purposes and they were fraudulently obtained from him and used differently, the indorser is liable. Putnam v. Sullivan, 4 Mass., 45; 1 Parson on N. & B., 114.

Where the agent or person to whom paper is intrusted, which is complete except that the sum is left blank, fills in a sum, the parties who signed, accepted or indorsed the same, would be bound to pay any sum, for which it might be filled up, whether in excess of the sum for which he authorized it to be filled or not to a bona fide holder without notice of any limitation upon the authority of the person having it, and it is immaterial that the holder knew it was signed, accepted or indorsed in blank unless he knew of its being fraudulently filled up. Mich. Bank v. Eldred, 76 U. S. (9 Wall.), 544; Violett v. Patton, 5 Cranch, 142; Orrick v. Colston, 7 Grat., 189; Fullerton v. Sturgis, 4 Ohio, St., —; Redlick v. Doll, 54 N. Y., 236; Huntingdon v. Branch Bank, 3 Ala., 186.

If the date is left blank, and an improper date is inserted by a holder, an indorser will be bound to a bona fide holder without notice. Page v. Morrel, 3 Abb. C't of App., Dec., 433.

Where the holder of a note in blank filled it up and negotiated it for a larger amount than was indicated by the marginal figures, it was held this did not vitiate the note, though he also altered the figures. Schryver v. Hawkes, 22 Ohio St., 308.

Where paper was drawn in the form of a blank bill of exchange, and was filled up as a negotiable note, by the party for whom it was drawn, the party who signed the blank was held liable. Luellen v. Hare, 32 Ind., 211.

Where the indorsee inserted a provision in a note and they are the defendants' acceptances or they are entire forgeries. But the defendants do not pretend that their signatures are forgeries, and nothing short of this will be a defense for them as against the bona fide holders. If forgeries, the forgery was committed by Reynolds, to defraud the defendants, not the plaintiffs, because they delivered him a blank paper, but with their genuine signature thereon, as acceptors of bills of exchange, and thereby enabled him to fill up the instruments in a different manner than that which they directed. But in filling up he is their general agent, and the filling up is to be taken to be done by the defendants themselves, when the paper gets into the hands of holders in good faith, for value before due, and they are not permitted to shield themselves from responsibility by saying that the bill is a forgery.

See Byles, Bills, marg. pp. 103, 156 and 266; Chit. Bills, ed. above, marg. pp. 261 and 638; Morrison v. Buchanan, 6 C. & P., 25 Eng. Com. Law, 258; Young v. Grote, 4 Bing., 253, above; Farr v. Ward, 2 Mees & W., 844; Story, Bills, secs. 113, 441; Edw. Bills, p. 14.

Messrs. R. W. Thompson and W. M. Dunn, for defendants in error:

We feel confident that the well established rules of law will in this case charge the plaintiff with constructive notice, and withhold from her the benefit of the estoppel contended for, and as the argument would be substantially the same, whether the act complained of was a forgery as against one holding the notice, or simply a fraud, we will not assume the task of defining the true legal character of the act. The general rule that a party executing a bill or note in blank as to date, amount, or otherwise, is responsible to a bona fide holder without notice for any fraudulent use that may be made of such blank by the person intrusted with the paper, we of course admit. Such responsibility results from a principle of general applicability in cases of agency over which the principal is held responsible to the extent to which he has accredited his agent. The doctrine of estoppel, when applied in such instances, rests upon the same reason, and is in effect the same thing. The party putting out the instrument in blank, is estopped to say that he did not originally execute it in the form in which it finally appears, whenever an innocent person, without any fault of his own, would otherwise suffer.

We think, however, that the facts of this case do bring the plaintiff within the operation or the reason of this principle. The statement of the law laid down by the opposing counsel, as to which of two innocent partners must suffer by the fraud or negligence of a third, is substantially correct; but it keeps too much in the background one constituent principle, that we think excludes the case in question from its operation.

It is this: that the act of the party giving the credit must be such as is reasonably calculated to deceive—that the party claiming the protection of this principle must himself have acted with reasonable circumspection, and must have been subjected to the loss, notwithstanding the use of such reasonable circumspection.

Baker v. Sterne, 25 Eng. L. & Eq., 502; Pickard v. Sears, 6 Ad. & E., 469; S. C., 33 Eng., Com. L., 115.

In 2 Smith, L. C., 4 Am. ed., Hare & Wallace, 571, the editors, in speaking of the fact that an acceptor is estopped to deny the genuineness of the bill as originally drawn, say that this estoppel "is marked by much of the naked severity of circumstance and application which marked estoppels at common law." We cannot, however, see any peculiarity that distinguishes this in principle from other cases of estoppel in pais, or why it should be said to be marked with "naked severity." The drawee is reasonably presumed to know the handwriting of the drawer, who is his immediate correspondent. He should not pay the bill without being satisfied that it is genuine. If he does pay and the draft proves a forgery, he is guilty making it payable at a certain bank, in spite of an agreement with the makers that it should not be made payable at bank, it was held that the holder could recover. Spitler v. James, 32 Ind., 203.

A party who makes a blank acceptance or signs his name on a blank paper and delivers it to another person to be overwritten with a note, gives an implied authority to fill up the instrument; and he is liable thereon to the party receiving it honestly and for value, though filled up for a larger amount than was actually authorized and in a different manner. The holder may fill in the name of the payee where it is left blank. He may fill in his own name, or where it was delivered to a person who indorsed it in blank, the holder may fill in the name of the indorser in the body and then complete the indorsement by filling it up to himself. was delivered to Yale as a memorandum and not to be used as a note. Yale filled it up as a note for $1,585.90 payable to his own order at the Atlantic Bank, New York, and indorsed it to plaintiff who discounted it. It was held that all evidence as to any agreement between the original parties was inadmissible and the holder was entitled to recover. Ives v. Farmers' Bank, 2 Allen, 236.

If a holder exceed his authority in filling up a blank, he can have no benefit from it, even to the extent of his authority, and a holder who knows when he takes such paper that the authority to fill it up has been exceeded or departed from, cannot recover. What charges the transferee with notice, is a matter on which authorities differ. Wagner v. Diedrick, 50 Mo., 484; Van Duzer v. Howe, 21 N. Y., 531; Putnam v. Sullivan, 4 Mass., 45; Davidson v. Lanier, 71 U. S. (4 Wall.), 456; Hatch v. Searles, 2 Sm. & Gif., 147; Johnson v. Blasdale, 1 Sm. & M., 17; Hemphill v. B'k of Ala., 6 Sm. & M., 44; Byles, p. 182; Chitty on Bills, p. 29; Orrick v. Colston, 7 Grat., 189; Story on Bills, sec. 222; Parsons on N. & B., 109; Edwards on Bills & Notes, 252, 253.

Where a person simply writes his name upon a piece of blank paper, with no intention that a contract should be written over it, as for use in identifying his signature, and a note is written or printed over it by the person into whose hands it comes, and the same is passed into the hands of third parties, it has been held, there can be no recovery. Caulkins v. Whisler, 29 Iowa, 495; Nance v. Lary, 5 Ala., 370.

of negligence, and for that reason the law will not grant him recovery.

He should not accept without being satisfied that the drawer is competent to draw, and that his signature is genuine. By the act of accepting, he admits these things. Between a casual purchaser in market of the bill and the drawer, there is no privity. They are probably strangers to each other, and in case of a foreign bill, residents of different States. Such purchaser, then, may reasonably act upon the faith of the admission implied in the acceptance; and as against him, the acceptor should not be allowed to say that the draft was forged. But this reason would cease in cases where the holder is privy to the fraud, or affected with notice of it, and in such case there is no estoppel.

Bank of Commerce v. Union Bank, 8 N. Y., 230. Such estoppel, then, falls plainly within the ordinary principle of estoppels in pais, without resorting to any supposed peculiarity of the commercial law.

We submit, as a clear deduction from the authorities, that if the officers of the Bank of Pittsburgh, in purchasing this paper, failed to use ordinary and reasonable prudence, and if the paper as intrusted by the defendants to Reynolds, was not in such condition or of such kind as to enable Reynolds to practice the fraud, notwithstanding the exercise of ordinary and reasonable prudence by the plaintiff, then the defendants are not concluded by their acceptance.

All the representations made by the defendants, upon which plaintiff claims to have acted and out of which she claims an estoppel arises, are contained in the paper itself. It purports to be one of a set only. Plaintiff claims we are estopped to say it was not a single bill. It refers on its face to another part. Plaintiff says we are estopped to say there was another part. It purports on its face to be payable conditionally. Plaintiff claims we are estopped to say it was not payable absolutely.

The plaintiff's proposition, expressed in mathematical fashion, would just amount to this: that having represented a thing as a part, the defendants are, therefore, estopped to deny that it is a whole.

Holdsworth v. Hunter, 21 Eng. C. L., 110, is cited but it gives no countenance to the proposition. In that case the bill was drawn at Calcutta, by McKenzie & Co., on James Hunter, Jr., & Co., at London, payable to W Hunter & Co., in three parts, James Hunter, Jr., was a common member of the two firms, drawees and payees, and therefore empowered to deal with the bill in the double capacity of acceptor and indorser.

It is urged, however, that the drawee should accept but one part of a bill drawn in a set, and that that part, when so accepted, becomes the bill; that any third person seeing it has a right to presume it to be the only accepted part, and is justified in purchasing it without inquiring after the other parts; that by accepting all the parts, the drawee becomes liable as upon so many different bills.

The following authorities are cited, as tending to establish this position: Chit. Bills, 11 Am. from 9th London ed., 155, 156; Byles, Bills, marg. pp. 310, 311; Story, Bills, sec. 226; Holdsworth v. Hunter, supra; Wells v. Whitehead, 15 Wend., 527; Downes v. Church, 13 Pet., 205.

Each of the above textbooks contains a dictum seeming to favor the proposition, but neither of the three cases cited has any tendency to sustain it. If these dicta in the text books are to be understood as anything stronger than mere recommendation, we submit that they are unsustained by authority, that they are inconsistent with the theory of this species of commercial paper, and at variance with general commercial usage.

Chitty says: "It is laid down that unless the drawee has accepted another payment of a bill, he may safely pay any part that is presented to him, and that a payment of that part will annul the effect of the others. But that if one of the parts has been accepted, the payment of another unaccepted part will not liberate the acceptor from liability to pay the holder of the accepted part, and such acceptor may, therefore, refuse to pay the bearer of the unaccepted part, and may compel him, if he suggests that he has lost the accepted part; to find caution or sureties against his liability to pay the accepted part."

We know of no authority in this country or in England, sustaining this part of the dictum above quoted, and we feel somewhat secure in saying there is none.

Chitty deduces it as an inference from an untenable legal proposition; Story, rejecting the proposition, perpetuates the inference; Byles repeats it on the authority of Holdsworth v. Hunter—an authority that condemns it; and all of them put it as matter of recommendtion and caution, rather than peremptory law.

It seems to have been first advanced on the supposed authority of Pardessus, and to have acquired the support of no additional authority since that time, except it may be unconsidered repetition. Perhaps it may be in accordance with commercial usage in France, or perhaps it results from an error in not carefully adverting to the distinctions recognized in that country, between the rules and usages applicable to bills drawn in sets, and single bills attending copies.

(Counsel then examined the theory and reason of sets of exchange, citing Story on Bills, section 66, and contended that the plaintiff's theory would defeat this purpose.)

Perhaps the mostsatisfactory argument against the proposition that the drawer is allowed to accept but one part, is that the facts of commerce are against it.

See 4 Bac. Abr., Merchant and Merchandise. M., 685.

If, then, it can be recognized as a general mercantile usuage to accept all the parts, the plaintiff in this case cannot say that she had a right to presume that this second part, which she purchased, was the only accepted part, and therefore itself a bill of exchange.

It remains to be inquired, whether enough appeared upon the face of the bill to put her upon notice as to the other part. The early doctrine on this subject in England, seems to have required mala fides.

Lawson v. Weston, 4 Esp., 56.

But in Gill v. Cubitt, 3 B. & C., 466, it was held that if the holder took the bill under circumstances that ought to have excited the suspicion of a prudent and careful man, he could not recover, if the party from whom he received it had no title

Gill v. Cubitt was subsequently overruled in England, but the American authorities adopted its principle. The question has not, so far as we know, been in terms passed upon by this court.

See, however, Fowler v. Brantly, 14 Pet., 318; Cummins v. Mead, 6 Am. Law Jour., No. 1; 3 Kent, 81, 82; Cone v. Baldwin, 12 Pick., 545; Safford v. Wyckoff, 4 Hill., 444; Pringle v. Phillips, 5 Sand., 157; Coffin v. Anderson, 4 Blackf., 408.

The plaintiff, therefore, is chargeable with notice, if her officers neglected to make such inquiries as a reasonable prudence would have suggested.

Counsel then argued that the words "second of exchange, first unpaid," were sufficient to put the plaintiff upon inquiry, citing Byles, Bills, 3 Am., from 6 London Ed., p. 439; Lang v. Smyth, 7 Bing., 284; Story, Bills, secs. 67, 226; Bay. Bills, 20. Am., from 5 London ed., pp. 24, 147; Boyd v. Plum, 7 Wend., 309; Fowler v. Brantly, 14 Pet., 318.

Mr. Justice Clifford delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a writ of error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Indiana. All of the questions presented in this case arise upon the pleadings and the facts therein disclosed. It was an action of assumpsit, brought by the plaintiff in error as the holder of two certain bills of exchange, against the defendants as the acceptors. An amendment to the declaration was filed after the suit was commenced. As now exhibited in the transcript, it contains four counts. Two of the counts were drawn up on the respective bills of exchange, and are in the usual form of declaring in suits, by the holder of a bill of exchange against the acceptor. Those contained in the amendment are special in form, setting forth the circumstances under which the respective bills of exchange were drawn, accepted and negotiated, and averring that these acts were subsequenty ratified by the defendants. To the merits of the controversy the defendants pleaded the general issue, and filed seven special pleas in bar of the action. Demurrers were filed by the plaintiff to each of the special pleas, which were duly joined by the defendants, and after the hearing, the court overruled all the demurrers. Those filed to the pleas responsive to the first and second counts were overruled, upon the ground that the pleas were sufficient, and constituted a good bar to to the action; but those filed to the fifth, sixth, seventh and eighth pleas were overruled, upon the ground that the third and fourth counts, to which those pleas exclusively applied, were each insufficient in law to maintain the action. Whereupon, the plaintiff abiding his demurrers, the court directed that judgment be entered for the defendants, and the plaintiff sued out a writ of error, and removed the cause into this court. It being very properly admitted, by the counsel of the defendants, that the first and second counts of the declaration are in the usual form, it is not necessary to determine the question as to the sufficiency of the third and fourth, and we are the less inclined to do so, from the fact that the counsel on both sides expressed the wish, at the argument, that the decision of the cause might turn upon the question, whether the plaintiff, on the facts disclosed in the pleadings, was entitled to recover against the defendants. That question is the main one presented by the pleadings; and inasmuch as it might well have been tried under the general issue, we think it quite unnecessary to consider any of the incidental questions which do not touch the merits of the controversy. Special pleading in suits on bills of exchange and promissory notes ought not to be encouraged, except in cases, where, by law, the defense would otherwise be excluded or rendered unavailing. Full and clear statements of the facts as disclosed in the pleadings, were presented to the court, at the argument, by the counsel on both sides. They are substantially as follows: In June, 1857, the defendants, residents of Madison, in the State of Indiana, being desirous of procuring a loan of money, made their certain acceptances in writing of two blank bills of exchange, in sets of two parts to each bill, and transmitted the four blanks, thus accepted, to their correspondent, Lot O. Reynolds, then and still residing at Pittsburgh, in the State of Pennsylvania. Both sets of blanks were in the form of printed blanks usually kept by merchants for bills of exchange in double sets, except that each of the four was made payable to order of the correspondent to whom they were sent, and was duly accepted on its face by the defendants, in the name of their firm. They were in blank as to the names of the drawers and the address of the drawees, and as to date, and amount, and time, and place of payment. When the defendants forwarded the acceptances, they instructed their correspondent to perfect them as bills of exchange, by procuring the signatures of the requisite parties, as accommodation drawers and indorsers, and to fill up each with the appropriate date, and with sums not less than $1,500 nor more than $3,000, payable at the longest period practicable, and to sell and negotiate the bills as perfected, for money, and remit the proceeds to the defendants. Afterwards, in the month of July, of the same year, the defendants, at the request of the person to whom those acceptances were sent, made four other similar acceptances, and delivered them to him, to be sold and negotiated as bills of exchange, in double sets for his own use, and with power to retain and use the proceeds thereof for his own benefit. They were in all repects the same, in point of form, as the four acceptances first named, and like those, each of the four parts was made payable to the order of the person at whose request they were given, and was duly accepted by the defendants in the name of their firm. When they delivered the sets last named, they authorized the payee to perfect them as bills of exchange, in two parts, in reasonable amounts, and with reasonable dates. Eight acceptances were thus delivered by the defendants to the same person, corresponding in point of form to four bills of exchange, but with blanks for the names of the drawers and the address of the drawees, and for the respective amounts, dates and times and places of payment. Four contained, in the printed form of the blanks, the words, "first of exchange, second unpaid;" and the other four contained in the corresponding form the words, "second of exchange, first unpaid;" but in all other respects they were alike. All of the first class were perfected by the correspondent as bills of exchange of the first part, and were sold and negotiated by him at certain other banks in the City of Pittsburgh. He perfected them by procuring L. O. Reynolds & Son to become the drawers, addressed them to the defendants, indorsed them himself in blank, and procured another individual or firm to become the second indorser. They were filled up by him for sums varying from about $2,000 to $3,000, with dates corresponding to the times when there were negotiated, and were respectively made payable in four months from date. Contrary to his instructions, he retained the proceeds of the one first negotiated, which he had been directed to remit; and he also retained in his possession, but without inquiry or complaint on the part of the defendants, the other four acceptances, constituting the second class. On the 1st day of August, 1857, he perfected and filled up as a separate bill of exchange one of the last named acceptances, and sold and negotiated it to the plaintiff for his own use and benefit. He also perfected and filled up, on the eighteenth day of the same month, another of the same class, in the same manner, and for the same purpose, and on the same day sold and negotiated it to the plaintiff. Both of these last mentioned bills of exchange vary from those of the first class, not only in dates and amounts, but also as to time and place of payment, and are in all respects single bills of exchange. They were each received and discounted by the plaintiff, without any knowledge whatever that either had been perfected and filled up by the payee without any authority, or of the circumstances under which they had been intrusted to his care, unless the words, "second of exchange, first unpaid," can be held to have that import.

In all other respects, the bills must be viewed precisely as they would be if they had been perfected and filled up by the defendants, and for two reasons, deducible from the decisions of this court.

First. Because, where a party to a negotiable instrument intrusts it to the custody of another with blanks not filled up, whether it be for the purpose to accommodate the person to whom it was intrusted, or to be used for his own benefit, such negotiable instrument carries on its face an implied authority to fill up the blanks and perfect the instrument; and as between such party and innocent third parties, the person to whom it was so intrusted must be deemed the agent of the party who committed such instrument to his custody—or, in other words, it is the act of the principal, and he is bound by it. Goodman v. Simonds, 20 How., 361; Violett v. Patton, 5 Cranch, 142.

Second. Because a bona fide holder of a negotiable instrument, for a valuable consideration, without notice of the facts which impeach its validity between the antecedent parties, if he takes it under an indorsement made before the same becomes due, holds the title unaffected by these facts, and may recover thereon, although, as between the antecedent parties, the transaction may be without any legal validity. Swift v. Tyson, 16 Pet., 15; Goodman v. Simonds, 20 How., 363.

Applying these principles, it is obvious that the only question that arises on this branch of the case is as to the effect of the words, "second of exchange, first unpaid," which appear on the face of the bills. That question, under the circumstances of this case, is a question of law, and not of fact for the jury. Three decisions of this court sustain that proposition; and in view of that fact, we think it unnecessary to do more than refer to those decisions, without further comment in its support. Andrews v. Pond et al., 13 Pet., 65; Fowler v. Brantly, 14 Pet., 318; Goodman v. Simonds, 20 How., 366.

Another principle, firmly established by this court, and closely allied to the question under consideration, will serve very much to elucidate the present inquiry. In Downes et al. v. Church, 13 Pet., 207, this court held, that either of the set of bills of exchange may be presented for acceptance, and if not accepted, that a right of action presently arises, upon due notice, against all the antecedent parties to the bill, without any others of the set being presented; for, say the court, it is by no means necessary that all the parts should be presented for acceptance before a right of action accrues to the holder.

Now, if either of the set may be presented, and when not accepted a right of action immediately ensues, it is difficult to see any reason why, if upon presentation the bill is accepted, it is not competent for the indorsee to negotiate it in the market; and clearly, if the indorsee may properly negotiate the bill, a bona fide holder for value, without notice, may acquire a good title. In this connection, Mr. Chitty says, that "unless the drawee has accepted another part of a bill, he may safely pay any part that is presented to him, and that a payment of that part will annul the effect of the others; but if one of the parts has been accepted, the payment of another unaccepted part will not liberate the acceptor from liability to pay the holder of the accepted part, and such acceptor may, therefore, refuse to pay the bearer of the unaccepted part;" from which he deduces the rule, that a drawee of a bill drawn in sets should only accept one of the set. Chitty on Bills (10 Am. ed., by Barb.), 155.

Mr. Byles says: "The drawee should accept only one part, for if two accepted parts should come into the hands of different holders, and the acceptor should pay one, it is possible that he may be obliged to pay the other part also;" which could not be, unless it was competent for the holder of a second part to negotiate it in the market. Byles on Bills, p. 310.

Where the drawee accepted and indorsed one part to a creditor, as a security, and afterwards accepted and indorsed another part for value to a third person, but subsequently substituted another security for the part first accepted, it was held, in Holdsworth v. Hunter, 10 Barn. & C., 449, that, under these circumstances, the holder of the part secondly accepted was entitled to recover on the bill; and Lord Tenterden and Baron Parke held that the acceptor would have been liable on the part secondly accepted, even if the first part had been indorsed and circulated unconditionally.

Judge Story says, in his work on bills of exchange, that the bona fide holder of any one of the set, if accepted, may recover the amount from the acceptor, who would not be bound to pay any other of the set which was held by another person, although he might be the first holder. Story on Bills, sec. 226.

No authority is cited, for the defendant, to impair the force of those already referred to; but it is not necessary to express any decided opinion upon the point at the present time. Suffice it to say, that in the absence of any authority to the contrary, we are strongly inclined to think that the correct rule is stated by Mr. Chitty, and that such is the general understanding among mercantile men.

But another answer may be given to the argument for the defendant, which is entirely conclusive against it; and that is, that the bills described in the first and second counts were not parts of sets of bills of exchange. They were perfected, filled up and negotiated by the correspondent of the defendants, to whom the blank acceptances had been intrusted as single bills of exchange; and for the acts of their correspondent, in that behalf, the defendants are responsible to a bona fide holder for value, without notice that the acts were performed without authority.

When the transaction is thus viewed, as it must be in contemplation of law, it is clearly brought within the operation of the same rule as it would be if the defendant himself had improvidently accepted two bills for the same debt. In such cases, it is held, that the acceptor is liable to pay both, in the hands of innocent holders for value. Davison v. Robertson, 3 Dow. P. C., 228.

Lord Eldon, said, in that case: "Here were two bills for the same account, and supposed to be for the same sums; they who were to pay them had a right to complain that there were two, and yet they were bound to pay both, in the hands of bona fide holders, if accepted by them or by others for them, having authority to accept."

To suppose, in this case, that the words "second of exchange, first unpaid," import knowledge to the plaintiff that the bills were drawn in sets, would be to give them an effect contrary to the averments of the defendants' pleas, as well as contrary to the admitted fact that they were not so drawn; and for those reasons the theory cannot be sustained.

In view of all the facts, as disclosed in the pleadings, we think the case clearly falls within the operation of the rule, generally applicable in cases of agency, that where one of two innocent parties must suffer, through the fraud or negligence of a third party, the loss shall fall upon him who gave the credit. Fitzherbert v. Mather, 1 Term., 16, per Buller; Androscoggin Bank v. Kimball, 10 Cush., 373; Montague v. Perkins, 22 Eng. L. & Eq., 516.

Business men who place their signatures to blanks, suitable for negotiable bills of exchange or promissory notes, and intrust them to their correspondents, to raise money at their discretion ought to understand the operation and effect of this rule, and not to expect that courts of justice will fail in such cases to give it due application.

According to the views of this court, the demurrers to the several pleas filed to the first and second counts of the declaration should have been sustained. Having come to that conclusion, it is unnecessary to examine the other propositions submitted on behalf of the defendants.

The judgment of the circuit court is, therefore, reversed, with costs, and the cause remanded, with directions to enter judgment for the plaintiff, as upon demurrer, on the first and second counts of the declaration.

THE INSURANCE COMPANY OF THE VALLEY OF VIRGINIA, Plffs. in Er.,

v.

MOSES C. MORDECAI.

(See S. C., 22 How., 111-118.)

Marine insurance—total loss, what is—question not made in court below, cannot be entertained here.

In suit on a policy of insurance on the freight of a vessel, on a voyage from Charleston to Rio Janeiro, and from thence to a port of discharge in the United States, held, that the loss of the freight on the return voyage was a total loss, and the plaintiff was entitled to the whole amount underwritten.

A question not made on the trial, or presented to the court below for decision, cannot be entertained here.

The insurance was upon the freight of each successive voyage, and is to be applied to the freight at risk at any time, whether on the outward or homeward voyage, to the amount of the valuation.

Argued Feb. 23, 1860. Decided Mar. 12, 1860.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States of the District of South Carolina.

This action was brought in the court below, by the defendant in error, on a policy of insurance for $4,000.

The trial in the court below resulted in a verdict and judgment in favor of the plaintiff for $4,546, including interest and costs, whereupon the defendants sued out this writ of error.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court:

Mr. Con. Robinson, for plaintiff in error:

The court erred in charging the jury "that upon the case as above stated, the plaintiff was entitled to recover the whole amount underwritten by the defendants;" for,

1. The plaintiff was entitled to recover nothing. The case stated must be looked at with reference to the case alleged; memorandum signed by the agent, must be taken in connection with the blank policy set forth in the declaration, and that policy has this material clause: "it is also agreed that if the above named vessel, upon a regular survey, should be declared unseaworthy by reason of her being

NOTE.—Insurance; different kinds of policies. Valued policy.

Policies of insurance are divided with reference to the reality of interest into (1) interest and (2) wager policies.

1. An interest policy is where the insured has a real, substantial, assignable interest in the thing insured.

2. A wager policy is a pretended insurance, unsound or rotten, or uncapable of her prosecuting her voyage on account of being unsound or rotten, then the assurers should not be responsible on this policy.

See Dorr v. Pacif. Ins. Co., 7 Wheat., 610; Janney v. Columbian Ins. Co., 10 Wheat., 418.

Independent of the clause above relied on, the doctrine is well established, that in all voyage policies there is an implied warranty of seaworthiness.

Fawcus v. Sarsfield, 6 El. & B., 201; Hazzard v. N. E. Mar. Ins. Co., 8 Pet., 581; 4 Dow., 276; 1 Dow., 344; 2 Casey, 192.

With respect to insurance upon freight, the rule was laid down by Nelson, J., in 7 How., 604: "If the damage happens to the vessel and that can be repaired at the port of distress, in a reasonable time, and at a reasonable expense, it is the duty of the owner to make the repairs, and to continue the voyage and earn his freight. In every case, before he can recover of the underwriter, he must show that he was prevented, by one of the perils insured against, from completing the voyage, and for that reason that failed to entitle him to the freight from the shippers." The present is a far stronger case against the surety than the cases where after the commencement of the risk, damage or loss occurs to the vessel, which renders it unseaworthy, and the master, having made a port where such damage might be repaired, neglects to have the same repaired, and the vessel is afterwards lost in consequence of unseaworthiness. In such cases it is held, that the effective cause of the loss is the neglect of the master to make the repairs which would have prevented it.

Cudworth v. S. C. Ins. Co., 4 Rich., 420; Gen. Mut. Ins. Co. v. Sherwood, 14 How., 365; see, also, 1 Kern., 19, 22; 1 Bosw., 68, 76; 6 El. & B., 203, 204.

If the plaintiff was entitled to anything, his judgment is far too much.

The contract of insurance is one of indemnity.

Charleston Ins. & Trust Co. v. Corner, 2 Gill, 427, 428; Franklin F. Ins. Co. v. Hamill, 6 Gill, 95.

Here the bill of exceptions does not show a case of a valued policy, as in Davy v. Hallett, 3 Cai., 19, and Patapsco Ins. Co. v. Biscoe, 7 Gill & J., 294, but an open policy, as in Maitland v. Ins. Co., 3 Rich., 332. No doubt the policy was for the whole voyage round, as in Columbian Ins. Co. v. Catlett, 12 Wheat., 386, 387. But treating the policy as open, the recovery could only be in respect of 3,800 bags of coffee, at a freight of 79 cents per bag, amounting at most to $3,002.09. And then it might be a question, whether from this there should not be a deduction in respect of the freight earned on the outward voyage from Charleston to Rio de Janeiro.

Robertson v. Marjoribanks, 2 Stark., 573. To avoid such deduction, the plaintiff has to insist that the freight insured is to be regarded as not on "one entire voyage" from Charleston to Rio de Janeiro, and thence to a port of discharge in the United States, but upon "separate voyages" out and back, as in Hugg v. Augusta Ins. & Banking Co., 7 How., 610. This last position the appellants are not disposed to controvert; for, treating the voyage, from Rio de Janeiro to a port of discharge in the United States, as a "separate voyage," then, according to the opinion of Bosworth, J., in Van Valkenburg v. Astor Mut. Ins. Co., 1 Bosw. 66, the policy is, in effect, a distinct insurance for each separate voyage, and there is an implied warranty of the seaworthiness of the vessel, not only at the time of commencing the voyage from Charleston to Rio de Janeiro, but also at the time of commencing the voyage from Rio de Janeiro to a port of discharge in the United States.

In every aspect, it is submitted that the judgment should be reversed, the verdict set aside, and a new trial ordered, with proper instructions to the jury.

Mr. P. Phillips, for defendant in error:

Two questions only were presented by the appellants to the court below.

After a very brief statement of the case, the bill of exceptions says: "Whereupon the counsel for defendant insisted that the policy was an open policy, and the insurers liable for only $1,000, to which the court ruled and so instructed the jury, that the agreement proved was for a valued policy. Then the defendant insisted that the $4,000 having been insured on the round voyage, the insurers, from the evidence, were liable only for the one half the sum insured, the other half being covered by freight of the outward voyage; and prayed the court so to instruct the jury."

This second prayer was refused, and the judge charged "that the loss of the freight founded on an ideal risk, where the insured has no interest in the thing insured, and can, therefore, sustain no loss by the happening of any of the misfortunes insured against. Bouvier's L. Dict.; Marshall on Ins., p. 199.

With reference to the amount they are distinguished into (1) open and (2) valued.

1. An open policy is one in which the amount of the interest of the insured is not fixed by the policy. If the subject insured is not estimated at any particular amount or rate, in the contract, it is an open policy. Phillips on Ins., sec. 1178; Marshall on Ins., p. 199.

By an "open" policy is also sometimes meant, in the U. S., one in which an aggregate amount is expressed in the body of the policy and the specific amounts and subjects are to be indorsed from time to time. 12 La. Ann., 259; 19 N. Y., 305; 6 Gray, 214.

2. A valued policy is where a value has been set on the ship or goods insured, and that value inserted in the policy in the nature of liquidated damages. By allowing the value to be thus inserted in the policy, the insurer agrees that it shall be taken as there stated. Marshall on Ins., p. 199; Phillips on Ins., sec. 1178; Bouvier's L. Dict., Tit. Policy; Bisset on Marine Ins., p. 263; Snell v. Del. Ins. Co., 1 Wash., 509.

To constitute a valued policy there is inserted in the policy some such clause as the following, "380 Kegs of Tobacco worth 9600 dollars." "In case of loss the said ship is valued 2,000*l.* and the said goods at 5,000*l.*" "The said ship, goods, &c., valued at the sum insured." "The said ship, &c., goods and merchandises, &c., for so much as it concerns the assured, by agreement between the assured and the assurers in this policy, are and shall be valued at ——" or after description of the subject insured the words "valued at,"—(amount.) Phil. on Ins., sec. 1180; Harris v. Eagle Ins. Co., 5 Johns., 368; Bisset on Mar. Ins., p. 263; Marsh. on Ins., p. 200.

If the valuation is intended to cover an illegal subject or risk, or is fraudulent, it will be void. In cases of fraudulent over-valuation, the valuation is not binding. Lewis v. Rucker, 2 Burr., 1167; Haigh v. De La Cour, 3 Camp., 319; Aikin v. Miss. Mar. & F. Ins. Co., 4 Mart. N. S., 661; Marshall v. Parker, 2 Camp., 69; 12 Mass., 75; 3 Caines, 16.

Where the valuation is subject to some objection, which does not infect the whole contract, it may be was a total loss, and that upon the case as above stated, the plaintiff was entitled to recover the whole amount underwritten by the defendants."

To this "last mentioned instruction, the defendant excepted." There is therefore but one question for review in this court, and that is the correctness of the last instruction.

As the judge's first instruction was, that "the agreement proved was for a valued policy," even if this had been excepted to, the bill of exceptions should have set forth all the evidence that was given on that point. It must show this in express terms, or by equivalent averments, which would exclude the conclusion that there was other evidence.

Where the bill admits of two constructions, that will be adopted which is most favorable to the regularity of the judgment. All reasonable presumptions will be indulged in by an appellate court in favor of the judgment. This court, therefore, could not determine that this first instruction was wrong, for they have not all the evidence on which the judge below charged that "the agreement proved was for a valued policy," and if all the evidence was in, this question cannot here be raised, because there was no exception to that instruction.

If, however, we take the case as stated, the plaintiff is entitled to recover the full amount underwritten.

3 Cai., 42.

The second instruction, which was excepted to, raises only the question whether, on the assumption that the policy was a valued one, the amount insured was on the round voyage, or whether it was applicable to the risk of each voyage.

The defendant contended, and so asked the judge to instruct the jury, that the insurance was on the round voyage, and that they were therefore entitled to a deduction for the freight earned on the outward voyage. This was negatived in the charge, and to this "last mentioned instruction, the defendant excepted." This excludes, with an emphasis, any intention to except to the first instruction, which declared the policy to be a valued one.

The only question, therefore, is whether this was a correct exposition of the law.

In the case of Hugg v. Augusta Ins. Co., 7 How., 610, the insurance was "on freight of the bark Margaret Hugg, at and from Baltimore to Rio Janeiro, and back to Havana or Matanzas, or a port in the United States, &c., to the amount of $5,000," &c.

It was insisted by defendants, that the voyage insured was one entire voyage, and that they were entitled to a deduction of the freight earned on the outward cargo from Baltimore to Rio.

But this court said: "We are of opinion, that upon a true construction of the policy, the insurance was upon every successive cargo that was taken on board in the course of the voyage out and home, and is to be applied to the freight at risk at any time, whether on the outward or homeward passage."

Mr. Justice Nelson delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a writ of error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of South Carolina.

The suit was brought in the court below on a policy of insurance, for $4,000, on the freight of the barque Susan, on a voyage from Charleston to Rio Janeiro, and from thence to a port of discharge in the United States.

The vessel sailed with a full cargo on the 11th June, 1855, when she was stanch and strong, and arrived at the port of Rio Janeiro, where she discharged her outward lading, and took in a return cargo, and on the 10th October, 1855, started on her return voyage, but was compelled, for want of strength and soundness, to put back to the port of departure, where she was condemned as unseaworthy, and sold, and the whole freight of the return voyage lost.

The counsel, upon this state of facts, which is all that appears in the bill of exceptions, insisted that the policy was an open one, and the insurers liable for only $1,000; but the court instructed the jury that the agreement proved was for a valued policy.

The counsel then insisted, that the $4,000 having been insured on the round voyage, the insurers, from the evidence, were liable only for one half the sum insured—the other half being covered by the freight of the outward voyage; but the court charged, that the loss of the freight on the return voyage was a total loss, and that, upon the case as it appeared, the plaintiff was entitled to the whole amount underwritten. To this last instruction, the counsel for defendants excepted.

If the valuation is neither intended as a wager, by both parties, nor fraudulently made by the assured, it is binding on both the parties. It fixes the amount of the interest in the same manner as if the insurer were to admit it at a trial. In order to recover a loss, the assured need not prove the value. If a party insures property expected to be shipped to a large amount upon a valued policy, and in fact ships much less, he is entitled, in case of loss, to recover a proportion pro rata only, notwithstanding the valuation. The valuation fixes the insurable interest. 2 Burr., 1167, 1171; 1 Johns., 433; 5 Johns., 368.

The valuation is to be adhered to and applied, so far as it is practicable, in settling partial as well as total losses. Lewis v. Rucker, 2 Burr., 1167; Tunno v. Edwards, 12 East, 488; Goldsmid v. Gillies, 4 Taunt., 808; Forbes v. Aspinwall, 13 East, 323; Shawe v. Felton, 2 East, 109; Emery v. Rogers, 1 Esp., 207; Phil. on Ins., sec. 1203.

The owner of a vessel may insure in a valued policy to two ports in the West Indies, the amount of the prime cost of the goods, together with the premium and freight to the first port. Pritchet v. Ins. Co. of N. A., 3 Yates, 458.

The counsel for the plaintiff in error, on the argument, referred to the clause in the policy by which "it is also agreed, that if the above-named vessel, upon a regular survey, shall be declared unseaworthy, by reason of her being unsound or rotten, or incapable of prosecuting her voyage on account of her being unsound or rotten, then the assurers shall not be responsible on this policy;" and insisted that the condemnation of the vessel as unseaworthy, after returning back to the port of Rio Janeiro, brought the case within it.

But the answer to this position is, that no such question was made on the trial, or presented to the court for decision, and therefore cannot be entertained here; neither does the evidence in the case enable the counsel to raise any such question, as it does not appear that the condemnation proceeded from the causes specified in this clause of the policy. 7 Wheat., 610; 10 Wheat., 418. It is enough, however, to say, that the question, for aught that appears in the bill of exceptions, was not raised on the trial.

As it respects the question whether the policy was an open or valued one, no exception was taken to the ruling that it was a valued one. The point was not pressed, probably, as we see from a memorandum of the agents of the company in the case, that it was intended by the agreement to be a valued policy.

The remaining question, and indeed the only one presented in the bill of exceptions, is, whether the voyage insured is one entire voyage from Charleston to Rio Janeiro, and back to the port of discharge in the United States, and consequently the underwriters entitled to a deduction of the freight earned on the outward voyage.

The court is of opinion, upon the true construction of the policy, the insurance was upon the freight of each successive voyage, and is to be applied to the freight at risk at any time, whether on the outward or homeward voyage, to the amount of the valuation.

The case in this respect is not distinguishable from Hugg v. The Augusta Ins. and Banking Co., 7 How., 595. See, also, 3 Caines, 16; 7 Gill & Johns., 293; 2 Phillips on Ins., 31, 34.

Judgment of the court below affirmed.

JUAN JOSE GONZALES, Appt.,
v.
THE UNITED STATES.

(See S. C., 22 How., 161-174.)

Mexican claim confirmed—omission of manner of location not erroneous.

The claim of Juan Jose Gonzales held to be a good and valid claim to the land known by the name of San Antonio, or Pescadero, to the extent and within the boundaries mentioned in the grant and map.

The failure to direct the precise manner of the location of the grant of land is not erroneous.

Argued Feb. 24, 1860. Decided Mar. 12, 1860.

APPEAL from the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of California.

This case arose upon a petition filed before the Board of Land Commissioners in California, by the appellant, for the confirmation of a claim to a certain tract of land.

The Board of Commissioners entered a decree confirming the claim, but limiting its extent from west to east to three fourths of a league.

The district court, on appeal, having affirmed this decree, the petitioner took an appeal to this court.

A further statement or the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Messrs.* H. P. Hepburn and V. E. Howard, for appellant:

This claim will be found on examination, to be one of the most meritorious that has ever been presented for confirmation.

The government has never opposed it; yet, under the present decision, the claimant gains but little benefit from his title.

The claimant contends that the land should be confirmed to the boundaries mentioned in the decree of concession, making him, in the language of the decree of concession the "owner of the land known by the name of San Antonio, or Elpescadero, bounded by the rancho of Antonio Buelna, the Sierra, the coast, and the Arroyo del Butano," without limitation, as to quantity, there being none in the decree of concession.

The quantity of land mentioned in the grant was erroneously inserted through a clerical error.

But even admitting that it was inserted correctly, it is insisted by the claimant that the quantity should be disregarded, where all the boundaries are given in a grant, as in this case.

The naming of a quantity of land in a grant, and reservation of the surplus to the nation, does not prevent the title from passing to the grantee, if all the boundaries are given. A clause in a grant, naming quantity and reserving surplus in such a case, is an unmeaning formula. The utmost effect that could be given to the clause would be, to reserve the right to the Government, on proper proceedings, to devest the title as to the surplus; but, in the meantime, the title to the whole land is vested in the grantee.

The decree of concession gave him the whole tract. Does the grant which was made by virtue of the decree, and in order to "revalidate" it, take away the greater portion of the land given by the decree?

The grant refers to the map to ascertain the land, and the map exhibits the natural objects which are its boundaries.

"When a deed of land describes the subject matter by monuments clearly defined, such as a river, a spring, a mountain, a marked tree, or other natural object, and courses, distances and quantity are likewise inserted, which disagree with the monuments, the description by monuments shall, in general, prevail; for it is more likely that a party purchasing or selling land should make mistakes in respect to course, distance and quantity, than in respect to natural objects, which latter, from being mentioned in the deed, are presumed to have been examined at the time."

"The monuments which shall control course,

NOTE.—Effect of words "more or less" or "by estimation" in a deed. See note to U. S. v. Fossat, 61 U. S. (in Book 15), 944.

distance, &c., under such circumstances, may be any objects which are visible and clearly ascertained, as lands of other individuals, or their corners."

Messrs. J. S. Black, Atty-Gen., and E. M. Stanton, for appellees.

Mr. Justice McLean delivered the opinion of the court:

Provisionally authorized by the Administration of the Maritime Custom-House of Monterey, for the years 1832 and 1833.

Jose Figueroa, General of Brigade of the National Armies of Mexico, Commander-General, Inspector, and Superior Political Chief of Upper California.

Whereas, Juan Josa Gonzales, a Mexican by birth, has, for his own personal benefit and that of his family, petitioned for the land known by the name of San Antonio, or El Pescadero, bounded by the rancho Antonia Buelnos Sierra, the coast, and the Arroyo of Buntano, the proper measures and examinations being previously made, as required by laws and regulations, using the powers which are conferred on me in decree of the seventh of this month, in the name of the Mexican Nation, I have granted him the aforesaid land, declaring to him the ownership of it by these presents—said grant being understood to be in entire conformity with the provisions of the laws, subject to the approval or disapproval of the Most Excellent Territorial Deputation and of the Supreme Government, under the following conditions:

1. That he will submit to those which may be established by the regulation which is to be made for the distribution of vacant lands; and, in the meantime, neither the grantee nor his heirs can divide or alienate that which is granted to them, subject to any tax, entail, pledge, mortgage, or other encumbrance, even for pious purposes, nor convey it in mortmain.

2. He may inclose it, without prejudice to the crossings, roads, and servitudes; he will enjoy it freely and exclusively, making such use or cultivation of it as may best suit; but within one year, at furthest, he shall build a house, and it shall be inhabited.

3. When the ownership is confirmed to him, he will request the proper magistrate to give him juridical possession in virtue of this title, by whom the boundaries will be marked out—in which, besides the bounds, he will place some fruit or forest trees, of a useful character.

4. The land of which donation is made him is one league in length by three quarters of a league in breadth, a little more or less, as shown by the map which goes in the espedients; the magistrate who may give the possession will cause it to be in conformity with the ordinance, in order to mark out the boundaries, leaving the surplus which may result to the nation, for its convenient uses.

5. If he contravene these conditions, he will lose his right to the land, and it will be subject to denouncement by another person.

In consequence I order, that the present serving him for a title, and being held as firm and valid, note be made of it in the corresponding book, and it will be delivered to the person interested.

Given in Monterey, on the 24th December, 1833. JOSE FIGUEROA.

To His Excellency the Commanding General:

I, citizen Juan Jose Gonzales, native of the mission of Santa Cruz, resident of the Town of Branciforte, residing and employed in said mission of Santa Cruz, and mayor domo of the same, married, with a family of thirteen persons; having served the nation eight years and two months as a soldier, and having obtained my discharge from His Excellency, the Commanding General, Don Manuel Victoria, with the condition of furnishing a recruit, which I did at my own expense; and finding myself with 500 head of large cattle, and having no land or place to settle on; tired of the trouble of being together in the same village where I have been, and am unable to progress on account of the same; living where I have rated a great loss in the stock which I have placed twelve years ago; and being now actually favored by the same mission of Santa Cruz, where my deceased father sacrificed himself for twenty years, and where I served in his place, the salaries of this post rent in the same mission (Friar Antonio Real), satisfied with my services and those of my deceased father, has wished to favor me, by assigning to me the rancho of San Antonio, formerly El Pescadero Realengo, which is not occupied by said mission, is distant twelve leagues to the northwest, bounded by the rancho of San Gregoria, which place —— delineated on the accompanying paper, including a square of about four leagues, extending from the coast to the sierra, and from the rancho of San Gregoria (rancho occupied by citizen Antonio Buelna) to the rancho of La Punta de Nuevo, which is the further occupied by the mission, and desiring a security or guaranty in the same place, I apply, with the consent of the minister, to your Excellency, with the due respect, praying that you will be pleased to give me in possession the aforesaid place, in consideration of my family, and which will confer favor and grace on your most attached subject and servant, who wishes you many years of life, &c. JUAN GONZALES.

Santa Cruz, Nov. 26, 1833.

MONTEREY, Nov. 29, 1833.

In conformity with the laws on the matter, let the ayuntamiento of the Town of Branciforte report whether the person interested in this petition possesses the requisites to the —— attended to in his petition; whether the land he asked is included in the 20 leagues from the boundary, or 10 from the sea shore referred to in the Law of August, 1824; if it is irrigable, dependent on the seasons or pasture of land; if it belongs to the ownership of any private individual, Corporation of Pueblo, with everything else which may be proper to explain the matter.

This being concluded, it will pass this espediente to the reverend father minister of the mission of Santa Cruz, that he may report what he knows on the matter. Señor Don Jose Figueroa, general of brigade and commandant, inspector-general, and superior political chief of the territory, thus ordered, decreed and signed; to which I certify. FIGUEROA.

AGUSTIN V. ZAMORANO, Sec'y.

In compliance with your Excellency's —— to this ayuntamiento, under your command in the decree of November 29th, 1833, to report whether the person interested in this petition possesses the requisites to be attended to in his request, and if the land he asks for be included in those referred to in the law:

The land asked for by the person interested in this petition may now be granted to him, for he has all the circumstances required to be attended to, and is entitled to it.

It is an unoccupied place, has no irrigable lands; has land dependent on the seasons; has been recognized as the property of the mission of Santa Cruz; and for the purposes it may serve, I sign this with the second regidor, on account of the absence ——, in the town hall of the Town of Branciforte, on the 2d Dec., 1833.

(Signed) ANTONIO ROBLES.
(Signed) JOSE MARIA SALASON.

I agree to there being granted the petitioner, Juan Jose Gonzales, the place he asks for, as it is a place which this mission does not at present occupy; nor is it deemed necessary for it, in consideration of the fact that it has land enough for its cattle, and that, being unoccupied, it is considered public land; besides, when the mission occupied it —— had abundance of cattle, —— have died and diminished, and the few that remain do not need the land. He is a person of merit, and the mission ought to place him before any other person. He has all the requisites and is entitled to it; and —— testimony I sign, on 7th Dec., 1833.

Friar ANTONIO SURRA DEL REAL,
Minister of Santa Cruz.

MONTEREY, December 10, 1833.

1. If the petitioner is a Mexican by birth; if he has served in the army; if he is married and has children; if he is of good conduct.

2. If the land he asks for is of the ownership of any individual or Corporation of Pueblo; if it is irrigable, dependent on the seasons, or pasture land, and what is its extension.

3. If he has cattle with which to stock it, or the possibility of acquiring them.

This examination being made, let him return the espediente for its decision. His Excellency, the political chief, commanding general, inspector and general of brigade, Don Jose Figueroa, thus ordered, decreed and signed it, to which I certify.

(Signed) AUGUSTUS V. ZAMERANO.

Let the party interested in this espediente be notified to present the witnesses who are to be examined on the points included in the superior decree of the 10th instant which precedes this.

In the port of Monterey, on the 13th day of the month of December, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-three, present, Salvio Pacheco, witness presented on the part of the persons interested, oath was received in form of law.

The petitioner is a Mexican by birth; was in the army; has thirteen children. The land petitioned for has no private ownership; understood it belongs to the mission of Santa Cruz; that its extent is from a league to a league and a half from east and from north to south; he does not know how much of it is, as it is a cañon which reaches to the rancho of citizen Antonio Buelna. He has two hundred head of cattle, a drove of mares and tame horses, &c.

Manual Larios, a witness, says he is a Mexican; was in the army; is married; has children; knows that the land petitioned for pertains to the mission of Santa Cruz; that the said place is dependent on the seasons; that the land is about a league or more wide, and two from the beach to the hills.

A witness, Felipe Hernandez, repeats the same facts as stated by the prior witness.

1. Approved the grant made to citizen Juan Jose Gonzales of the place named San Antonio El Pescadero, on the 24th December, 1833, in entire confomity with the provisions of the law of August 18th, 1824, and article 5th of the regulation of Nov., 1828.

Opinion of the Board by Com'r R. Aug. Thompson.

For the place called San Antonio, or El Pescadero.—Claim of for one square league of land in the County of Santa Cruz.

This claim is founded on a grant made by Governor Figueroa, on 24th December, 1833, to the present claimant, which was duly approved by the Territorial Deputation on the 17th day of May following. The grant describes the land as that known by the name of San Antonio, or El Pescadero, bounded by the rancho of Antonio Buelna, the sierra, the coast, and the Arroyo de Butario. The fourth condition states that the land of which donation is made is one league in length and three quarters of a league in breadth, a little more or less, as shown by the map which goes with the espediente, with the usual reservations of the sobrante or overplus to the use of the nation. The boundaries are distinctly marked out on the map; and although there is no scale on the map, by which the extent of the boundaries can be ascertained, yet there is a note made upon it, stating that they extend one league from north to south, and three quarters of a league from east to west. This description, taken in connection with that contained in the grant, shows very clearly that it is a grant by metes and bounds, and that consequently no sobrante can result.

The original grant is in evidence, and the genuineness of the signatures of the Governor and Secretary appearing thereon are duly proved by the deposition of David Spence. Manuel Jimeno proves that the claimant has occupied the land since 1833; that he had a house, horses and sowings on it, and he still lives on it.

Entertaining no doubt, from the facts of the case, that the grant is a valid one to the extent of one league in length, and three quarters of a league in breadth, it is hereby confirmed to that extent; the three fourths of a league to be surveyed within the out boundary represented on the diseno.

Mr. Justice Campbell:

The plaintiff was confirmed in his claim to a parcel of land designated as San Antonio, or El Pescadero, in the County of Santa Cruz, by the Board of Commissioners. The description of the land in their decree is as follows:

"Being the same which has been held and occupied by the present claimant since the year 1833 to the present time, and is bounded as follows: Beginning at the mouth of the Arroyo de Butario, and running along the sea coast, and bordering thereon, to the boundary line of Antonio Buelna, the distance being one league, a little more or less; thence with the line of said Buelna east three quarters of a league; thence a line southerly parallel with the sea coast until it intersects the Arroyo de Butario, at the distance of three quarters of a league from the coast; thence along said arroyo and bordering thereon to its mouth, the place of beginning; the same being in extent three fourths of a square league, a little more or less. For a more particular description, reference being had to the original grant and map contained in the espediente from the archives now in the custody of the United States Surveyor-General for California, the first of which and a traced copy of the latter are filed in the case."

The parties appealed to the district court, and, upon the hearing of the cause, the decree of the Commissioners was affirmed, and it was further ordered, that the claim of the said Juan Jose Gonzales is a good and valid claim to the land known by the name of San Antonio, or Pescadero, to the extent and within the boundaries mentioned in the grant and map, the original of the former and copy of the latter being on file in the records of this case. From this decree the plaintiff appealed. The only question presented on the appeal is, whether the grant is to be located according to the natural calls in the grant, or whether the claimant is to be confined to the quantity specified in the 4th condition of the grant. But the decision of this question is reserved in the decree of the district court, and will properly arise after the location. The failure to direct the precise manner of the location is not erroneous.

The result therefore is, that the decree must be affirmed.

I concur in the above opinion.

v.
ISAAC COLEMAN.

(See S. C., 22 How., 192, 193.)

Appeal does not lie to state court—writ of error, the proper remedy.

No appeal can be taken from the final decision of a state court of last resort, under the 25th section of the Judiciary Act, to the Supreme Court of the United States.

A writ of error alone can bring up the cause.

Argued Feb. 28, 1860. Decided Mar. 12, 1860.

APPEAL from the Supreme Court of the State of Indiana.

The case is stated by the court.

Messrs. R. H. Gillet and D. Mace, for plaintiff in error.

Mr. Zebulon Baird, for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice Catron delivered the opinion of the court:

Coleman sued Verden in a state court of Indiana, on a note of hand, and a mortgage of lands, to secure its payment. On various pleadings and proofs, the cause was submitted for judgment to the court, the parties having dispensed with a jury. Judgment was rendered against Verden, who appealed to the Supreme Court of Indiana. There the judgment of the circuit was affirmed.

This occurred on the 26th day of June, 1858. And then we find the following entry of record: "And afterwards, to wit: at a court began and held on the 24th day of May, 1858, and continued from day to day till July 16th, 1858, at which time come the appellant, by Hon. D. Mace, his attorney, and prays an appeal to the United States Supreme Court, which prayer is granted."

Bond was given to prosecute the appeal, and the clerk certifies the record to be a true copy of the proceedings.

No appeal can be taken from the final decision of a state court of last resort, under the 25th section of the Judiciary Act, to the Supreme Court of the United States. A writ of error alone can bring up the cause. We refer to the appendix of Curtis' Digest for the mode.

It is ordered that the case be dismissed.

ROSA PACHECO ET AL., Devisees under the Last Will and Testament of JUAN A. SANCHEZ DE PACHECO, Deceased.

(See S. C., 22 How., 225–227.)

Inconsistent description in grant—map, as evidence—construction of grant.

In ascertaining the quantity of a Mexican grant, where the general description and the call for "two square leagues," found in the condition of the grant, are inconsistent, and plainly contradict each other, the court is compelled to rely on other title papers and proofs.

A map, when taken in connection with the evidence of witnesses explaining its contents, may be conclusive.

It was intended in this case to grant equal to two leagues square, situate within the given outboundary; that is to say, four leagues in one tract, if so much is found in the general description and diseno.

Argued Feb. 28, 1860. Decided Mar. 12, 1860.

APPEAL from the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of California.

This case arose upon a petition filed before the Board of Land Commissioners in California, for the confirmation of a claim to a certain tract of land.

The Board of Commissioners entered a decree confirming the claim to the extent of two square leagues only. On appeal to the district court by the petitioners, this decree was reversed, and a decree was entered for the entire claim; whereupon the United States took an appeal to this court.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Mr. J. S. Black, Atty-Gen., and Mr. Stanton for appellants.

Mr. H. S. Magraw, for appellees.

Mr. Justice Catron delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 31st of July, 1834, there was granted to Madame Pacheco a rancho of land, "included between the Arroyo de las Nueces and the Sierra de Golgones, bounded by the said places, and bounded by the ranchos Las Juntas, San Ramon and Monte Diablo." This description was accompanied by a diseno, better defining the exterior boundaries than usual. But the grant has the following condition, amongst others: "The land of which mention is made is two square leagues, a little more or less, as shown by the map which goes with the espedients. The magistrate who may give the possession will cause it to be measured in conformity with the ordinance, for the purpose of marking out the boundaries, leaving the surplus which may result, to the nation, for its convenient uses."

The Board of Commissioners held that this condition must govern as to quantity, and decreed two sqare leagues.

In the district court, that decree was reversed, and the land, as above described, and as it is represented on the plan, was decreed to the claimants, regardless of any exact quantity. From this decree the United States appealed. The validity of the grant is not disputed; the contest respects quantity only.

The plan presented by the party, and referred to in the grant, will furnish a guide to the surveyor, as respects boundaries within which the survey shall be made. But, in ascertaining the quantity intended to be given, we think neither the general description, nor the call for "two square leagues," found in the condition of the grant, can be relied on, as they are inconsistent, and plainly contradict each other, and the adoption of the one must necessarily reject the other. To find the true quantity intended to be granted, we are compelled to rely on other title papers and proofs.

The map shows, when taken in connection with the evidence of witnesses, explaining its contents, that the body of land petitioned for and granted was something more than two leagues long, and about two leagues wide. To this effect, the parol evidence is conclusive; and the map is equally so on its face, however inaccurate it may possibly be found when the objects called for, and laid down on the map, are sought on the ground. Nothing could be more manifest than that the grant was intended to give to Madame Pacheco a rancho of at least two leagues on each side line, making four leagues in superficies. And as the plan is part of and accompanies the last title paper, we feel bound to give it due weight, in reaching the undoubted equity of the claim.

This court is not dealing with a legal title; none such can exist until there is a survey, the land severed from the public domain, and the public title transferred by a final grant from the United States into private ownership.

What precise tract of land is to be surveyed and granted to Pacheco's heirs, "according to the principles of equity," must be ascertained in this proceeding, to the end that the United States may grant the legal title, in satisfaction of the Treaty; and a concession by leagues being the rule, and one extending to indefinite outboundaries the exception, we hold that it was intended in this case to grant equal to two leagues square, situate within the given outboundary; that is to say, four leagues in one tract, if so much is found in the general description and diseno.

The decree of the district court is, therefore, reversed, and the cause remanded to that court, to be further proceeded in, according to this opinion.

HENRY O. CLARK, IRA JUSTIN, JR., AND A. HYATT SMITH, Plffs. in Er.,
v.
HENRY C. BOWEN, THEODORE McNAMEE, SAMUEL P. HOLMES AND HENRY L. STONE.

(See S. C., 22 How., 270-273).

Where judgment vacated, original indebtedness revived.

The state court properly vacated its own judgment, as respected the two partners, Clark and Justin, after Smith, the solvent partner, had been released from it, because Clark had no power to bind Smith by the confession; and because the goods that were assigned to secure the judgment, had been taken by a previous mortgage of them.

Where the whole arrangement to secure a debt was in effect annulled, the original indebtedness stood revived, and was properly enforced by the judgment of the circuit court.

Argued Feb. 17, 1860. Decided Mar. 12, 1860.

IN ERROR to the District Court of the United States for the District of Wisconsin.

It appears that the defendants in error, who constituted the firm of Bowen & McNamee, had a claim for goods sold and delivered against the plaintiffs in error, who constituted the firm of H. O. Clark & Co., of Janesville, Wisconsin. It was agreed between Gilkison, a collecting agent of Bowen & McNamee, and H. O. Clark & Co., Smith being absent at the time, that H. O. Clark & Co. would confess a judgment for the amount due, and make an assignment, preferring Bowen & McNamee, with other creditors of the firm, to secure the indebtedness. This was done, judgment being confessed in Rock County Circuit Court, before the return of Smith. Gilkison thereupon executed to H. O. Clark & Co. a receipt which admitted payment in full of all prior and existing indebtedness and canceled notes which had been given by Clark & Co. to Bowen & McNamee. Immediately after Smith's return, on Aug. 17, 1854, the property was taken from the possession of Stevens, the assignee, on a chattel mortgage, executed by H. O. Clark & Co.

At the November Term of the court, on the application of Smith, who was the only responsible member of the firm at that time, the judgment was vacated as to him. At the March Term, Bowen & McNamee applied to have the judgment vacated as to all the defendants, in order that they might be restored to all the rights that they had before the judgment was confessed and the arrangement made.

On July 6, 1855, the judgment was vacated by order of the court as to all the defendants. On or about Aug. 29, 1854, Bowen & McNamee, with some of the other preferred creditors, filed a bill in the United States District Court for the District of Wisconsin, against H. O. Clark, A. Hyatt Smith, Ira Justin, Jr., Chas. Stevens and others, to enforce the assignment.

April 2, 1855, Clark, Smith, and Justin filed their answers, denying the validity of the assignment. On the 3d day of November Term, 1856, the bill was dismissed without prejudice. On the first Monday of September, 1856, the declaration in this suit was filed upon eight promissory notes, which had not been delivered up. After various proceedings the case was tried, and the court charged the jury that the judgment confessed and entered in the Circuit Court of Rock County was valid, and the notes in suit merged in it, until it was vacated and set aside by that court. If the assignment and the judgment were objected to by Smith and the other parties, and the assignment rescinded by Smith and these other defendants, by taking back the property, the original debt was revived, and the receipt is not a bar to this suit. The Circuit Court of Rock County had the power to vacate the judgment as to all these parties. It does not appear that the notes in suit were ever given up to the defendants. The exception to this charge presents the principal point in the case.

Messrs. J. H. Knowlton, J. R. Doolittle and W. P. Fessenden, for plaintiffs in error:

1. The instrument canceling the notes in controversy, contained a sufficient consideration to make it binding.

Miller v. Drake, 1 Cai., 45; Powell v. Brown, 3 Johns., 100; Forster v. Fuller, 6 Mass., 58; Overstreet v. Phillips, 1 Litt., 128; Townsley v.

Sumrall, 2 Pet., 182; Lemaster v. Burckhart, 2 Bibb, 30; Seaman v. Seaman, 12 Wend., 381; Randle v. Harris, 6 Yerg., 508; Sampson v. Swift, 11 Vt., 315; Hubbard v. Coolidge, 1 Met., 93; Chick v. Trevett, 20 Me., 462; Waydell v. Luer, 3 Den., 410.

When judgment by confession, or otherwise, is entered against one or a part only of a partnership firm, it is an extinguishment of the firm liability, and it is quite immaterial that the creditor did not know that there were other members of the firm, against whom he took no judgment. When the creditor asks for and obtains such a judgment as he gets, he is bound by it, and he cannot enlarge his rights, so as to hold others originally liable, but who by the judgment are discharged.

Robertson v. Smith, 18 Johns., 459, 476, 484; Woodworth v. Spafford, 2 McLean, 168; Willings v. Consequa, 1 Pet. C. C., 302; see Trafton v. U. S., 3 Sto. C. C., 646.

One of two partners has not power to confess a judgment or authorize the confession of judgment against the firm, where no writ has been issued against both. Such judgment is not binding on the one who does not act, but is binding and conclusive on the one who does act, and he cannot have it set aside.

Girard v. Basse, 1 Dall., 119, 122; Sloo v. State Bank of Illinois, 1 Scam., 428; Barlow v. Reno, 1 Blackf., 252; Grazebrook v. McCreedie, 9 Wend., 437; Crane v. French, 1 Wend., 311; 1 Am. Lead. Cas., 448, 449.

Taking the note of one partner for a liability of the firm, is a valid discharge of the firm, when the creditor agrees that the original liability shall be considered paid, and cancels or delivers up, or agrees to deliver up or cancel, the evidences of the firm liability.

This is the ordinary rule upon these facts, other than the particular agreement. The intention of parties to this end is presumed. 1 Smith L. C.—note to Cumber v. Wane, 391 to 398.

If this is the law on the giving the note of one partner, a fortiori must the giving a sealed warrant of attorney to confess, and the actual confession of judgment binding upon two or three members of the firm, and taking also an assignment of property to a trustee for the benefit of the condition, be a discharge. Such is the case at bar.

There is no pretense that any of the defendants practiced fraud upon Gilkison. There was no mistake even, unless perhaps Gilkison, the agent, may have mistaken the law as to whether Smith would be bound by the judgment confessed. There can be no doubt about the intention of the plaintiffs to cancel the notes. For such mistakes of law, the defendants in error can have no relief.

Hunt v. Rousmanier, 3 Mas., 294; 1 Pet., 1; Bank U. S. v. Daniel, 12 Pet., 32; Champlin v. Laytin, 18 Wend., 417; Shotwell v. Murray, 1 Johns. Ch., 516; Lyon v. Richmond, 2 Johns. Ch., 51; Storrs v. Baker, 6 Johns. Ch., 169; Clarke v. Dutcher, 9 Cow., 674, 681; Gilbert v. Gilbert, 9 Barb., 532; Arthur v. Arthur, 10 Barb., 9, 16.

The voluntary setting aside of their judgment as to the other two defendants without the consent of Smith, would not revive the liability against him.

Willett v. Forman, 3 J. J. Marsh, 292; Street v. Mullin, 5 Blackf., 563; Manville v. Gay, 1 Wis., 250.

Messrs. William P. Lynde and B. K. Miller, for defendants in error:

The court entering the judgment had vacated it and, therefore, the promissory notes still in possession of the plaintiffs, uncanceled, were still valid, and plaintiffs were entitled to recover upon them.

Whether the state court erred in vacating the judgment, this court will not inquire; it is enough that the judgment was vacated by the court in which it was entered.

A receipt may be contradicted or explained.

Grates v. Key, 3 B. & Ad., 318; Harden v. Gordon, 2 Mas., 561; Chunn v. McCarson, 2 Dev. Ch., 73; Fuller v. Crittenden, 9 Conn., 401; 1 Greenl. Ev., sec. 305; 1 Cow. & H. n. to Phil. Ev., 381; 2 Cow. & H.; n. to Phil. Ev., 581.

Mr. Justice Catron delivered the opinion of the court:

We deem it to be a matter not open to controversy in this suit, that the State Court of Rock County properly vacated its own judgment, as respected Clark and Justin, after Smith, the solvent partner, had been released from it—because Clark had no power to bind Smith by the confession; and secondly, because the goods that were assigned to a trustee to secure the judgment had been taken from the assignee, by a previous mortgage of them.

The following admission is found in the bill of exceptions, and is conclusive of the merits of this controversy:

"It is conceded by defendants, that the judgment in the circuit court was confessed at the time of the execution of the assignment, and that the assignment was to secure the judgment, and the judgment and assignment were the mode adopted to secure the plaintiff's debt; and that Clark executed the assignment and judgment for Smith."

The whole arrangement to secure the debt being, in effect, annulled, the original indebtedness stood revived, and was properly enforced by the judgment of the circuit court, which we order shall be affirmed.

THE UNITED STATES, Appts.,
v.
RAFAEL GARCIA.

Mexican claim rejected for want of grant.

Where claimant obtained an order of Governor Micheltorena to search after land and to take possession of it while the usual procedure was being prosecuted, and the claimant selected a tract and occupied and improved it, and solicited a grant, and the governor referred the petition to the alcalde for the usual informe, and this constitutes all the evidence of title produced by the claimant, and no grant was obtained; held, that the claim should be rejected.

Argued Feb. 9, 1860. Decided Mar. 12, 1860.

APPEAL from the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of California.

The history of the case and a statement of the facts appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. J. S. Black, Atty-Gen., and E. M. Stanton, for appellants:

The Board of Land Commissioners rejected the claim unanimously. Judge Hoffman delivered an opinion concurring with the Board, but Judge McAllister decided in favor of the claimant, expressing "considerable doubt" of its legal justice. The United States have appealed. We ask the court to reverse the decree of confirmation and reject the claim, upon the ground that there is absolutely no title whatever. A Governor of the Department in 1844 gave the claimant a passport, so that he might go out and hunt for nine leagues of land, and if he should happen to find any, gives him authority to take possession of it until a title could be made out. The claimant now says that he did happen to find exactly nine leagues of land, but he did not report to the Governor who gave him the roving commission, under which he was traveling when he made the discovery. He waited nearly two years, until another governor came into office, and then he did proceed according to law, by presenting a petition and doing what the regulations of 1828 require. Nor did he ask for any definite action. The order of the governor was as vague as the petition. It was simply an order that the alcalde of San Rafael might report. The alcalde made report, and in that report falsely stated that the land had been previously granted to the claimant by Micheltorena, and added, somewhat paradoxically, that it did not belong to any private individual, on account of its distance from the frontier. Slight evidence of occupancy is added to this, and there rests the case.

Not a single provision contained in the Act of 1824, or in the Regulations of 1828, has been complied with or followed in all this business.

The claim, under such a title as this, is so preposterous, that it is impossible to argue against it with any sort of seriousness. It never was regarded as a title by the Mexican Government. There was no espediente on file. The papers are all produced from the private custody of the claimant himself. There is no trace of the proceeding to be found anywhere upon record. The genuineness of the papers is extremely dobubtful.

If anything were wanting to expose this claim to further contempt, it might be found in Micheltorena's proclamation of Dec. 16, 1844, wherein he states exactly how he was employed on the 15th of November, the day upon which his passport to Garcia is dated.

The seal affixed to Micheltorena's letter is a manifest forgery.

Messrs. Calhoun Benham and F. Marbury, for appellee:

The case presents two questions:

1. Was there a contract between the claimant and the Mexican Government; and if so, what was it?

2. If there was such a contract as claimant pretends, had the governor power to make it?

1st. It is conceded, for the sake of argument, that there are no express words of grant in the decree of Micheltorena; but, at the same time, we think the decree furnishes proof enough to display an agreement between the government and the petitioners.

On this point the counsel cited 6 Pet., 738; 7 Cranch, 238.

The gift was a general one, but it became particular when it was located, and the plan was presented.

Frêmont's case, 17 How., 560; Clark's case, 9 Pet., 169.

If the decree was a grant, as we think it too plainly was to require the aid of construction, without doubt the governor was bound; but if it was no more than a promise to grant, he was equally bound. Selection, occupation, eligibility, services rendered, petition with a plan, were a price—commanded an equivalent.

See case of Chouteau's Heirs, 9 Pet., 141: see, also, 10 Pet., 310, 315, 336, 340; 12 Pet., 434; 15 Pet., 220; 11 How., 63, 115; 12 How., 434, 437; 14 How., 191.

2d. If there was such a contract as claimant pretends, had the governor power to make it?

If it was a grant, he had the power. If it was only a promise to make a grant, he had the power also. It was necessarily involved in the general and complete power he had over the subject-matter. His own construction of the law conferring his powers, is conclusive.

Frêmont's case, 17 How., 551, 562.

We maintain there is title; legal, perhaps; certainly equitable. We care not to debate as to its dignity, since, for all purposes connected with this quasi litigation with the government, an equitable title is as good as a legal title. We think a promise of title is imported at least, in the authority to select, occupy with property (cattle), and hold possession of a tract, while the procedure (to obtain a titulo) was being had on the presentation of the requisite diseno; and that this promise of performance of the conditions of the decree and of the law being shown, entitles the claimant to a confirmation. He has held this land for sixteen years—save some parts from which he has been forcibly ejected,

The delay should not provoke remark. There was no hurry. He was occupying the land during the two years, which was all the government wanted. He had no reason to anticipate the change of flags.

Every provision but obtaining the titulo and the approval of the Departmental Assembly, was complied with. There was a petition with a diseno; there were cultivation and improvement; there was at least an implied order or promise to issue the titulo.

The proceeding was substantially the same as the one most usual; the difference was in favor of the government. Usually the grant was upon conditions subsequent; here they were to be performed in advance of the titulo. Custom and usage were well followed. The proceeding had not arrived at the stage of record.

Mr. Justice Catron delivered the opinion of the court:

The question in this case is, whether the land claimed was private property when we acquired California by Treaty, or whether it then was part of the public domain of Mexico, and now belongs to the public lands of the United States.

1. If it was private property, it must have become so by the grant of a vested interest, that was good in equity; made by the granting power in the Territory of California, being authorized to exercise the sovereign power, as no other authority could devest the public title.

2. If the land in dispute was acquired by the United States, as public property, then the courts of justice have no jurisdiction of the subject matter, and cannot interfere. This is a postulate, not open to controversy. United States v. Forbes, 15 Pet., 182.

That the Mexican authorities, exercising the granting power in California, conferred no title on Garcia, we think satisfactorily appears, for the reasons set forth in the opinion of Judge Hoffman, delivered in the district court, and found in the records, the most material parts of which opinion we adopt. The district judge says:

"In support of his claim, the appellant exhibits an order of Michelterona, dated November 15, 1844, which is as follows: 'According to your memorial of the 14th instant, you ask for the grant of a passport to penetrate into the points of the coast on the northern line of this country, with the object of locating a tract of land of the extent of eight to nine leagues, since that which you now occupy with your personal property is so limited. By this order, you are empowered to appear before the military commanding authority of that frontier, in order that, after an examination, you may proceed to your research after the tract of land you ask for, as a recompense for the services rendered by you to the nation.

"'If you should happen to select any tract of land, you are empowered to occupy it with your said property, and to take possession of it while the usual procedure is being prosecuted, presenting the requisite sketch.

"'God and liberty.

MANUEL MICHELTORENA.

"'Monterey, November 15, 1844.

"'To Don Rafael Garcia, at his rancho.'

"Availing himself of the permission thus granted, the claimant appears to have selected a tract of land, and to have occupied and improved it to some extent. No steps, however, were taken by him to obain a title until March 4th, 1846, when Garcia addressed a petition to Gov. Pico, in which, after referring to the order of Micheltorena, he solicits a grant of the land. Gov. Pio Pico, by a marginal order, dated April 7th, 1846, referred the petition to the alcalde of San Rafael, for the usual informe. On the 29th of April, 1846, the alcalde reported that the land did not belong to any private individual. The foregoing constitutes all the evidence of title produced by the claimant. It is not pretended that any grant was ever issued for the land, or that any further action whatever was taken by Pio Pico on receiving the alcalde's informe. Whether he determined not to grant the land, or whether he omitted to do so in consequence of the distracted condition of public affairs, we are ignorant. One fact is clear: no grant was obtained by the claimant.

"A mere petition to search for land, such as that given to the present claimant, finds no place in the Mexican system.

"The application of Garcia to Micheltorena was for a passport to enable him to search for land. In granting this, and also the permission to put his cattle upon the tract he might select, Micheltorena in no respect bound himself or his successors to issue a final title. Such seems to have been the view of Pio Pico and the claimant himself, for a petition, accompanied by the usual diseno, is formally presented to that officer, and by him referred, for information, as in other cases.

"If this claim is to be confirmed, every provisional license or permission temporarily to occupy land must be held to constitute an equitable title, provided the claimant has availed himself of the permission—a ruling which would astonish no one more than the old inhabitants of the country, by whom the importance of obtaining a 'title' from the governor was well understood.

"For aught we know, Pio Pico, when the petition was subsequently presented, found it inexpedient to grant the land; and if the claimant, under a mere permission to occupy it with his cattle, has built a house upon it, and for two years omitted any effort to procure a title, he must attribute the loss of the land to his own neglect."

The Board of Commissioners unanimously rejected the claim, from whose decision, Garcia, the claimant, appealed to the district court. There the judgment of the Board was reversed, on a division of opinion, and a decree entered, confirming the claim, probably with a view of transmitting the case to this court for final determination.

For the reasons above stated, it is ordered that the decree of the district court be reversed. And the court below is directed to dismiss the petition; for which purpose the cause is remanded.

THE UNITED STATES,

v.

THE WIDOW, HEIRS AND EXECUTORS OF WILLIAM E. P. HARTNELL, Deceased.

(See S. C., 22 How., 286-289.)

California Governor can only grant eleven leagues to one person—grant must be concurred in by Departmental Assembly.

Under the law of 1824, the Governor of California had no power, in 1844, to grant gratuitously, for the purposes of tillage, inhabitancy and pasturage, more than eleven leagues of land to any one person, although it might be in different tracts.

The public domain was the property of the Mexican nation. The Governors of California do not show that they did represent the nation, so as to conclusively bind it; to have this effect, the governor's grant must have the concurrence of the Departmental Deputation.

The Assembly was the controlling power, and could reform or nullify the Governor's grant.

Argued Feb. 23, 1860. Decided Mar. 12, 1860.

APPEALS from the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of California.

The history of the case and a statement of the facts appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. J. S. Black, Atty-Gen., and E. M. Stanton, for the United States.

Mr. Calhoun Benham, for claimants:

I. The court will not go behind the grant of the cosumnes, to entertain the question how much land Hartnell had received, because the recitals of the grant show that the law was satisfied. The grant is a judgment upon all questions of law and fact, involved in the transaction which it consummated. The Mexicans always considered the granting of lands an adjudication; they habitually spoke of them when granted as terrenos adjudicandos.

II. But if the court do entertain the question, we say:

1. The maximum restriction found in the 12th section of the Colonization Law of 1824, has only the effect of forbidding the granting of more than eleven leagues in one grant.

2. The maximum restriction did not curtail Micheltorena's power. That power was extraordinary, and extended beyond what the Law of 1824 gave; it applied expressly to colonization, and was co-extensive with that of Santa Anna, which was de facto, if not de jura, dictatorial.

3. The estate was only voidable at the worst. It cannot be avoided in this proceeding. Every right or title unimpaired at date of cession. is protected.

Act March 3, 1851, secs. 8, 11.

In view of this point, it may be said the estate did not vest so far as the supposed excess is concerned, but this cannot be maintained. The governor granted. The idea that the Departmental or the Supreme Government participated in that function, is a bald attempt to engraft upon the regulations of 1828, what mere inspection of the text will show has no place there, and what construction in the most liberal spirit, can never authorize.

See Frémont's case, 17 How. (58 U. S.), 559.

The land being once vested, the vote by the Departmental Assembly was ineffectual to devest it. The concurrence of the Supreme Government was necessary.

Reading's case, 59 U. S. (18 How.), 7; Cervantes' case, 59 U. S. (18 How.), 555.

There should have been an inquest of office. If the right to avoid passed by a conquest or cession, whichever it be held to have been, we have no machinery by which to effectuate it.

2 Cal., 559; 5 Cal., 378.

The proceedings authorized by the Act of March 3, 1851, are in no respect in the nature of an inquest of office. Were such the case, the United States would be the actors.

We invoke no equity power for the confirmation of our title. Our title is a legal title, by which we can recover in ejectment.

We ask the court to ascertain and settle it, not to confirm it, in the strict legal sense of that word. We want no additional title, no additional patent.

4. The estate is not voidable now, in any proceeding. The law by which it could have been avoided, is abrogated. It was political in its nature, and was abrogated upon the cession.

5. The grant must be confirmed for all the land. It is a patent. It can only be contradicted by matter of record. There is no matter of record which has that effect. The non-approval by the Departmental Assembly, as has been shown, though it may be regarded as matter of record, is not effectual to contradict it, because that Act is not competent to devest the estate.

The other patent (for Todos Santos y San Antonio), which disclosed the fact that Hartnell had already received a large quantity of land, cannot be entertained as evidence for that purpose. It is dehors the patent for the cosumnes land. If our patent for cosumnes granted more than eleven leagues, then the illegality might be considered; but being legal on its face, it cannot be invalidated but by judgment in denouncement, or office found. Our allegation that we had more land has no effect, for the question is not involved in the case.

4 Bibb, 330; 7 B. Mon., 81.

6. The grant must be confirmed, because the court cannot know whether the grant for Todos Santos y San Antonio will be confirmed or not.

7. The maximum restriction did not affect the validity of the grant. No invalidity could attach to the grant as affecting any particular portion of the land, until some proceeding diminishing the quantity and segregating the portion withdrawn from the residue, was had.

8. The maximum restriction did not apply to Mexican citizens.

We submit, the decree must be reversed, and the grant confirmed for the whole quantity of the land claimed in the cosumnes tract.

Mr. Justice Catron delivered the opinion of the court:

Hartnell got a grant from Governor Alvarado, dated June 28, 1841, for a body of land lying in Lower California. The quantity is not specified in the grant, the out-boundaries only being designated.

In November, 1844, he obtained another grant for eleven squares leagues, lying in Upper California. Both claims were duly set forth in a petition seeking confirmation, before the Board of Land Commissioners, and they were confirmed, with modifications—the lower grant to the extent of five leagues, and the upper for six leagues.

From this decree the parties appealed, and brought their cause to the District Court, held at San Francisco. That court, sitting in the upper district, had no jurisdiction to re-examine the judgment of the Board, as respected the leagues confirmed in the District of Lower California; and as to that tract, the appeal was dismissed, and therefore that title stands confirmed.

There being cross appeals, the question arises here, whether the upper grant should be confirmed for six leagues or for eleven—the grant of the governor calling for the latter quantity.

The district court adjudged six leagues as the proper quantity; and on this single point the cause comes before us—both parties being satisfied with the decree below in all other respects.

The narrow question is, had the Governor of California power, in 1844, to grant gratuitously, for the purposes of tillage, inhabitancy and pasturage, more than eleven leagues of land to any one person? Section 12 of the Law of 1824 provides, that it shall not be permitted to unite in one hand, as property, more than one league of irrigable land, four leagues of farming land, not irrigable, and six for stock raising.

Both titles of Hartnell were brought before the Departmental Assembly. That body held the law to be, that the governor could not "unite in the same hand" more than eleven leagues, although it might be in different tracts; and so reported to him.

The public domain was the property of the Mexican Nation, and those who were enabled to displace that title, separate portions of it from the public lands, and vest such portions into individual proprietors by perfected titles, could only do so in the exercise of sovereign power, because the public title was a sovereign right; and agents who assumed to exercise this authority must show that they represented the nation. The Governors of California do not show that they did represent the nation, so as to conclusively bind it; to have this effect, the governor's grant must have the concurrence of the Departmental Deputation. It follows, that the Assembly was the controlling power, and could reform or nullify the governor's grant; and having reformed it to the extent of five leagues in the case before us, the claimant came in under the Treaty of Peace with Mexico, having no interest in these five leagues. 8 How., 303, 304.

We have no doubt that the Departmental Assembly, the Board of Commissioners, and the district court, construed the Law of 1824 (secton 12) correctly, and order the decree below to be affirmed in all its parts.

THE EXECUTORS AND HEIRS OF AUGUSTIN DE YTURBIDE, Deceased, Appts.,

v.

THE UNITED STATES.

(See S. C., 22 How., 290-293.)

Court bound by statute, as to grant—and as to appeal—cannot add saving clause to statute—act mandatory.

Where an entry is required by statute to be on a condition expressed, the court is bound by the statute.

Where the language of the Act of August 31, 1852 is, "the appeal shall be considered as dismissed" where the notice is not filed as required, the court cannot say it shall not be so considered.

If there be no saving clause in the statute, the court cannot add one on equitable grounds.

The Act of Aug. 31, 1852, as to appeals from the board of commissioners, is mandatory on the court, and authorizes the exercise of no discretion.

Argued Feb. 28, 1860. Decided Mar. 12, 1860.

APPEAL from the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of California.

The history of the case and a statement of the facts appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. M. Blair, for appellants:

The district court dismissed the appeal on the ground that its own order, allowing the notice of appeal to be filed nunc pro tunc, was void.

I contend that this order was not invalid. The language of the statute, that "the appeal shall be considered as dismissed" in case the notice is not filed as required, is directory merely. It prescribes a rule as to the time of filing a paper in the progress of a cause, and such rules are directory merely, and are never construed to prohibit the filing of the papers after the time limited, and before the adverse party has taken advantage of the omission.

O'Hara v. Nisury, 1 Sand., 655; Cook v. Forrest, 18 Ill., 581; Wood v. Fobes, 5 Cal., 62; 1 Barb., 478; 3 Rich., 60; 9 Ala., 399; 1 Brev., 208.

The suit was instituted and notice given of its pendency to the United States, by filing the transcript from the record of the board of commissioners.

U. S. v. Ritchie, 58 U. S. (17 How.), 534.

The court, being thus possessed of a cause which it was required to dispose of on the principles of equity, was authorized to permit a proceeding required in the subsequent progress of the cause, to be taken nunc pro tunc, for good cause and in aid of the ends of justice. That proceeding was altogether formal, and occasioned no supprise or injury to the adverse party, and it would be against the whole spirit of the Act which required the courts to deal with the rights of the claimants according to the principles of equity, as well as against the ordinary rules of practice, to hold that the order in relation to it was void.

The ground upon which the commissioners rejected this claim is, that it was not located till after the change of government. This objection was overruled by this court, in Rutherford v. Greene's Heirs, 2 Wheat., 196; in Frémont v. The U. S., 58 U. S. (17 How.), 557, and in Bissell v. Penrose, 8 How., 317.

Messrs. J. S. Black, Atty-Gen., and E. M. Stanton for appellees.

Mr. Justice McLean delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of California. A grant of twenty leagues square of land, equal to four hundred square leagues, was made by the Supreme Government of Mexico to President Yturbide, to be located in Texas, on 25th February, 1822, "in recompense for his high merit, in having achieved the independence of his country."

In 1835, the Congress of Mexico authorized his heirs to locate the land in New Mexico, or in Upper or Lower California. On the 20th of February, 1841, it was decreed by the President that the land should be located in Upper California; and on the 5th of June, orders were given by the President to the Governor of California to assign the land selected by Salvador de Yturbide, one of the heirs, in fulfillment of the grant, and the order was duly received by Pio Pico; but when Salvador was near Mazatlan, en route for California, to locate and take possession of the land, he found that port in rebellion, and was obliged to return to Mexico.

The claimants took no further proceedings till after the close of the war with the United States, and Congress had passed laws to carry into effect the treaty stipulations. They proceeded then to locate the claim on the tract described on the map, and presented their petition to the board of commissioners, asking for the confirmation of the grant. The board rejected the claim, on the ground that it had not been located prior to the change of government.

An appeal was taken to the district court, under the Act of 1852; but the counsel of appellants, being detained from home by sickness, did not file the notice, directed by the Act to be given within six months. Before any motion was made to dismiss the cause, they moved the court for leave to file the notice, nunc pro tunc, and proved, to the satisfaction of the court, that the omission to file the notice was wholly accidental; and the court thereupon allowed the motion, and ordered the notice to be filed nunc pro tunc. But, on hearing of the cause, the court decided that, under the Statute of 1852, a failure to file the notice within six months precluded any further prosecution of an appeal, under any circumstances whatever, and therefore dismissed the appeal.

The district court, it is said, dismissed the appeal on the ground that its own order, allowing the notice of appeal to be filed nunc pro tunc, was void.

As the above statement is clear and concise, it was copied from the plaintiff's brief.

The counsel insists, that the allowance of the appeal, after the time limited, was not void; that the language of the statute, that "the appeal shall be considered as dismissed, in case the notice shall not be filed as required," is directory merely.

It must be admitted, that, as to the matter of filing papers and the entry of rules under the practice of the court, such modifications may be made as may facilitate the progress of the court and the convenience of parties; and, indeed, the court may, under peculiar circumstances, avoid an act of injustice by the suspension of its rules; but this can only be done where the discretion of the court may fairly be exercised.

Where an entry is required by statute, on a condition expressed, the court is bound by the statute. The language of the Act, that "the appeal shall be considered as dismissed" where the notice is not filed as required, would seem to admit of no doubt. "If the appeal shall be considered as dismissed," for want of notice, how can the court say it shall not be so considered?

If there be no saving in a statute, the court cannot add one on equitable grounds. The 12th section of the Act of 31st August, 1852, provides that, in every case in which the board of commissioners shall render a final decision, it shall be their duty to have two certified transcripts of their proceedings and decisions, and of the papers and evidence on which the same were founded, made out, one of which transcripts shall be filed with the clerk, shall ipso facto operate as an appeal for the party against whom the decision shall be rendered; and if such decision shall be against the private claimant, it shall be his duty to file a notice with the clerk of the court, within six months thereafter, of his intention to prosecute the appeal; and if the decision shall be against the United States, it shall be the duty of the Attorney-General of the United States, within six months after receiving the said transcript, to cause to be filed with the clerk aforesaid a notice that the appeal will be prosecuted by the United States; and on the failure of either party to file such notice with the clerk, the appeal shall be regarded as dismissed.

This seems to be mandatory on the court, and authorizes the exercise of no discretion.

v.

THE HEIRS OF FRANCISCO DE HARO, Deceased.

(See S. C., 22 How., 293-298.)

Mexican grant confirmed—alteration in, against claimant's interest, will not be imputed to him.

Where the father of petitioners obtained a former grant of Alvarado, Governor of California, to the lot petitioned for, and remained in possession thereof up to his decease, and from that time petitioners have been, and still are, in the quiet and undisputed possession of said land, and such undisturbed possession has been for sixteen years, and it does not appear that anyone else has claimed or exercised a possession or right of possession over the premises; held, that the title should be confirmed.

Where the grant was originally made and dated by Governor Alvarado during his term of office, and the date which it now bears is an evident alteration against the interests of the claimants, it is not to be imputed to them.

Argued Feb. 24, 1860. Decided Mar. 13, 1860.

APPEAL from the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of California.

The history of the case and a statement of the facts appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. J. S. Black, Atty-Gen., and E. M. Stanton, for appellants.

Mr. P. Phillips, for appellees.

Mr. Justice McLean delivered the opinion of the court:

The petition of the heirs of Francisco de Haro represents:

That on the 30th July, 1843, the father of your petitioner made and presented his petition in writing to Alvarado, Governor of California, soliciting for himself the grant of a lot of land in the mission of Dolores, to which he had previously obtained a provisional grant of Jose Ramon de Estrada.

That on the 16th of August, 1843, said Francisco obtained a formal grant of said Alvarado to the lot so petitioned for, and remained in possession thereof up to the time of his decease; and that, from that time up to this day, your petitioners have been and still are in the quiet and undisputed possession of said land.

That said land is situated in the mission Dolores, and in the block known and laid down on the official map of San Francisco as block No. 37, and forms the northeast of Centre and Dolores Streets, containing fifty Spanish varas square—which grant has properly been recorded in the archives of California—and that the original documents are herewith submitted to the inspection of your honorable board.

Francisco Sanchez was sworn, as to the genuineness of the grant, and he says: I never saw the paper before, but I have no doubt it is genuine. I am acquainted with the signatures of Francisco de Haro and Juan B. Alvarado, having often seen them write; and I recognize their signatures, as they appear on said document, as their genuine signatures.

There were some old houses on the land at the time of the grant, which had belonged to the mission. These were repaired by Francisco de Haro, and in 1846 he was living in them. The land had been inclosed since by his son-in-law, Charles Brown. De Haro died there in 1848. The house was repaired by de Haro.

Francisco de Haro, over his own signature, represents: "That being established in the establishment of Dolores, in houses of the name called 'Mayor domos,' opposite the principal house and plaza; and, as I obtained them from the prefect of the 1st district, Don Jose Ramon Estrada, I solicit of Your Excellency the legitimacy in property, for the expenses that I have to make to repair them, to live therein with my family, in virtue of my services rendered, receiving grace from Your Excellency, by adding fifty varas eastward of the houses, inasmuch as I beg most humbly, &c."

MONTEREY, Aug. 16, 1843.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: Whereas the citizen Fsancisco de Haro has rendered interesting services to the nation and to the Departmental Government, and in virtue of his being already in possession of the houses solicited by previous consent of the government, as it is shown by the concession of the prefect of the district, I have concluded by these presents, in conformity and ratifying said concession jointly with the fifty varas to the eastward of said houses, as solicited.

The judge of San Francisco will have it so understood, for the cases that may occur upon informations in relation to the new Town of Dolores. ALVARADO.

This claim was at first held not to be valid and was, consequently, rejected by the commissioners. From this decision there was an appeal to the district court. On this appeal a witness, Candelario Valencia, was sworn, who says he is forty-eight years of age, and resides in the mission of Dolores, San Francisco County, California. The witness first knew Francisco de Haro about thirty years since. He is now dead; he died in 1847 or 1848, at the mission of Dolores, and in the building now occupied by Louis Pruso, which is on the northeast of Centre and Dolores Streets. The lot on which this house is situated is a fifty vara lot.

To the question, who are the heirs of Francisco de Haro? the witness answers: At the time of his death he left eight children—one died without issue; the names of those living are as follows: Josefa de Haro, wife of James Dennison—she was formerly wife of Guerrera, now dead; Rosalia de Haro, formerly wife of Mr. Andrews, deceased—now wife of Charles Brown; Natividad, formerly wife of Ignacio Castro, deceased, and now of Paul Tissot; Prudencia, unmarried; Candelaria, unmarried; Charlotta, wife of Fish; Dennison, brother of James; and Alonzo, not yet of age. Francisco de Haro lived in the house ten years. It was formerly part of the establishment of the mission, and was occupied by the mayor domos; it fronts upon the plaza of the mission, and also is opposite the principal house of said mission. Since the death of Francisco de Haro, it has been occupied, and is still, by the tenants of his heirs. Dolores and Centre Streets have always existed, since the mission was established, but had not their present names; in fact, they had no names. This lot in question had the same position that it now has. A surveyor, without any difficulty, could locate said lot.

The witness says that he has lived at the mission Dolores for the last sixteen years, and has seen all that he has testified to.

The final decree of the district court before both the judges was as follows:

This cause came on to be heard upon the transcript of the proceedings in the Board of the United States Land Commissioners, &c., and upon the proof taken in this court upon the appeal from the decision of the said Board, taken therefrom by the complainant, and upon hearing counsel for appellants and respondent, and due deliberation being thereupon had, &c., it is ordered, adjudged and decreed, that the decision and decree of the said board be, and the same is hereby reversed.

And it is further ordered, adjudged and decreed, that the claim of the said appellants to the land claimed by them is valid, and that the same be, and hereby is confirmed to them.

The land whereof confirmation is made is that certain fifty vara lot, situated in the mission Dolores, on the northeast corner of what are known as Centre and Dolores Streets, on which lot there is a house which formerly formed a part of the establishment of the mission Dolores, occupied by the mayor domos thereof—said lot fronting on the plaza, opposite to the principal house of said mission, and which lot was in the occupancy of Francisco de Haro for some years previous to his death, and has been recently in the possession of one Louis Pruso, as tenant of the claimant, together with and adding fifty varas to the eastward and immediately adjoining said houses.

Subsequently, a notice was served on the district attorney, that the counsel for the complainants will move the court, on the 14th of September, 1857, on that day, or as soon thereafter as counsel can be heard, that the decree entered in this cause be reformed, by adding to the description of the property confirmed by the said decree, "together with the parcel of land, fifty varas square, to the eastward thereof. San Francisco, September 10th, 1857."

Afterwards, on motion of the District Attorney of the United States, "it is ordered that the decree heretofore rendered at this term in the above case be set aside, and that the cause stand for reargument at the next term of this court."

And the final entry, upon filing and reading the affidavit of B. S. Brooks, and upon inspection of a traced copy of the original grant of title, whereof confirmation was heretofore made, certified in due form from the office of the Surveyor-General, from which it manifestly appears to the court that the said grant was originally made and dated by Governor Alvarado during his term of office, and that the date which it now bears is an evident alteration against the interests of the claimants, and therefore not to be imputed to them; and upon filing a notice of motion and due proof of service thereof upon the District Attorney of the United States, and counsel having been heard for both parties on motion of Mr. Williams, of counsel for the claimants, it is ordered that the order heretofore made in this cause, setting aside and vacating the decree heretofore made confirming the claim, be, and the same is hereby vacated, set aside and annulled, and said decree revived and reinstated.

From this decree there was an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States by the government.

"It appears that an undisturbed possession of the property claimed has been in the possession of Francisco de Haro and his heirs sixteen years, and it does not appear that anyone has claimed or exercised a possession or right of possession over the premises. The copy of the original grant of title, whereof confirmation was heretofore made, certified in due form from the office of the Surveyor-General, from which it manifestly appears to the court that the said grant was originally made and dated by Governor Alvarado during his term of office, and the date which it now bears is an evident alteration against the interests of the claimants, and therefore not to be imputed to them." This, being the language of the court, imparts verity to the grant, and would seem to settle all doubt on the subject.

There were some old houses on the land at the time of the grant, which belonged to the mission, but it would seem no longer belong to it.

Upon the whole, we cannot doubt, from the title papers, and especially from the sixteen years' possession which has been enjoyed by De Haro, and his heirs—using the property as their own, claiming it under the grant—that the title should be confirmed; and it is hereby confirmed.

JOHN P. JETER, Plff. in Er.,

v.

JAMES HEWITT, MELVILLE HERON AND MARY CONRAD.

(See S. C., 22 How., 352-364.)

Louisiana judgment, when res judicata—jurisdiction—state decisions, when binding.

In Louisiana, a judgment confirming and homologating a judicial sale, is res judicata, so as to operate "as a complete bar against all persons, whether of age or minors, whether present or absent, who may thereafter claim the property so sold, in consequence of all illegality or informality in the proceedings, whether, before or after judgment."

And the judgment of homologation is to be received and considered "as full and conclusive proof that the sale was duly made according to law, in virtue of a judgment or order legally and regularly pronounced on the interest of the parties duly represented."

The jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, in cases like the present, is derived exclusively from the fact that the parties are citizens of different States.

The rights which originate in the law of Louisiana, must be ascertained by a reference to the principles adopted and administered by her constituted authorities.

The sentences of her courts, except in a few cases arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States, are entitled to the same force and effect here as they have in Louisiana.

Argued Feb. 27, 1860. Decided Mar. 12, 1860.

IN ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Louisiana.

The petition in this case was filed in the court below, by the plaintiff in error, to recover a plantation and slaves, and other property therein enumerated.

The court below having entered a judgment dismissing the petition, the petitioner sued out this writ of error.

A further statement of the case appears in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Geo. E. Badger and J. M. Carlisle, for the plaintiff in error:

1. If this were a case of which the court ordering a seizure had jurisdiction, still no title passed by the sheriff's deed, because "he was bound to give three day's notice to the debtor before the seizure, if he resided on the spot; and if he did not, to count in addition a day for every 20 miles between the residence of the creditors and the residence of the judge to whom the petition was presented.

Code of Pr., 735; Erwin v. Lowry, 7 How., 181, 182.

2. But the whole proceeding was coram non judice and void. There was no action pending in that court.

See Code of Pr., arts. 78, 79, 95; Babcock v. Willams, 10 La., 396; Jenkins v. Tyler, 3 Mart. N. S., 183; Andrews v. Bank of N. Orleans, 5 La. Ann., 738, Carrollton R. R. Co. v. Bosworth, 8 La. Ann., 80.

3. The validity of this title set up by the defendants, is not res judicata. The monition suit on which this pretension is founded, could have no such effect if the proceedings in the fifth district court were a nullity. See Monition Act, B. & C.'s Dig., 586; City Bank v. Walden, 1 La. Ann., 47, and 16 La. Ann., 596.

Besides, the court where the monition suit was prosecuted, had no jurisdiction over the original suit, and could have none over that which was merely incidental.

Again, the judgment in the monition suit was not a judgment upon the merits, even against Mrs. Ford; and was not at all against Jeter.

Civ. Code, 2265.

Finally, the decree of homologation, in its terms, seems really to come to nothing, since it only confirms and homologates the sale, "in so far as the same has not been opposed;" while the record shows that it was totally opposed.

4. Jeter is not estopped to claim against the sheriff's sale, or to show the nullity of the proceedings upon which it is based.

In this respect, this case is in striking contrast with Erwin v. Lowry, in 7 How., 172. There, Hector McNeill, under whom Lowry claimed, had actively participated in the proceedings at the sale, had joined in the selection of appraisers (p. 182), had requested the marshal to offer the land and the negroes together, which was done (p. 183), and all this in the presence of Erwin; and upon the faith of this conduct, Erwin purchased. In the present case, it is distinctly proven that Jeter, "in a loud and audible tone," announced "to the sheriff and the bystanders," "that he was the owner of the property, and forbade the sale of it; and this announcement was made before the property was adjudicated to Hewitt & Heron."

"He made his objections known publicly to the crowd." The sheriff answered, that "he would proceed with the sale."

The only facts relied on by the defendants as creating an estoppel, are, first, that Jeter was present at the sale, and when the property was first offered, bid for it $70,000, and it was knocked down to him; and second, that in 1852, he joined with Mrs. Ford in making a deed for forty arpents of the land to Hewitt & Heron, for $2,000.

As to the first, his bid was for the protection of his own interest, and to avoid litigation. He had already paid Mrs. Ford $5,000, and he had agreed to pay, not only the debts charged on this property, but all the debts. Such a fact, even if the other party had acted upon it, could create no estoppel.

Hearne v. Rogers, 17 Eng. C. L., 451, 452.

But Hewitt & Heron did not act upon it. The sheriff refused Jeter's draft on Hill, McLean & Co., of New Orleans, with whom he had arranged for the money, and refused him time to go to New Orleans to produce the money, and "demanded that he should pay in cash the amount of his bid within half an hour, or he would set up the property and sell it again, which he did."

Then it was that Jeter gave notice of his title and forbade the sale; and Hewitt & Heron purchased under this notice.

As to the deed made in 1852, so far from importing a recognition of the title of Hewitt & Heron, it would rather signify an admission by them, that at least as to this fragment of forty acres, it required confirmation by a deed from Jeter.

In no view of these facts can they operate as an estoppel. The general current of authorities, English and American, establishes the principle that a declaration in pais shall not work an estoppel, unless it appears affirmatively that it was intended that the party for or to whom it is made, should act on the faith of it, and that he actually did so act, and will be prejudiced by the contrary assertion. If it be necessary to cite authorities for this, they will be found collected in Hare & Wallace's note to Howard & Hutchinson, 2 Ell. & B., 13 Amer. ed., and in the principal case. Here there was express warning given.

For these reasons, it is respectfully submitted that the decree should be reversed.

Mr. J. P. Benjamin, for defendants in error:

1. This action is plainly based on the assumption that the proceedings in the state courts of Louisiana (under which the title of Ford's succession to the property was devested, and the property sold to the defendants), are an absolute nullity.

It is an attempt indirectly to bring before the federal courts, jurisdiction of a question which, under the decisions of this court, cannot be examined by them.

The courts of Louisiana had jurisdiction of the property appertaining to Ford's succession, and they have exercised that jurisdiction by disposing of that property.

How, then, can that disposition of the property be supervised or revised by the federal courts?

This court has always declined to permit the proceedings of even the inferior courts to be attached collaterally before it.

Tarver v. Tarver, 9 Pet., 174; Gaines v. Chew., 2 How., 619, 644; Fouvergne v. City of N. O., 18 How., 471; Hagan v. Preston, 22 How., 473, decided at present term.

In this case, the plaintiff goes to the extravagant length of calling on the court not to annul the proceedings of an inferior state court as irregular or illegal, but to treat the final decision of the Supreme Court of Louisiana, as an absolute nullity.

The form chosen for the action, a simple petitory action of ejectment, is a transparent devise used by plaintiff, to avoid the necessity of bringing an action to set aside the judgment of the Supreme Court of Louisiana, he being conscious that such action would be utterly untenable.
